Many foreign governments say they are closely following the U.S. troop debate and the recommendations to be put forward by the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. The panel's much-anticipated report, expected around the end of the year, could herald a course change in U.S. policy in the region and a shift in troop levels for the United States and its top allies.

Some countries in the Iraq coalition say they are holding firm, despite the political pressures.

Romanian President Traian Basescu told the Associated Press last week that his country's 600 noncombat troops will stay, despite pleas from the families with relatives serving there.

"Romania's honor is greater than its feelings," he said.

James Baker May Face His Toughest Challenge In Iraq (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - When James Baker became President George H.W. Bush's secretary of state in 1989, one of the first things he did was cut a bipartisan deal to end years of poisonous wrangling over U.S. policy in Central America - an issue as divisive then as Iraq is today.

Seventeen years later, Baker faces a similar - but tougher - challenge as he and retired congressman Lee Hamilton co-chair a committee that's increasingly seen as the last, best hope for finding a respectable exit from Iraq.

Baker, now 76, is proceeding much as he did when he negotiated over Nicaragua and El Salvador in the `80s, according to individuals close to him and the panel, known as the Iraq Study Group.

Baker saw the disputes over Central America policy as "first and foremost a domestic political issue," he wrote in his 1995 memoir, "The Politics of Diplomacy." If the politics couldn't be defused, "any hopes for a diplomatic solution, much less achieving a bipartisan foreign policy, were doomed."

Today, the Iraq Study Group's five Republicans and five Democrats are widely portrayed as seeking new solutions to halt Iraq's slide into civil war and extricate the 141,000 U.S. troops there.

But there may not be any good solutions, and Baker's real goal is to forge a bipartisan consensus at all costs, the people close to him and the group say.

"It is not about new ideas. It is about ... ideas that can be supported across the political spectrum," said one person intimately involved with the group's work.

He and others spoke on condition of anonymity because Baker and Hamilton have demanded an end to media leaks about the group's deliberations. (Working in secrecy for as long as possible is another longtime Baker trait.)

Yet the hopes of finding a unified approach to the Iraq war appear to have faded since the midterm elections on Nov. 7.

Leading Democratic lawmakers, including incoming Senate Armed Services Committee chairman Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., have said they'll push for a withdrawal of U.S. troops beginning in the next four to six months.

President Bush and his top generals oppose timetables.

The White House initiated its own review of Iraq policy. It's unclear whether it's meant to support the Baker-Hamilton effort or pre-empt it.

"There's plenty of partisan tensions, despite all of the talk about bipartisanship," said Jeremy Rosner, a Democratic pollster and authority on public opinion and U.S. foreign policy. Still, he said, Republicans, stung by the election and looking to 2008, also are eager to see a rapid solution in Iraq.

Bernard Aronson, a former assistant secretary of state who helped Baker negotiate the Central America accord, said that in many ways, "the politics of the challenges are quite similar."

The accord with Congress essentially ended U.S. policy of trying to overthrow Nicaragua's Sandinista government by force, replacing it with a focus on democratic elections, which were won by a pro-American candidate.

But, Aronson said, Iraq "is a much tougher situation because the options are much narrower."

In 1989, he noted, the United States benefited from a changing Soviet Union that was willing to cut off arms supplies to the Sandinistas. Today, the other major player in Iraq is Iran, which by all accounts is becoming more intractable, not less.

Exactly what course in Iraq the Baker-Hamilton commission will recommend has become the No. 1 guessing game in Washington, as well as in Middle East capitals.

It appears unlikely that the panel will recommend a summary withdrawal of U.S. troops, given the White House's flat opposition and predictions from the Pentagon and U.S. intelligence agencies that a rapid exit would fracture Iraq and possibly draw its neighbors into the war.

Nor does a "stay the course" prescription seem to be in the cards.

That leaves some version of the "old college try," a last-ditch effort to stabilize the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki and build up Iraqi security forces.

Opponents argue it won't work, even with more American troops, because Maliki has been unwilling to rein in militias of Shiite factions, which form the base of his support. Iraqi security services, particularly the police, are widely reported to be involved in sectarian violence themselves.

One proposal put to the commissioners warns that it would take 50,000 more U.S. troops, plus 10,000 to 15,000 more U.S. advisers to the Iraqi army, to have any chance of success.

That many troops may not be available from a strained U.S. Army and Marine Corps.

"We can put in 20,000 more Americans tomorrow and achieve a temporary effect. But when you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now," Gen. John Abizaid, the chief of U.S. Central Command, told the Armed Services Committee on Wednesday.

Baker has suggested that he favors U.S. engagement with Iran and Syria as part of a more energetic regional approach to dealing with Iraq.

One person close to him said the former secretary of state is determined to have the commission, whose work is being coordinated by the U.S. Institute of Peace, issue a single consensus report, without the dissents that sometimes accompany such documents.

Baker, a Republican and one-time political campaign manager who was chief of staff and treasury secretary under President Ronald Reagan, has long been identified with the pragmatic "realist" foreign policy of the first President Bush. That's anathema to conservatives who favor an idealistic foreign policy based on aggressively spreading democracy.

One of those conservatives, former Pentagon official Michael Rubin, writing in the Wall Street Journal, decried the proposals to engage Iran and Syria and what he called "the resurrection of realists" such as Baker and Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates.

Aronson said the image of Baker as an amoral "pol" is unfair. "Foreign policy is politics on an international stage," he said. "You can't be effective in foreign policy unless you understand politics, broadly speaking."

Analysis: Few Military Options In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

Withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq? Won't work. Beef them up? We're stretched too thin.

As President Bush, Congress and a special commission seek new approaches for the unpopular war, warnings from the top American commander in the Middle East make clear there is no simple answer.

At the end of the day, military deployments will be up to President Bush, who has staunchly defended his handling of the war.

He said after last week's Democratic triumph in congressional elections that he is open to fresh approaches. With pressure on him to find a different path, the only thing most experts agree on is that each idea presents considerable risk.

"There's a big question right now on whether Iraq can be saved," Kenneth Pollack, who served on the National Security Council staff during the Clinton administration, said Thursday.

Gen. John Abizaid, who oversees military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, told lawmakers this week that the best way out of the war would be to intensify efforts to train Iraqi security forces.

Abizaid said he planned to bolster U.S. advisers assigned to Iraqi units to train them on how to fight more effectively until they can take the lead in combat.

"Ultimately," Abizaid said, "capable, independent Iraqi forces, loyal to an equally capable, independent Iraqi government, will set the conditions for the withdrawal of our major combat forces

The problem, Abizaid conceded, is the Baghdad government, which he said is only beginning to understand that it must support the Iraqi Army and not the Shiite militias engaged in near civil war against Sunni fighters.

Abizaid told the House Armed Services Committee about putting his faith in the Iraqi government and its forces, "Well, maybe it's a dumb bet. But I don't think so."

If that seemed a halfhearted endorsement of his own strategy, his description of other alternatives was even more glum.

Abizaid swatted down a suggestion being pushed by many congressional Democrats, including Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., to begin decreasing U.S. troop levels because it could cause instability. Democrats are expected to support that plan when they take over control of Congress next year.

Abizaid also said a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., to bolster the 141,000 U.S. troops already there could not be sustained because the American military is stretched too thin already. He said troop increases would also erode the effort to force Iraqis to take on more responsibility.

"I believe that the troop levels need to stay where they are," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We need to put more American capacity into Iraqi units to make them more capable in their ability to confront the sectarian problem."

On top of everything, the general predicted that if the insurgents and sectarian militias are not brought under control in four to six months, the violence would surge out of control. Coincidentally or not, that is the same time frame Levin — who is slated to become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee — has proposed for beginning a U.S. withdrawal.

Bush's top military and political advisers are scrubbing military and political options in Iraq. A bipartisan commission led by Bush family friend and Republican James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton are conducting an independent assessment expected to produce recommendations next month. Senators leading the Armed Services Committee — Levin and John Warner, R-Va. — say they too plan to recommend a new way ahead.

Baker's panel has attracted the most attention, but is widely expected to defer to military commanders the big question on Iraq: How many troops should stay and for how long?

Abizaid's testimony will go a long way in influencing the Iraq debate. Known as a straight shooter and one of the military's premier experts on the Middle East, his advice is well regarded in Congress and at the White House.

His answer disappointed many lawmakers who said his plan sounded too much like the status quo.

"We're in one heck of a mess in Iraq, and the American people told us loud and clear last week that they are not happy with the course of this war. Neither am I," said McCain, a presidential contender in 2008.

The war is a top issue for Democrats as well. An AP-Ipsos poll released Tuesday found that people consider Iraq the top priority for Congress over the next two years, although 57 percent say the Democrats in Congress have no plan for Iraq.

"There's no evidence that three or six or nine or 12 months of this will get us over the hump," said Richard Haass, a former adviser to Colin Powell at the State Department. Haass is now president of the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

Pollack, now an analyst at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said he thinks more consideration should be given to boosting troop levels dramatically — even if it means hurting the readiness of units to fight the next fight.

"McCain is absolutely right we need more troops. But where would they come from?" asked retired Army Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, a critic of Bush's handling of the war. Garner said he thinks U.S. forces should act as a backup and logistics supplier, providing fire power when needed but focusing on advising the Iraqis.

Garner, who Bush appointed in 2003 to head reconstruction efforts in Iraq but swiftly replaced with Paul Bremer, also said the Bush administration should force CIA and State Department employees to "deploy" as troops do to hasten reconstruction, he said.

Why Iraq Is Crumbling (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095779

"A republic, if you can keep it."

-- Benjamin Franklin, upon leaving the Constitutional Convention, in answer to "What have we got?"

We have given the Iraqis a republic, and they do not appear able to keep it.

Americans flatter themselves that they are the root of all planetary evil. Nukes in North Korea? Poverty in Bolivia? Sectarian violence in Iraq? Breasts are beaten and fingers pointed as we try to somehow locate the root cause in America.

Our discourse on Iraq has followed the same pattern. Where did we go wrong? Too few troops? Too arrogant an occupation? Or too soft? Take your pick.

I have my own theories. In retrospect, I think we made several serious mistakes -- not shooting looters, not installing an Iraqi exile government right away, and not taking out Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army in its infancy in 2004 -- that greatly compromised the occupation. Nonetheless, the root problem lies with Iraqis and their political culture.

Our objectives in Iraq were twofold and always simple: Depose Saddam Hussein and replace his murderous regime with a self-sustaining, democratic government.

The first was relatively easy. But Iraq's first truly democratic government turned out to be hopelessly feeble and fractured, little more than a collection of ministries handed over to various parties, militias and strongmen.

The problem is not, as we endlessly argue about, the number of American troops. Or of Iraqi troops. The problem is the allegiance of the Iraqi troops. Some serve the abstraction called Iraq. But many swear fealty to political parties, religious sects or militia leaders.

Are the Arabs intrinsically incapable of democracy, as the "realists" imply? True, there are political, historical, even religious reasons why Arabs are less prepared for democracy than, say, East Asians and Latin Americans who successfully democratized over the past several decades. But the problem here is Iraq's particular political culture, raped and ruined by 30 years of Hussein's totalitarianism.

What was left in its wake was a social desert, a dearth of the trust and good will and sheer human capital required for democratic governance. All that was left for the individual Iraqi to attach himself to was the mosque or clan or militia. At this earliest stage of democratic development, Iraqi national consciousness is as yet too weak and the culture of compromise too undeveloped to produce an effective government enjoying broad allegiance.

Last month American soldiers captured a Mahdi Army death squad leader in Baghdad -- only to be forced to turn him loose on order of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Two weeks ago, we were ordered, again by Maliki, to take down the barricades we had established around Sadr City in search of another notorious death squad leader and a missing American soldier.

This is no way to conduct a war. The Maliki government is a failure. It is beholden to a coalition dominated by two Shiite religious parties, each armed and ambitious, at odds with each other and with the ultimate aim of a stable, modern, democratic regime.

Is this America's fault? No. It is a result of Iraq's first democratic election. The United States was not going to replace Saddam Hussein with another tyrant. We were trying to plant democracy in the heart of the Middle East as the one conceivable antidote to extremism and terror -- and, in a country that is nearly two-thirds Shiite, that inevitably meant Shiite domination. It was never certain whether the long-oppressed Shiites would have enough sense of nation and sense of compromise to govern rather than rule. The answer is now clear: United in a dominating coalition, they do not.

Fortunately, however, the ruling Shiites do not have much internal cohesion. Just last month two of the major Shiite religious parties that underpin the Maliki government engaged in savage combat against each other in Amarah.

There is a glimmer of hope in this breakdown of the Shiite front. The unitary Shiite government having been proved such a failure, we should be encouraging the full breakup of the Shiite front in pursuit of a new coalition based on cross-sectarian alliances: the more moderate Shiite elements (secular and religious but excluding the poisonous Sadr), the Kurds and those Sunnis who recognize their minority status but are willing to accept an important, generously offered place at the table.

Such a coalition was almost created after the latest Iraqi elections. It needs to be attempted again. One can tinker with American tactics or troop levels from today until doomsday. But unless the Iraqis can put together a government of unitary purpose and resolute action, the simple objective of this war -- to leave behind a self-sustaining democratic government -- is not attainable.

Luther lives

Letter dated Nov. 12, addressed to D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams, from resident Jesse H. Merrell of Garfield Street Northwest:

DOJ_NMG_0095780

"Dear Mayor Williams: I realize you are going out of office but ... I write in a final futile effort about your Department of Public Works notice of Nov. 6, 2006, to Luther L. Miller, with a $75 fine for his trash containers being 'out for collection at the wrong time or place.'

"As I've repeatedly told you, Luther L. Miller is dead — has been for nearly 30 years! On Nov. 1, 2001, after a similar notice, I told you Luther Miller has been dead since 1976. On Nov. 27, 2001 — after a second notice — I wrote that Mr. Miller was 'still dead,' and to direct all future correspondence to him at Old Stone Church Cemetery, Lewisburg, W.Va.

"On Dec. 14, 2001 — after a third letter — I wrote again, asking what part of 'dead' confused you, and sent you a certified copy of his death certificate. On Feb. 2, 2002 — after an unbelievable fourth letter — I wrote and asked if I took you to see his tombstone in Lewisburg, would that help? ...

"Now, undeterred, your unrelenting, unstoppable bureaucrats ... sent another notice to Luther L. Miller on Nov. 6, 2006."

Farewell, Rummy

The American Spectator's 2006 Robert L. Bartley dinner on Wednesday was "off-the-record," but we can tell you that outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's keynote address made clear that the United States should not abandon Iraq anytime soon.

Subsequent remarks from Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, which were filled with praise for Mr. Rumsfeld and the U.S. military (several injured Iraq war veterans were in the packed audience at the Mandarin Oriental hotel), echoed the secretary's sentiments.

Master of ceremonies Grover G. Norquist pointed out that Ronald Reagan's ultimate victory in the Cold War never came until 1991 — nearly three years after he left office. Patience, he said, being the key word.

One of our favorite lines of the evening was compliments of Michael Barone, senior writer for U.S. News & World Report, who was presented with the 2006 Barbara Olson Award. Without naming names, he touched on the probability of one potential 2008 presidential candidate "throwing her broom into the ring."

Standard role

"We didn't vote for him," write the editors of the conservative Weekly Standard magazine, but "would still like to congratulate James Webb on his victory in the Virginia Senate election."

By winning, they explain, the Democrat who defeated Republican Sen. George Allen "becomes the first-ever Weekly Standard contributor to leave private life for national political office. In fact we were more than a little amused when the National Republican Senatorial Committee ran television advertisements attacking Webb for statements he made in an essay 'The War on the Military Culture' from our Jan. 20, 1997 issue."

The essay highlighted the problems posed by the assimilation of women into the military, and on that front, at least, the editors and Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary and Republican-turned-Democrat, remain in agreement.

Minor Bach

That would be a rare concert performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's towering Mass in B Minor, led by internationally acclaimed Bach authority J. Reilly Lewis, filling the afternoon air around the Washington National Cathedral on Sunday.

"It's a monumental work that is seldom done here in the States," Lawrence Patrick Reppert, director of administration for the Cathedral Choral Society, tells Inside the Beltway. "We're dealing with 160 to 180 voices, and a full Bach orchestra."

"Bach never intended the Mass to be performed in a place as large as this cathedral, so it will really be a treat to hear it performed in such a large space," Mr. Reppert adds.

The concert begins at 4 p.m. Tickets are required ($60 sections are sold out, but $25-to-$40 seats remain) and can be obtained in advance by calling 202/537-5527, or at the door starting at 3 p.m. Sunday.

Rumsfeld's Additional Accomplishments (WP)

By Al Kamen

Seemed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had barely left his Oval Office firing ceremony when the Pentagon Web site popped up with a new feature titled "Six Years of Accomplishments" with Rummy.

First and foremost were his accomplishments in the "war on terror," where overall, military efforts "liberated 50 million people in Afghanistan and Iraq." More specifically, they've "liberated 31 million Afghans from Taliban control and destroyed Al-Qaeda sanctuary." And they've "liberated 27 million Iraqis from a brutal dictatorship and turned over sovereignty of the country to an Iraqi government."

Math, apparently, is not a strong point. Somewhere it seems they lost -- or gained -- 8 million people.Following Rumsfeld Out

Meanwhile, Rumsfeld's firing is sure to spark the departure of many of his top aides. One assistant secretary, Peter Rodman, has already moved back to the Brookings Institution -- but that was long planned, we're told.

Several others are on the endangered species list. Stephen Cambone, the undersecretary for intelligence, is surely gone. His deputy, Lt. Gen. Gerald Boykin-- famed for his memorable remark that "my God was bigger than his" and other sage observations -- won't be far behind.

Others on the various DOD departure lists include acquisitions chief Kenneth Krieg; comptroller Tina Jonas; assistant secretary Thomas W. O'Connell, who runs Special Operations and Low-Intensity Conflict; and top Rumsfeld aide Robert Rangel, though Rangel is highly regarded in the building and among some House folks.

Reporters will be watching to see if spokesman Dorrance Smith, who just beefed up his public affairs staff with a "rapid response" team to correct media lies, mischaracterizations and inaccuracies, hangs on.

When the media rebuffed press office demands for corrections or declined to publish editorials, Smith had them printed in the Pentagon's "Early Bird" compilation of important news. Not just printed, but put right at the very top.

The "war on media" produced as many as six letters or "corrections" demands in a single day on Oct. 30, five of them signed by Smith.

But in recent days, there haven't been any, which would indicate either that the media have become accurate -- a near impossibility -- or just that we've lightened up on the nearly departed.

As for Smith, oddsmakers are thinking he'll probably go after Robert Gates comes in. But we're told the White House is supportive of his efforts, and we recall that Smith worked closely with Gates on the latter's successful CIA confirmation hearings. Also, Smith is on the Bush Library board at Texas A&M, where Gates is university president; they see each other and enjoy "a more-than-cordial relationship."Financial Advice for War Zone

What Iraq really needs, World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz opined on Tuesday, is advice on rebuilding its institutions -- not just money from the international community.

"I am not saying they don't need money," Wolfowitz told the European Parliament's development committee, "but they have a lot of money on their own and it's not managed right."

"What they need is help in constructing better institutions, public financial management and advice on how to better manage the petroleum sector," he said. "Help, I believe, in how to manage social safety nets."

Of course, money management isn't easy in the middle of a war that has killed or made refugees of a huge chunk of the managerial class.

Wolfowitz said he didn't know if U.S. Mideast policy will change with the Democratic takeover of Congress. "I know that they are not going to come and ask me for my opinion," he said. That's a safe bet.

"I am not sufficiently well informed on political and security issues to give sensible advice," he added. Wolfowitz was much better informed when he predicted Iraqi oil revenue would pay for the war.

More Marines Headed To Anbar Province (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, November 17, 2006

About 2,200 Marines are headed from their ships in the Persian Gulf to an undisclosed location in Iraq's western Anbar province to help shore up U.S. combat power in an area riddled with insurgent violence.

The move, intended as a short-term measure, is evidence of the severity of the conflict in Anbar. The insurgency is entrenched and well-organized in a province where U.S. soldiers and Marines are being killed almost daily.

Maj. Matt McLaughlin, a spokesman for U.S. Central Command, said Thursday that members of the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit were "in the process of transitioning and moving" from their ships to a transit point for deployment to Anbar. He said he could not discuss specifics of their mission or exact destination.

It will be the unit's third tour in Iraq. It participated in the initial invasion in March 2003 and returned in March 2005.

A Marine expeditionary unit typically is organized as a combined arms team. That means it includes infantry, armor and artillery, as well as a helicopter squadron and a small number of AV-8B Harrier fighter jets.

The move was disclosed on Wednesday by Gen. John Abizaid during testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee. He said he approved the deployment "to help address" concerns expressed by Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, who commands all U.S. forces in Anbar. Abizaid did not elaborate. Zilmer's staff has indicated in recent months that an increase in troop levels could help the fight against the insurgency in Anbar.

Abizaid acknowledged, when pressed during questioning by senators, that Anbar is not under the control of U.S. or Iraqi forces. He said the security problem in Baghdad was even worse and that Anbar's problems therefore must be deemed secondary to suppressing the sectarian violence in the capital.

There already are about 30,000 U.S. troops in Anbar, which includes the trouble spots of Fallujah and Ramadi. The province stretches west from Baghdad to the borders with Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

In all of Iraq there are about 141,000 U.S. troops.

When U.S. commanders decided to step up security efforts in Baghdad last summer, they moved forces into the capital from elsewhere in Iraq; one combat unit was shifted from Rawah, a restive town in Anbar.

The 15th MEU was aboard ships in the Gulf as part of a normal deployment that included recently participating in exercises with the Indian navy.

It had been designated by Abizaid as a reserve force for Iraq, to be tapped in the event circumstances required a temporary boost in combat power. Until recently an Army combat brigade also had been held in reserve in Kuwait; it also was sent into Iraq to bolster security.

Contractor's Boss In Iraq Shot At Civilians, Workers' Suit Says (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

CAMP FALLUJA, Iraq, Nov. 16 — Two former employees of an American private military contracting company have claimed in a Virginia court that they witnessed their supervisor deliberately shoot at Iraqi vehicles and civilians this summer, and that the company fired them for reporting the incidents.

The allegations, made in a lawsuit filed in Fairfax County Circuit Court, say Triple Canopy, one of the largest private military contractors to work with the United States in Iraq, retaliated against the men for reporting that the supervisor had committed violent felonies, and perhaps murder, on the job.

The lawsuit also claims that Triple Canopy's management blacklisted the men in the private military contracting industry, rendering them unemployable in the lucrative trade of providing private security in Iraq.

The suit was filed in late July. A motion by Triple Canopy to dismiss it in full was rejected by the judge last month. On Thursday, the court set a trial date for next summer.

In response to an inquiry, a spokesperson for Triple Canopy issued a statement on Thursday from the company's headquarters in Herndon, Va., outside Washington.

"Triple Canopy requires all employees to maintain the highest professional and ethical standards in every aspect of their work, including in high-threat environments such as Iraq," the statement said. "Out of respect for our judicial system and all those involved, Triple Canopy does not comment on ongoing litigation."

Triple Canopy, founded by former Delta Force commandos in 2003, is one of several young companies that support military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and other countries.

In the suit, the former employees — Shane B. Schmidt, a former Marine Corps sniper, and Charles L. Sheppard III, a former Army Ranger — claim that on July 8 their shift leader fired deliberately and unnecessarily at Iraqi vehicles and civilians in two incidents while their team was driving in Baghdad.

Their job that day, the suit says, was to pick up an employee of KBR, a subsidiary of the Halliburton Company that is involved in construction in Iraq, at the Baghdad airport.

In the suit and in telephone interviews, however, the men said that their shift leader, who was scheduled to leave Iraq the next day, was determined to kill before he left Baghdad. (The shift leader, a former American serviceman from Oklahoma, was not named in the suit.) The first incident occurred about 2:15 p.m., the suit says, when their vehicle approached the airport entrance.

Their shift leader, the suit claims, announced that he was "going to kill someone today," stepped from his vehicle and fired several shots from his M4 assault rifle into the windshield of a stopped white truck.

The men claim that the truck was not an evident threat and that their team was not in danger. The men say in the suit that the shift leader then returned to their truck and said, "That didn't happen, understand."

Later that day, the suit says, the shift leader said, "I've never shot anyone with my pistol before," and then opened the vehicle door and fired seven or eight shots into the windshield of a taxi.

Neither of the plaintiffs, in telephone interviews, said he knew for certain what injuries had been suffered by civilians in the two vehicles that had been shot at by their shift leader. In each case, they said, their own vehicle drove away quickly after the shift leader fired.

Both men said that the shift leader had told them that if they reported the shootings they would be fired, and that they feared that the shift leader, whom they regarded as unstable, was dangerous to them.

Nevertheless, on July 10, the day after the shift leader left Iraq, the two men reported the shootings to Triple Canopy's senior supervisors in the country, the lawsuit says, adding that retaliation was swift.

"Immediately after making the report, Plaintiff Sheppard was pulled from duty and suspended," the suit claims. "Plaintiff Schmidt was suspended the following day. Within a week the plaintiffs were terminated as a result of having reported the Shift Leader's unlawful conduct."

Both men had been paid $500 a day by Triple Canopy for their work in Iraq, the suit says. Since then, they claim to have been blacklisted.

Both men seek lost earnings and damages, said their lawyer, Patricia A. Smith.

U.S. Contractor Fired On Iraqi Vehicles For Sport, Suit Alleges (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A man who worked in Iraq for a Herndon-based security company is accused in a lawsuit of firing twice into Iraqi civilian vehicles last summer without provocation, possibly killing at least one person.

Two co-workers who witnessed the shootings say in the suit that there has been no investigation, even though they reported the incidents.

All three men worked for Triple Canopy, a corporation formed in 2003 by former military men to provide security in the Middle East for the United States government and private companies. Triple Canopy was the ninth-largest contractor for the U.S. State Department in fiscal 2005, with payments totaling more than $90 million, government records show.

That sum does not include what Triple Canopy is paid by private firms such as KBR, formerly Kellogg, Brown & Root, a subsidiary of Halliburton Co. that is involved in rebuilding in Iraq. Former Army Ranger Shane Schmidt, former Marine Charles L. Sheppard III and their shift leader were all working on an assignment for KBR when the shootings occurred near Baghdad on July 8, alleges the suit, filed in Fairfax County Circuit Court.

Schmidt and Sheppard say they reported the shootings to Triple Canopy. Instead of investigating, the men allege, Triple Canopy fired them and prevented their being hired by other companies in the Middle East. The lawsuit alleges wrongful termination and wrongful interference with their professional future.

Triple Canopy and KBR declined comment on the suit. Defense Department officials did not respond to numerous inquiries, and State Department officials said they were unaware of the incidents that are being alleged.

Schmidt and Sheppard allege that Triple Canopy did not report the shootings to KBR or the government. They say that no one has ever contacted them about the shootings.

In court papers, Triple Canopy has not denied that the incidents occurred. The company has tried to have the case dismissed on the grounds that no violation of Virginia law occurred and that Schmidt and Sheppard were "at-will" employees and could be fired for any reason.

At a hearing last month, Fairfax Circuit Court Judge M. Langhorne Keith said the state's "at-will" legal doctrine has exceptions, including "when people allege that they reported a murder, two murders or maybe more than two murders, conducted by a fellow employee, and were fired for making that report."

The lawsuit does not name the person accused of the shootings, a shift leader. Schmidt and Sheppard's attorney, Patricia A. Smith of Alexandria, declined to name the man. The case is scheduled to go to trial July 30.

Smith said Schmidt and Sheppard were not available for interviews yesterday. Schmidt lives in Herndon, and Sheppard resides in Destin, Fla. Both have private security jobs in this country, far removed from the high-adrenaline, $500-a-day work they did for years in Iraq and Afghanistan, Smith said.

Schmidt was a Marine from 1995 to 2003 and was one of the first Marines deployed to Afghanistan, Smith said. He began working for Triple Canopy in Iraq in 2004.

Sheppard served in the Army from 1995 to 2002, including time as a Ranger, and was deployed in Albania and Kosovo. He worked in Iraq and Qatar for other private security companies and began working for Triple Canopy in April.

"These guys are tremendously experienced and well-respected in the field," Smith said. They assert that Triple Canopy has given other companies false reasons for firing them.

On July 8, according to their lawsuit, Schmidt and Sheppard were riding with their shift leader in a convoy to pick up a KBR employee at the Baghdad airport.

As their vehicle approached the airport, their shift leader declared that he was "going to kill someone today," the lawsuit states. The man then stepped out of the vehicle and fired several shots from his M4 rifle into the windshield of a stopped truck.

Schmidt and Sheppard were horrified, Smith said. According to the lawsuit, the shift leader told them, "That didn't happen, understand?"

After their convoy picked up the KBR employee, the crew headed to its next destination. At this point, Schmidt and Sheppard allege, their shift leader declared, "I've never shot anyone with my pistol before." The man then opened his door and fired seven or eight rounds into the windshield of a nearby taxi. Schmidt and Sheppard later heard that a cabdriver was found shot to death in the area, according to the suit.

Schmidt and Sheppard initially hesitated to report the two seemingly unprovoked shootings, especially because their supervisor told them that they would be fired if they did, their lawsuit claims. The men also feared for their safety, they said.

But the next day, the shift leader was returned to the United States at the end of his three-month contract, Smith said. The two men reported the shootings, were suspended, then were fired. Smith said Triple Canopy told them they were fired for not reporting the shootings quickly enough. Schmidt asserts that when he asked who was investigating the incidents, Triple Canopy told him no one was investigating.

Smith said she does not know how many people might have been wounded or killed in the shootings. She said that Schmidt and Sheppard could not see into the truck that was fired on but that they did see a cabdriver in the second vehicle.

Attempts to oversee American contractors in Iraq, including the thousands who have been hired to provide security, have "gone from completely absent to spotty," said Peter W. Singer, a specialist in warfare and the Middle East at the Brookings Institution. Most oversight is focused on how U.S. money is spent, Singer said. But as to the regulating of contractors' conduct, "that part of the discussion is pretty much missing still."

Fallujah Now A Safe Haven For Sunnis (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

Some 30 Sunni refugees seeking a safe haven from Baghdad sit under the shade of a camouflage net on the outskirts of Fallujah, waiting at a makeshift U.S. facility for city IDs.

A skinny young man with a red and white scarf wound around his head pulls a reporter aside and lifts his right pant leg, exposing a shin with marks where Shiite militiamen had bored into the bone with an electric drill — the current tool of choice for Baghdad torture specialists.

Security is tight and snipers abound, but Fallujah — once an extremely violent Sunni insurgent bastion where the charred bodies of four Blackwater security men were hung on a bridge — has become a refuge from the death squads and mortar battles in Baghdad. U.S. Marines say about 150 Iraqis flee here each week from the capital, 40 miles to the east.

Unlike Baghdad, which houses large numbers of both Muslim sects, Fallujah's population is overwhelmingly Sunni Arab. As a result, Fallujah has not experienced the raging sectarian warfare that has the capital teetering on the brink of civil war. The migration is part of a larger exodus out of Baghdad, where entire neighborhoods have been uprooted.

Population figures in Iraq are little more than estimates, but Fallujah was said to have about 450,000 residents before U.S. forces stormed the city in November 2004 to drive out the insurgents. As the assault gained force nearly 400,000 of that number had fled, but the Americans say there are about 300,000 living in the city now.

Two years after the U.S. attack on Fallujah, Marine Col. Lawrence Nicholson takes rightful pride in what he and his men have done since taking over.

Nicholson strides the stony ground here in snappy camouflage fatigues, his dog tag secured under the laces of his left boot. He doesn't slip into his flak jacket but instead assaults the bulletproof vest, wrestles it on, then walks off with the slightly bowlegged gait of a man just off a horse.

"This is the club. Welcome to our country club, our gated community," the 51-year-old Toronto native said with a grin during a tour of the city Wednesday.

But if Fallujah were a hospital patient, it would still be in intensive care. Two city council members and the council president have been assassinated since February. At least 30 police officers were gunned down this summer. The mayor fled in July.

Reconstruction of the city, ruined in the Marine assault, is in progress but far from complete.

There's no bustle on the main street, and not much to bustle to. Unemployment is well above 50 percent. The cement factories are only now struggling back to life.

A reporter who tried to step outdoors during a city council meeting — part of the tour — was grabbed by the arm and pulled back inside by Marines who warned of snipers right in the center of the city.

Nicholson and his 5,000 Marines of Regimental Combat Team 5 have Fallujah sealed — the incoming roads at least — with what they call ECPs, or entry control points, manned by Americans, Iraqi army soldiers and Iraqi police. As a result, a long line of cars stretches at Fallujah's eastern reaches. The Americans said they have reduced the wait to drive into the city to about 40 minutes since the ECPs were put in place several months ago. It looked like a much longer wait.

In order to get in, everyone must carry a U.S.-issued ID card proving he or she is a resident and registered to live in the city. Weapons are banned in Fallujah, by law if not in fact.

At one point, Nicholson strode in to begin directing traffic himself, then pulled a local Iraqi policeman — a Sunni Muslim — together with an Iraqi soldier — a Shiite — and asked them if there were any problems between them. The men, from the rival sects whose religious-based conflict is tearing apart central Iraq, assured the colonel all was well.

Nicholson smiled and shook his head in a "Didn't I tell you so?" gesture.

He was seriously wounded the same day he took control of RCT 5 shortly before the Marine assault in November 2004. He missed the Fallujah operation but has returned and surrounded himself with an impressive team of junior officers to whip the place into shape.

His command comes across like a squad of corporate turnaround specialists sent to a troubled regional hub of some Fortune 500 company. They are smart, well-groomed rising stars of the Marine Corps — specialists in Sunni tribal affairs, linguists, organizational experts.

Nicholson — wiry and ruddy-faced with the look of a street brawler — keeps a tight rein on Fallujah and its townspeople. He understands their deep ambivalence about the U.S. forces that keep the peace.

"The average person here would tell us to 'Get the hell out of my city — but not just yet,' " the colonel said.

So while he's here, Nicholson is a nonstop dynamo — here, there, everywhere, or so he would have the Fallujans believe.

His men call him the mayor of the town. The real mayor is Jassim al-Bedawi, who took over from a predecessor who fled to Jordan this summer under threat of death.

Al-Bedawi, a lawyer, looks like a bit like Burt Reynolds in his younger days — the same white-toothed grin under a he-man mustache. He took Nicholson to task at the latest city council meeting for closing a bridge over the Euphrates River.

They call it the new bridge here. The old bridge, built in 1937, is now called the Blackwater Bridge. It's where insurgents hung the bodies of the four security men who were killed in the city in March 2004.

Al-Bedawi complained that the heavy security and closed new bridge were jamming traffic, blocking deliveries of necessary goods such as canisters of cooking gas.

Nicholson stood as if at attention in front of his chair along the wall of the City Council chamber, listening but shaking his head side to side. He said he would check but countered that there had been too many attacks on the Iraqi army at the new bridge.

He didn't say no, but he didn't offer much hope.

Only 12 of 20 council members showed up this week, obviously not keen to journey through town to a meeting that so closely associates them with the Americans.

The colonel calls the council "our dysfunctional family, but our family nevertheless."

"We preach Team Fallujah constantly ... that we're all in this together," the 26-year Marine veteran said. "But in the end we have to tell them it is their choice, what they want it to look like when we're gone."

Through the daylong tour a reporter observed, Nicholson shook as many Iraqi hands as he could, and introduced his visitors to both town dignitaries and men in the street — clearly unafraid of what the locals would say about his work.

And in short goodbye remarks, Nicholson smiled and said, "I hope you got a sense of what the average Omar is thinking."

Then he spun on his heel and barked out some orders.

Democrats See Improved Electoral Map (WSJ)

By John Harwood

DEMOCRATS SEE improved electoral map as 2008 field expands.

House Democratic campaign chief Emanuel touts gains among suburbanites and higher-income voters -- Democrats won among those earning $50,000 to $100,000. Republican consultant Steve Lombardo, citing Democratic advances among Catholics, says "only another election or two" can prove staying power of such trends.

Sen. Dodd of Connecticut, who may join Democratic nomination race, calls for "New Age of Idealism." His annual Williamsburg retreat for supporters attracts greater interest given his 2008 aspirations and ascension to Senate Banking chairmanship.

Democrats hold most congressional seats in states with 303 electoral votes, strategist Mark Gersh says.

ENERGY INTERESTS SPLIT on lame-duck drilling legislation.

Industry, agriculture and labor groups seek House passage of Senate's offshore drilling bill, which would send measure to Bush's desk. "We've got a bird in the hand," says Jack Gerard of American Chemistry Council.

Some companies hold out for more ambitious House bill, which would allow states such as Virginia to opt out of anti-drilling moratoria. Robert Slaughter of National Petrochemical and Refiners Association says "it will be difficult" to get Democratic majorities to revisit the issue later.

HEADHUNTING: Republicans confront loss of power -- and paychecks.

Defeated lawmakers search for new paths; some expect outgoing Indiana Rep. Hostettler to become a minister. Ousted Republicans should be "rich...or ready for retirement," one surviving lawmaker says, since "there are not going to be a lot of association head or lobbying jobs" in Washington.

Rumors swirl that outgoing Speaker Hastert may be Tokyo-bound, as Democratic predecessor Foley once was. Hastert, who speaks Japanese, isn't seeking a leadership post and may quit Congress altogether.

Nine of 24 Republicans on House Ways and Means Committee won't return in next Congress.

TURNABOUT: Moderate Democratic group Third Way touts increasing public receptivity toward gay rights, two years after Bush profited from anti-marriage stance. In post-election Zogby International poll, nearly two-thirds of voters support legal recognition for gay and lesbian couples. Although gay-marriage bans passed in seven states, they "have lost their impact as a wedge issue," argues Third Way's Rachel Laser. Arizonans defeated such a ban.

ADMINISTRATION DOWNPLAYS usefulness of talking to Iran and Syria about Iraq. Although Baker-Hamilton group, top Democrats and Britain's Blair recommend talks, Secretary of State Rice insists Iran or Syria would demand concessions and couldn't cure Iraq's rising sectarian violence.

INTRAMURAL FIGHT? Texas Democrat Jackson-Lee is in line to chair House immigration subcommittee, but draws criticism over her sometimes-combative style and may face competition for the post from California Rep. Lofgren. Immigration groups steer clear of debate. Iowa's Steve King, among the most vocal House opponents of immigration, is subcommittee's ranking Republican.

PARTY POOPER? Telecom bar association's annual holiday-season Chairman's dinner is nixed because FCC chief Martin won't show up; some lawyers fret he wants to kill it altogether. Last year's event attracted about 1,500 guests and raised $43,000 for scholarships. The bar association will try a springtime version next year.

VIETNAM TRADE STUMBLE catches White House by surprise.

Red-faced Trade Representative Schwab, in Hanoi, is forced to parse congressional procedures after trade pact wins majority but falls short of two-thirds required under special parliamentary rules. "Getting this through Congress was a huge deal" for Vietnam, an administration official says amid Bush's Asia trip.

Textile lobbyist Augustine Tantillo says misfire underscores spread of "cold feet" among lawmakers about free trade. North Carolina Republican Rep. Robin Hayes, whose dead-heat re-election race remains undecided, chides party leaders for bringing up the measure so soon after the election.

West Coast senators express reservations on concessions to textile-state lawmakers, fearing impact on U.S. exporters.

MINOR MEMOS: D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton can't vote on House floor as representative of federal enclave, but may chair Transportation subcommittee in new Congress...Incoming Transportation Committee Chair Oberstar, facing uncharacteristically packed news conference, likens himself to the Bible's Joshua, "who did enter the Promised Land."

Soldier Gets 90 Years In Rape, Killing Of Iraqi Girl (WP)

By Josh White

An Army specialist who admitted that he and a group of other U.S. soldiers raped a 14-year-old girl and killed her and her family in an Iraqi village was sentenced to 90 years in prison yesterday, by far the longest sentence for a U.S. soldier in connection with the death of an Iraqi civilian since the war began in 2003.

Spec. James P. Barker, 23, could be eligible for parole in 20 years, as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors that spares him the possibility of a death sentence. Barker has indicated he will testify against other soldiers in the case, some of whom face the death penalty.

Barker yesterday became one of 16 U.S. troops sentenced to prison time for the deaths of Iraqi civilians during the war, and he received a sentence of more than three times the length of the next-longest sentence in any case that has concluded. Two soldiers are serving 25-year sentences in unrelated homicide cases.

Also yesterday, Marine Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in the death of an Iraqi man near Hamdaniyah. As part of a deal, he was sentenced to 21 months in prison.

The slaying of the girl, Abier Kassim Hamzah Rashid al Janabi, on March 12 was particularly shocking because it had no connection to military combat operations and was carefully planned by soldiers who had spotted her while patrolling the Mahmudiyah area weeks before. The girl's father, mother and young sister were also killed, and soldiers set the teenager's body on fire to try to conceal the crime.

In a nine-page document that provides chilling details of the case, Barker confessed to plotting the attack on Abier with other soldiers as they played cards and drank whiskey mixed with a carbonated energy drink. The soldiers donned disguises, cut through chain-link fences and sneaked into the house, planning to kill everyone inside, according to the document.

The soldiers alternated holding Abier down on the floor while raping her, according to the document.

Another soldier, former Pfc. Steven D. Green, herded Abier's family members into a bedroom before shooting them, according to Barker's account. Green then raped and killed Abier, according to the document.

"I want the people of Iraq to know that I did not go there to do the terrible things that I did," Barker said in court, the Associated Press reported. "I do not ask anyone to forgive me today."

Barker said he became "angry and mean" as a way to survive in the austere and dangerous conditions where he served south of Baghdad, and as a result he began to hate everyone in Iraq.

Attorneys for Barker have argued that he was under extreme pressure and emotional distress while working in the Yusufiyah area, an insurgent stronghold where U.S. forces faced daily attacks and were severely understaffed. David Sheldon, Barker's civilian attorney, said he believes his client's sentence should make it difficult for prosecutors to get the death penalty against the other soldiers.

"Specialist Barker took responsibility for his actions and has expressed sincere remorse for his conduct," Sheldon said. "This sends a clear message to the government that it will be difficult to obtain a death sentence against any of the defendants, including Pfc. Green."

U.S. Airstrikes Climb Sharply In Afghanistan (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

The Air Force has conducted more than 2,000 airstrikes in Afghanistan over the past six months, a sharp increase in bombing that reflects the growing demand for American air cover since NATO has assumed a larger ground combat role, Air Force officials said.

The intensifying air campaign has focused on southern Afghanistan, where NATO units, primarily from Britain, Canada and the Netherlands, as well as American Special Forces have been engaging in the heaviest and most frequent ground combat with Taliban rebels since the invasion five years ago.

The NATO forces are mostly operating without heavy armor or artillery support, and as Taliban resistance has continued, more air support has been used to compensate for the lightness of the units, Air Force officials said. Most of the strikes have come during “close air support” missions, where the bombers patrol the area and respond to calls from ground units in combat rather than performing planned strikes.

On a recent 11-hour mission that included a reporter for The New York Times, a B-1 bomber orbited at 20,000 feet, responding to radio calls from American and Canadian troops who asked the plane to use its radar to watch for insurgent forces and to be prepared to drop bombs.

On a separate mission last week, a bomber dropped its entire payload of eight 2,000-pound bombs and six 500-pound bombs after ground units called for help, Air Force officials said.

One B-1 pilot, Lt. Col. Tim Schepper, said that when troops called for airstrikes, “There are times when you can hear the gunfire and R.P.G.’s over the radio in the background, and that’s when you know you have helped keep them alive.” An R.P.G. is a rocket-propelled grenade.

To carry out the heavier mission load, the Air Force’s entire complement of B-1 bombers was shifted over the summer from the British air base at Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean to a Middle Eastern airfield closer to Afghanistan. The new basing arrangement shortens the flying time to Afghanistan by two hours, allowing bombers to remain overhead for longer periods between refueling by aerial tankers.

Air Force officials said they were prohibited from disclosing the location because of sensitivities by the host country about disclosing the extent of its cooperation with the American military.

Lt. Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, has promised to bring stability and win support among Afghan civilians by focusing primarily on economic development and avoiding combat. But the resurgence of the Taliban has made that difficult. NATO forces have established numerous small bases and sent out extended patrols in small formations and with little or no heavy armor and artillery. And NATO has also lacked a reserve force that can be shifted quickly to hot spots, though Poland has promised to send more troops to fulfill that role.

The 2,095 attacks by American aircraft since June is many times greater than the number of airstrikes in Iraq, where the terrain and nature of the conflict are less susceptible to bombing campaigns. There have been only 88 attacks by American aircraft in Iraq since June, according to Air Force figures. Unlike in Afghanistan, insurgents in Iraq are largely in urban areas and do not often mass in groups large enough to warrant use of airstrikes, Air Force commanders said.

The increase in total munitions dropped has also been substantial. This year in Afghanistan, American aircraft have dropped 987 bombs and fired more than 146,000 cannon rounds and bullets in strafing runs, more than was expended in both categories from the beginning of the American-led invasion in 2001 through 2004, the Air Force said. During those years, a total of 848 bombs and just over 119,000 bullets were used by aircraft, according to Air Force figures.

On the B-1 flight last week that included a reporter, Colonel Schepper and his two-man crew received a radio call from a Canadian soldier at an isolated base near the town of Tarin Kowt, who asked the aircraft to stand by for potential attacks on insurgent forces. A few hours later, the bomber crew received a similar radio message from an American Special Forces soldier, who warned that Taliban attacks on his position had been frequent. “We’ve had contact every day this week,” said the soldier, who could not be identified under military rules. “As sure as the day is long, we’ll have more.”

The surge in recent airstrikes coincided with NATO moving into the south over the summer, a period when Taliban attacks also increased. Much of the bombing in September was conducted during several major NATO ground operations against concentrations of Taliban fighters. But the number of air attacks has stayed high, reaching 397 in October, and is expected to remain at comparable levels this month, according to Air Force commanders.

In Afghanistan the increased use of air power has also come at a cost in casualties among allied forces and civilians. In September, an American A-10 attack jet mistakenly opened fire on Canadian troops southwest of Kandahar, killing one and wounding dozens more.

Later that month, a nighttime NATO air attack involving an AC-130 gunship killed 31 civilians, most of whom were shepherds, a joint NATO and Afghan investigation concluded recently. The civilians were killed as they fled their tents with their wives and children after a NATO bomb struck a nearby compound, killing 20 Taliban fighters. There have also been increased reports of damage or destruction to mosques and other civilian buildings and property.

In addition to dropping bombs, Air Force jets are increasingly being called on to provide ground forces with intelligence about possible insurgent forces in their vicinity, using infrared cameras, radar and other surveillance equipment.

While the B-1 has proven useful in Afghanistan because of its large fuel tanks and bomb-carrying capacity, the planes’ 30-year-old electronics have sometimes been a liability.

On the recent 11-hour mission, the B-1 crew had to inform ground troops several times that the plane’s radar could not deliver the detailed picture of ground activity they wanted and that many fighter jets and other aircraft equipped with more modern surveillance equipment could provide.

During the mission, one American soldier called up to say that his unit was holding a memorial ceremony for a soldier who had been killed several days earlier in combat. Trying to detect any possible ambushes of the service, he asked whether the plane could see whether there were any “military-age males” with weapons nearby — a request beyond the capabilities of the B-1’s electronics, the crew told him. So he requested that the B-1 perform a “show of force,” a low-level pass meant to frighten any fighters nearby.

Colonel Schepper dropped the jet steeply from 20,000 feet to around 8,000 feet and roared over the soldiers’ position, releasing flares to heighten the effect of the fly-by.

On the plane’s radio, the soldier voiced a simple response: “Beautiful, beautiful, beautiful.”

Army Retooling Itself To Fight Counterinsurgency Wars (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

FORT LEAVENWORTH, Kan. - At this historic Army post on a bluff overlooking the Missouri River, the Army has mounted an intense effort to train its soldiers how to fight insurgents more effectively in Iraq, Afghanistan and beyond.

Fort Leavenworth is where all-black regiments known as "buffalo soldiers" once galloped off to police the American frontier. Later generations here studied how to defeat Soviet tank divisions. Now the United States Army Combined Arms Center has retooled the Army's leadership and training programs to focus on what motivates insurgents, the strategies and tactics they use and the cultures in which they operate.

The shift away from major combat operations to irregular warfare is one of the most significant changes in doctrine and training the Army has undertaken since World War II.

"It's a big change for our Army," said Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the Iraq war veteran who commands the Combined Arms Center. "Although we have done lots of counterinsurgency operations over the years, historically we have, as an institution, tended to refocus on major combat operations, the big battles, after each of our counterinsurgency operations was over."

The last time the U.S. Army fought a major counterinsurgency war was 40 years ago in Vietnam. The Army fought a smaller counterinsurgency war in El Salvador in the 1980s and intervened in Somalia, Haiti and the Balkans in the 1990s. But the Army's primary focus remained winning an all-out conventional war in Europe against the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact.

Irregular war and stability operations were considered lesser tasks that required little preparation or practice.

Large-scale war remained the Army's focus even after the invasion of Iraq in 2003. Since then, however, that focus has changed as it's become clear that Iraq and Afghanistan are part of a long guerrilla struggle that could last decades.

"One of the light bulbs that's come on in the last year or so is to no longer accept the notion that ... if you can do high-end major combat operations and you've got a disciplined force, then you can do this other stuff," Petraeus said. "But that's not the case. If you want to do this other stuff, then you've got to train for it."

"The greater goal is to help our Army truly be a learning organization, one that is adapting in response to the challenges we face in the long war (and) one that strives to ensure basic combat competence, but also a degree of confidence in a number of the other tasks that our soldiers are asked to perform," Petraeus said.

That means preparing soldiers for everything from high-intensity combat to peacekeeping and reconstruction. Soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan can be asked to hunt down insurgents one day, guard polling stations another and rebuild schools the next.

Waging a successful counterinsurgency war means that military commanders must be prepared to carry out all those missions at once, while taking into account what political and economic effects their actions will have, officials say.

"Sometimes the best action is inaction," said Clinton J. Ancker, III, the director of the Combined Arms Center Doctrine Directorate. "It's a very difficult job balancing the application of force."

Lessons such as that are at the heart of the changes the Combined Arms Center is helping to make across the Army and other services.

A team from the Army and the Marine Corps are writing the military's first counterinsurgency field manual in 20 years. A main theme is that military action is only a means to a political end.

"This manual is as much about the next fight in the GWOT (global war on terrorism)," said Ancker, who's overseeing the project. "It's not solely about the one we're in now."

At the Army's three large training centers - Fort Irwin, Calif., Fort Polk, La. and Hohenfels, Germany - soldiers now train in mock Iraqi and Afghan villages.

The exercises involve hundreds of Arab and Afghan American role players. Soldiers are given a number of missions to accomplish while fending off improvised explosive and sniper attacks. Whether they succeed depends on the relationships they establish with the villagers.

Basic trainees at Army bases in Georgia, South Carolina, Kentucky, Missouri and Oklahoma now learn how to spot and avoid roadside bombs, react to ambushes on their convoys and train with local security forces.

Hundreds of additional students enroll annually in Arabic, Pashtun and other languages at the Defense Language Institute in Monterey, Calif. And any soldier can download a course in Arabic from the Army's Web site for free.

Computer specialists at Fort Leavenworth's Battle Command Knowledge System run three dozen online forums where soldiers in the field can share information.

Books on al-Qaida, militant Islam, Iraqi and Afghan history and the Muslim world are now required reading for majors and lieutenant colonels at the Army Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth. There also are courses on Middle East culture and on Islam. A week is devoted to the study of irregular warfare.

"We can't make them a cultural expert in every culture that exists over there," said Russ Crumrine, a Middle East specialist who teaches there. "But the key is to get them thinking about what they need to know and how they might apply it."

The odds are that every student at the college will be serving in combat within weeks of graduation. The faculty wants to ensure that these officers will think about the cultural effects of what they do in Iraq or Afghanistan.

"No officer would ever plan an operation without studying the terrain," said John Cary, who also teaches Middle East studies. "Now, no officer would ever plan an operation without studying the human terrain."

The Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth has nine organizations involved in doctrine and leadership development, training and battle command. The center oversees field exercises at posts in California, Louisiana and Germany and training programs at another 11 schools, ranging from combat arms to military intelligence and foreign language study.

The Center also is home to the Army Command and General Staff College, a key school for mid-level officers, and the Center for Army Lessons Learned, which collects, analyzes and distributes the latest insights and observations from the battlefield. Officials describe the Center at as one of the Army's "engines of change."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bush Administration To Ease Corporate-Fraud Rules, People Say (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt
Bloomberg, November 17, 2006

Nov. 17 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Justice Department plans to make it harder for prosecutors to force companies to waive their legal rights in plea negotiations to avoid indictment, people familiar with the plan said.

The proposed changes address concerns that companies are being asked unfairly to reveal confidential talks with their lawyers and cut off legal support for employees under investigation, the people said. Businesses, lawmakers and federal judges have complained that the department rules adopted in the wake of corporate accounting scandals in 2001 and 2002 erode the rights of companies and employees.

``This is a policy issue that needs to be addressed and there has been a lot of criticism from a lot of different directions," said former Justice Department official George Terwilliger, a partner at the White & Case law firm in Washington. ``There is also a recognition that we need to be careful how we tinker with the engine of commerce."

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty is likely to announce the revised policy in a speech early next month, the people said. They stressed that the changes won't be dramatic and are still being debated within the department.

McNulty, who also heads President George W. Bush's corporate fraud task force, hasn't signed off on the proposed changes, the people said. He was traveling and unavailable for comment.

``We want to get it right," McNulty told a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in September. ``We don't want to do something that is inappropriate or unreasonable."

Protecting the Public

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the rules are under review and any changes would be in accord with ``safeguarding the integrity of our financial institutions" and ``the public interest."

The policy in question -- originally outlined in a 2003 memo by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson -- offers leniency to companies that cooperate with prosecutors. It suggests that companies can benefit by waiving attorney-client privilege and by not paying the legal bills of ``culpable employees."

Because an indictment is often fatal for a company, corporate lawyers are under pressure to meet almost any government demand to avoid charges. That has made the memo a rallying point for companies who say the policy amounts to coercion to settle with the government.

Arthur Andersen LLP, one of the so-called Big Five accounting firms with 85,000 employees, collapsed after it was indicted for destroying documents related to its work for Enron. The U.S. Supreme Court in 2005 overturned the conviction, too late to save the firm.

Coalition of Critics

Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who will give up his Judiciary Committee chairmanship in January, plans to introduce legislation that would compel the Justice Department to overhaul the Thompson memo. A coalition that includes the Washington-based U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Chicago-based American Bar Association and the New York-based American Civil Liberties Union has spearheaded the attack on the memo.

The incoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, has also expressed support for changing the guidelines.

The Justice Department's proposed revisions to the Thompson memo are intended to address its critics, who include three former attorneys general, the people familiar with the matter said.

One of the changes, they said, would require prosecutors to get approval from the attorney general or his top deputy before seeking a waiver of attorney-client privilege.

Each of the 93 U.S. attorneys' offices across the country has its own policy now on asking for the waivers, leading companies to complain there is no uniformity and giving prosecutors a free hand in demanding confidential material.

`A Significant Step'

``Taking the step of requiring approval in Washington would be a significant step," said Michael Horowitz, a former chief of staff in the Justice Department's criminal division and now a partner with the Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft law firm in Washington. It would force prosecutors to justify their actions to their superiors, he said.

Another proposed revision would say companies won't be penalized for refusing to reveal confidential talks with their attorneys, the people said. They could still waive the privilege and get credit for cooperation, the people said.

The Justice Department also is considering deleting the language referring to legal fees for ``culpable employees," they said. Several federal judges have questioned that provision, including one in New York who in June ruled that the practice violated the rights of former KPMG LLP executives being tried on charges of selling illegal tax shelters. The Justice Department has appealed.

Some Critics Want More

Some critics of the current guidelines want a more drastic overhaul.

``We've built a heck of a lot of momentum, and we don't want this problem to resurface," said Susan Hackett, senior vice president of the Association of Corporate Counsel, a Washington- based group. The Justice Department is ``trying to throw a train off the tracks" by proposing only minor changes, she said.

The Justice Department says the guidelines are vital to speed investigations and help protect investors. The agency also maintains that companies often take the initiative in waiving attorney-client privilege and cutting off support for employees.

``Most corporations want out from the dark clouds of criminal wrongdoing as quickly as possible," McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee in September.

Ken Lay's Death Spurs Senate Bill To Allow Convictions To Stand (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The death of former Enron Corp. chief executive Kenneth Lay prompted Senate lawmakers to introduce legislation Thursday that would end the practice of dismissing convictions of defendants who die before an appeal is final.

The bill by Senate Judiciary Committee members Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat from California, and Jeff Sessions, a Republican from Alabama, was written with help from the Justice Department, which had sought changes after Mr. Lay's death on July 5.

Mr. Lay died just weeks after being convicted on criminal charges including securities and bank fraud; a federal district court judge in Houston dismissed the convictions in October. Under current U.S. law, criminal convictions are tossed out when defendants such as Mr. Lay die before they exhaust their right to an appeal.

"We need to ensure that, in these types of cases, hard-won convictions are preserved and restitution remains available for the victims of crime," Ms. Feinstein said in a statement on the legislation.

Mr. Sessions noted that Mr. Lay's trial took months and cost taxpayers millions. In such cases, he said "it is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch."

Messrs. Feinstein and Sessions said the Justice Department supports the "principles" contained in the bill. A Justice Department spokesman wasn't immediately available to comment. Samuel Buffone, an attorney for Mr. Lay in Washington, D.C., declined to comment, saying he hadn't seen the legislation.

Mr. Lay's case not only inspired the bill but would be covered by it, as the legislation would apply to all cases or appeals pending as of July 1, 2006.

As written, the bill would end the practice of vacating convictions in such cases and establish new procedures that would allow some cases to continue. While it would forbid imposing further criminal punishment on deceased defendants, the bill would permit the government to continue to press for -- and collect -- other relief, such as restitution to victims of financial frauds. The bill sets a process to ensure that after a person convicted of a crime dies, a representative of his estate can stand in his place to challenge or appeal his conviction, and secure a lawyer. In cases where a criminal forfeiture action was filed in an effort to obtain assets linked to the defendant's crimes, the bill would give the government two years after a defendant's death to seek to recover the same assets by filing a parallel civil forfeiture lawsuit.

Lay's Death Leads Senators To Offer Restitution Measure (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - In the wake of a federal judge's decision vacating the late Ken Lay's fraud and conspiracy convictions, two senators introduced a bill today to allow victims to seek restitution when a defendant convicted of a crime dies before his appeals have been completed.

The same day the Justice Department filed notice it will appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's decision to clear Lay's name "in light of pending legislation."

Last month, Lake wiped out the one-time Enron Corp. chairman's convictions because Lay died before the appeals process had been completed.

In reaching that decision, Lake was following a precedent set in the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that will hear the government's challenge.

The 5th Circuit is unlikely to side with the Justice Department because that court set the precedent Lake followed, said Brian Wice, a Houston attorney who specializes in appeals issues. But the government needs to appeal to that court before it can appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, he said.

Earlier this month, a three-judge 5th Circuit panel already refused to order Lake to reverse his decision. The panel reiterated Lake's position that legal precedent says that "when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed."

The ruling responded to an appeal of Lake's decision by an Enron shareholder.

Representatives of the Lay family couldn't be reached for comment this evening.

Today, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., both members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, introduced legislation designed to clarify the legal procedures when a defendant dies in this way.

"We need to ensure that, in these types of cases, hard-won convictions are preserved and restitution remains available for the victims of crime," Feinstein said in a statement today.

When convicted, a criminal defendant can be ordered to pay restitution to his victims, to try to make them whole. But since Lay's conviction was vacated, his estate cannot be ordered to pay restitution.

Instead, the Justice Department was forced to file a civil suit seeking to wrest control of $12.7 million worth of assets. If the government is successful, it could then turn over some or all of those proceeds to victims of the Enron debacle.

The Justice Department proposed legislation last summer that sought to preserve such convictions after a defendant dies pending sentencing and appeal — and wanted it to be retroactive to July 1, four days before Lay died. That proposal never garnered a sponsor.

The Justice Department helped Feinstein and Sessions craft the legislation introduced Thursday.

"We share Sen. Feinstein and Sen. Sessions' commitment to do away with the harmful and unwarranted effects of the abatement doctrine on crime victims," Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said.

Feinstein and Sessions' bill would stipulate that a defendant's conviction cannot be vacated just because the person has died.

That would allow for the defendant's estate to be ordered to pay direct restitution to victims. However, the proposal would allow a representative for the estate to appeal the conviction.

The bill also would give the federal government an additional two years to file a civil complaint to try to force an estate to forfeit assets.

Whether the senators can get the legislation through in the dwindling days of a lame duck session remains uncertain.

"The time is short," said Scott Gerber, a spokesman for Feinstein. "We'll do the best we can."

If they are unsuccessful, the lawmakers plan to reintroduce the bill in the new Congress.

Sessions Moves To End Precedent That Cleared Enron Founder (AP)

By Ben Evans, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0095793

Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions is joining a California Democrat to try to scrap the legal precedent that allowed Enron founder Kenneth Lay's fraud conviction to be cleared from his record after he died in July.

The clearing of Lay's record has hurt prosecutors' efforts to extract $43.5 million in restitution from Lay's estate. Sessions' legislation is an attempt to address that.

Working with the Justice Department, which asked for similar legislation shortly after Lay died, Sessions of Mobile joined Democrat Dianne Feinstein of California to introduce a bill this week that would keep federal convictions in force when a defendant dies, while allowing victims to continue seeking restitution.

Courts traditionally have interpreted the law differently, erasing the convictions of defendants who die before having the chance to appeal.

The bill would make the changes retroactive to July 1 so that they would apply in the Lay case.

"When a criminal conviction involves financial restitution to the victims of the crime, or when the conviction could be used in a later civil lawsuit, those effects of the conviction should not be erased by the death of the defendant," Sessions, a former U.S. attorney, said in a release. "It is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch."

Sessions, who along with Feinstein sits on the Judiciary Committee, also cited the huge costs of lengthy criminal trials.

Lay's trial "took nearly four months and cost the taxpayers millions of dollars," he said.

Lay was convicted on May 25 on 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in connection with the energy conglomerate's financial collapse, which wiped out billions of dollars in market value and pension plans. He faced the prospect of spending the rest of his life in prison but died of heart disease before being sentenced on July 5, while vacationing in Aspen, Colo.

At the request of Lay's attorneys, a federal judge erased his conviction Sept. 17, despite a request from the Justice Department to postpone the decision so Congress could consider a Justice proposal to change current law.

Legal experts said the decision to clear Lay's record was consistent with long-standing precedent because Lay had not had the opportunity to appeal.

Federal prosecutors could still win the $43.5 million they say Lay gained from Enron's fraud, but they have to do so through civil proceedings in competition with other litigants and without the benefit of a criminal conviction in hand.

Along with clarifying the law on maintaining convictions, the proposed bill would allow a representative of a deceased defendant to act on the defendant's behalf in an appeal, and it would give the government extra time to file parallel civil lawsuits to try to recover unlawfully obtained assets.

Skilling, Government Agree On $85 Million Enron Deal (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 17, 2006

Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling has settled the last dispute in litigation by former Enron employees seeking to recover at least some of their pensions that disappeared when the company crashed.

The ex-CEO, who is slated to begin serving more than 24 years in prison next month, has withdrawn his opposition to an $85 million settlement that plaintiffs reached with former company directors and other executives two years ago.

In exchange, plaintiffs resolved claims against Skilling — the last named defendant who hadn't settled — effectively bringing the litigation to a close.

"Yes, it's over. Our clients are thrilled," said Lynn Sarko, an attorney who represents ex-Enron employees, today. "While they are grateful that some of their retirement money was recovered, it will never make up for the destruction of their retirement nest egg."

The lawsuit, which recovered about $265 million in settlements — including the $85 million held up by a Skilling appeal — was filed on behalf of more than 20,000 employees after Enron went bankrupt in December 2001. The Labor Department later filed similar litigation, which was folded into the main lawsuit.

The Labor Department announced the agreement with Skilling today.

The $85 million settlement is derived from insurance money that covered Enron directors and other executives who served on the company's administrative committee. They, as well as Skilling, were named as defendants in the litigation.

Skilling argued that as an ex-Enron officer and director, he also was entitled to some of those insurance proceeds. He filed an appeal opposing any distribution of the funds until that question was resolved.

However, the Labor Department said today that Skilling had dropped his opposition to the settlement. Skilling also agreed to waive his right to benefits under Enron's pension plans and is permanently barred from overseeing any employee benefit plan governed by the Employee Retirement Income Security Act.

Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, didn't respond to a call for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0095794

If U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon approves the agreement as expected, the $85 million can be distributed to ex-Enron employees along with the other $180 million recovered, Sarko said.

Harmon has yet to determine how or when the money will be distributed.

Harmon oversees litigation filed on behalf of employees as well as shareholders who lost retirement funds or investments when the company crashed into bankruptcy nearly five years ago. The shareholder litigation has recovered more than $7 billion, but several banks remain named defendants and aim to go to trial next year.

Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors for his role in leading and perpetuating fraud at the company. Last month he was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison, and aims to appeal.

Upon being sentenced, Skilling agreed to turn over $45 million to the Justice Department in conjunction with his conviction. The money is to be added to a restitution fund related to the civil litigation on behalf of employees and shareholders.

Skilling maintains his innocence and aims to appeal. If he loses, that $45 million will be distributed to shareholders. If he wins his appeal, Skilling will get the money back.

But his agreement settling his dispute in the employee lawsuit says that he will still pay $2.5 million to ex-employees if his conviction is overturned or erased and the restitution fund is dissolved.

Skilling has been ordered to surrender to a low-security federal prison in Waseca, Minn. on Dec. 12.

Study Charts Broad Manipulation Of Options (NYT)

By Eric Dash

Abuses of stock option grants are perceived to have spread like a virus among high-technology companies. But a new study suggests that hundreds of old-economy companies may also have caught the backdating bug.

In a paper to be released today, researchers estimate that 590 nontechnology companies appear to have manipulated options so their chief executives received them at the lowest price of the month. That compares with 130 technology companies that appear to have backdated their chief executives' options to a monthly low during a 10-year period to the end of 2005.

Traditional manufacturing and service firms make up the bulk of publicly traded companies, so it comes as no surprise that the sheer number of manipulated grants outside the technology sector is larger.

Yet old-economy companies also appear to have made improper grants somewhat less frequently than their new-economy peers, making patterns more difficult to find. That combination, the researchers suggest, has allowed old-line companies to escape much of the scrutiny.

The study is the latest in a series of papers by academic and governance research groups that attempt to measure the extent of the backdating scandal and to explain how it spread. More than 120 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews. More than 50 executives and directors have been forced out or fired as a result.

Even as companies like UnitedHealth Group and KB Home have reported options-related problems and ousted their top executives, many observers still consider backdating a hangover from the dot-com boom.

Most companies that have come forward so far appear to be concentrated around Silicon Valley and other technology hot spots. They include a large number of software and semiconductor companies, with a big portion of their executives' total pay apparently coming from equity grants.

But the study suggests that the problem was more widespread.

Of the roughly 1,150 options grants that the researchers believe were manipulated, an estimated 950, or 80 percent, were at nontechnology companies.

"It is not the case that people should concentrate on new-economy firms," said Lucian Bebchuk, a Harvard Law School professor and director of its corporate governance program. "That is the impression that one might get from the cases that have come under scrutiny thus far."

Professor Bebchuk co-wrote the study with Yaniv Grinstein, a Cornell University professor, and Urs Peyer of the French business school Insead. It is to be posted today on the Web site of the Harvard Law School corporate governance program.

The study also questions the notion that companies backdated stock options as a tax-efficient method of compensation. Backdated gains, in this view, were simply a substitute for offering executives more cash.

The analysis found that this was not the case. "C.E.O.'s who got lucky grants also received higher levels of other forms of compensation relative to peer companies," Professor Bebchuk said.

The researchers said the study underscored the importance of having independent directors to counter the influence of the chief executive. A company that had a majority of independent directors on its board reduced the chances that it engaged in manipulation by more than a third, according to a statistical analysis in the report.

In their study, the researchers examined some 19,000 options grants at about 5,800 companies from 1996 to the end of 2005. They found evidence suggesting that nearly 12 percent, or about 720, of the companies appear to have made at least one options grant that occurred at the lowest price of the month because of manipulation. That number may expand by several hundred companies if the second- and third-lowest prices of the month are included.

Still, the new figure is significantly smaller than the estimate that more than 2,000 companies, or 29.2 percent of companies in the study, engaged in backdating to sweeten their executives' pay. That finding, based on a similar data analysis, was released this summer by Randall Herron, an Indiana University finance professor, and Erik Lie, a University of Iowa finance professor whose research is widely credited with provoking the inquiries into options grants.

The study by Professors Herron and Lie found that the abuse was more prevalent in high-technology firms, where an estimated 32 percent of unscheduled grants were backdated; at other firms, an estimated 20 percent were backdated.

Professor Bebchuk's group found a much lower level of manipulation and a narrower difference between old- and new-economy companies. In his study, the percentage of all grants that were in the month's lowest price because of manipulation was 5.7 percent for nontechnology firms, compared with 6.1 percent for the entire sample.

The discrepancy between the two studies probably results from their different starting points and approaches. Professors Herron and Lie searched for differences in backdating patterns between new- and old-economy companies by observing abnormal returns before and after an options grant date for corporate insiders. Professor Bebchuk's team focused on the grants awarded to chief executives at monthly lows, which were most likely to be manipulated, and then on the differences between technology companies and nontechnology companies.

Backdated Options Pad CEO Pay By Average Of 10% (WSJ)

By John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

About 850 U.S. chief executives received backdated or otherwise manipulated stock option grants that boosted their annual pay, on average, by at least 10%, according to a new study.

The study, released yesterday by professors at Harvard and Cornell universities and the French business school Insead, bolsters the view of federal prosecutors who have viewed stock-option backdating as means to steal money from shareholders. Defenders of the companies who engaged in the practice have said that backdating often involved minor sums and was merely an alternative way of providing market-based pay.

The study, a paper done for the Harvard Law School Program on Corporate Governance, didn't name executives or companies that may have backdated. It relied on broad statistical analyses that identified suspiciously "lucky" patterns of options granted at low prices.

The researchers also found that executives who reaped riches from backdating options started out with reported compensation that was richer than their peers at similar companies. On top of that above-average pay, executives received an average of an extra $1.3 million to $1.7 million through each manipulated grant, the academics found.

"It's not pocket change," said Lucian Bebchuk, a professor of law, economics and finance at Harvard and one of the study's authors.

More than 130 companies are under federal investigation in the stock option timing scandal, which has claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors. Five former executives face criminal charges.

A stock option gives an employee the right to buy shares of a stock in the future -- generally at its current, or strike, price. The lower the strike price, the more potentially valuable the option. Backdating the option to when the stock was trading at an unusually low price can add millions of dollars to executives' pay.

Researchers examined the timing of stock option grants from 1996 through 2005, sifting through 19,036 grants made by about 6,000 companies led by a total of 8,800 chief executives.

The professors found that 2,329, or 12%, were granted at monthly low prices -- what the professor termed "lucky" grants. Only 4% were granted at monthly highs. If options were chosen randomly, roughly 5% should have been granted at monthly lows or highs, since there are about 20 trading days in a month.

The professors determined there were more than 1,100 "lucky" grants that didn't result from random selection, but were instead likely backdated or otherwise manipulated. In all, 12% of all U.S. public firms, or 720, awarded one or more manipulated grants, the study found. The study said 850 CEOs, or about 10%, received "lucky grants" based on manipulation.

Study Hits Out At Options Practice (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera And Brooke Masters

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

The controversial practice of backdating stock options to boost executive pay went hand-in-hand with poor corporate governance practices and overbearing chief executives, according to a study published on Friday.

The research by three academics is the first to suggest a link between lax internal controls and stock options backdating. The scandal has so far engulfed more than 130 US companies in internal and regulatory probes but the study suggests that number could climb to 720.

The research also found that, contrary to a widespread perception, "old economy" companies used the practice almost as much as rivals in "new economy" sectors – a feature underlined by one of the most recent casualties of the scandal, Bruce Karatz, the ousted chief executive of the housebuilder KB Home.

The results of the study, which looked at options granted by 8,000 companies between 1996 and 2005, will undermine claims by some companies and lawyers that backdating was a widespread and legitimate way of rewarding chief executives.

"These findings are consistent with the view that grant date manipulation reflects governance problems rather than a compensation device used for valid business reasons," conclude the authors – Harvard Law School's Lucian Bebchuk, Yaniv Grinstein from Cornell University and Insead's Urs Peyer.

The research counters the view that gains from backdated options were not material, or simply a tax-efficient replacement for other pay, estimating that, on average, these grants increased executives' yearly compensation by more than 10 per cent.

By focusing on "lucky grants" – options priced at the lowest share price in a given month – the academics found that 12 per cent of companies had manipulated the timing of one or more grants.

The practice was more prevalent among companies whose boards did not have a majority of independent directors and whose chief executives had been at the helm for a long time – a sign of a link between poor corporate governance and backdating.

In total, an estimated 850 chief executives received grants that had been backdated to the lowest share price in the month to increase potential rewards, according to the study. And more than 600 chief executives were granted even more lucrative options – backdated to the lowest share price in a given quarter.

Executive Retreat Stock-Options Scandal Fugitive Puts Roots Down In Namibia (WSJ)

By Steve Stecklow

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WINDHOEK, NAMIBIA -- Wolfgang Balzer, general manager of the Hotel Thule, now realizes there was something unusual about the Israeli family who checked in this summer for a month, identifying themselves as the Jacobs.

Saying they were planning on settling here, they didn't use credit cards and paid their bill in advance. The husband, who usually kept to himself, became extremely agitated when CNN wasn't available for a few days on their television.

"I personally thought he was a lawyer or something and he was going to work here," the hotel manager says. He learned otherwise in late September.

That's when it emerged that the husband was Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, a fugitive wanted in the U.S. on fraud charges related to stock-options backdating. The former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., a New York software company, had skipped out on the chance to begin talks with U.S. prosecutors that his own New York lawyers had initiated, according to a person familiar with the discussions.

He was arrested at U.S. prosecutors' request on Sept. 27 during lunch with his wife at a country club, even though Namibia has no extradition treaty with the U.S. A Namibian bank regulator had noticed large transfers to Mr. Alexander's local account and tipped off U.S. authorities. Mr. Alexander already had received a two-year work permit under his own name, even though he used an alias at the hotel. The Namibian government asked him to invest $43 million to help qualify for permanent residency.

Life on the lam has been full of bizarre twists for Mr. Alexander, a 54-year-old Israeli citizen and wealthy ex-CEO who abandoned his family's life in Manhattan for this remote, arid spot in southern Africa.

He was released from jail six days after his arrest on $1.4 million bail, a record amount in this country. Now he continues to live here, out in the open, sometimes buying ice cream in a local mall for his three children. If extradited and convicted in the U.S., he faces up to 25 years in prison. While his team of local lawyers has been fighting extradition, he appears to be trying to settle in Namibia for the long haul.

He has bought a house that backs onto a golf course, put his children into private school here, and invested in local businesses including an auto-body repair shop called Monarch Panelbeaters. One of his new business partners is a former Namibian military official linked to a scandal involving a collapsed asset-management company.

Yesterday, Mr. Alexander won at least five more months in Namibia. In a closed-door meeting, a local magistrate scheduled a three-day hearing on the extradition request to begin next April 25. "Nothing will happen until April," Johnny Truter, the Namibian government's prosecutor, said afterward.

He added that even if the ex-CEO loses the case, the appeals process could allow him to stay here for years.

Mr. Alexander, dressed for court in an open-necked blue sport shirt and dark sports jacket, declined to comment for this story. One of his attorneys, Rudi Cohrssen, said, "Things will get clearer in April."

Mr. Alexander's new life in Namibia marks one of the most unusual chapters in the stock-options backdating scandal, which has embroiled more than 130 companies, cost the jobs of more than 50 top executives and directors and led to more than $5 billion in financial restatements. Mr. Alexander is accused in a 35-count criminal indictment of engaging in a fraudulent scheme to backdate Comverse options to days when the stock was trading at low points, generating millions of dollars in extra compensation for himself and other executives.

Prosecutors say that Mr. Alexander realized $138 million from options whose grant dates were backdated. They allege he misled auditors and shareholders and used fictitious names to generate thousands of backdated options that were parked in a secret slush fund, dubbed "I.M. Fanton" (an apparent reference to "Phantom of the Opera"), and awarded to favored employees. The indictment also charges him with witness tampering by allegedly offering millions of dollars to a Comverse executive, whom people familiar with the matter have identified as former chief financial officer David Kreinberg, "to falsely take sole responsibility for the fraud scheme."

Mr. Kreinberg and Comverse's former general counsel, William Sorin, recently pleaded guilty for their roles, naming Mr. Alexander as the scheme's mastermind. The timing of Mr. Alexander's option grants was first reported by The Wall Street Journal in March, sparking investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department. Comverse announced on May 2 that Mr. Alexander had resigned as CEO amid an internal probe of backdating.

Mr. Alexander visited Windhoek, Namibia's hilly, picturesque capital, alone in early July, Mr. Truter says. He began signing documents to invest in land here and then returned to Israel, where he was vacationing with his family. The initial trip "was obviously just preparations for coming with his family," Mr. Truter said.

But Mr. Alexander's lawyers in New York also were approaching federal prosecutors. In a July 21 phone conversation, prosecutors for the Eastern District of New York in Brooklyn suggested that Mr. Alexander return to the U.S. as a show of good faith. Federal authorities agreed to meet him at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York but not to arrest him. They offered to begin negotiations on July 31.

Mr. Alexander appeared to agree. He provided evidence that he was booked on an El Al flight that would arrive in New York on July 28. But on July 27, he flew instead from Israel to Frankfurt, and disappeared. Prosecutors now believe Mr. Alexander was deceiving his own lawyers. He also attempted to wire $12 million out of the U.S. around July 31. He had already transferred $57 million to Israel, before the U.S. froze $48 million of his assets.

Robert Morvillo, a lawyer for Mr. Alexander in New York, said attorneys had approached prosecutors "to better understand what the allegations were, and to develop a presentation or arguments that this was not an appropriate criminal case." He declined to comment on other matters, saying they were already described in government papers.

After Mr. Alexander failed to return, prosecutors filed a criminal complaint under seal, charging him and the two other former Comverse executives with fraud. They unsealed it on Aug. 9.

By then, Mr. Alexander and his family were ensconced in two adjacent, ground-floor rooms at the Hotel Thule, which from its dining room offers a dramatic view of the dry, craggy hills that surround Windhoek. With the exception of a weekend journey to a famous Namibian safari park, hotel manager Mr. Balzer says the family spent most days in the city, traveling in a chauffeured van that picked them up each morning. Mr. Alexander's wife, Hana, sometimes would ask him questions about local schools upon their return. One of the two boys often kicked a soccer ball in the parking lot, he said, and the other son and the couple's daughter played hide-and-seek.

Mr. Alexander paid in advance for the family's two, $143-a-night rooms through a local travel agent, Namibia Travel Connection, which had booked them under the name Jacobs, Mr. Balzer says. The fact that Mr. Alexander avoided using a credit card caused some complications: At one point, Mr. Balzer says, the agency said Mr. Alexander would pay his own bills going forward. Then the hotel was told one of Mr. Alexander's lawyers, Richard Metcalfe, would cover any charges. Later, the travel agency called back and said it would take care of them after all, and did.

Mr. Metcalfe didn't return phone calls seeking comment. A man and woman at the travel agency, which operates out of a private house behind a gate, declined to comment.

Mr. Balzer recalls that when CNN, the American news channel, stopped working on the hotel's television screens, "That stressed [Mr. Alexander] out completely. He was complaining about it badly." Because it was a weekend, it couldn't be fixed for a couple of days, frustrating Mr. Alexander further.

Mr. Balzer says he assumed that the hotel guest was monitoring developments of the Israeli war then being fought in Lebanon. But he now suspects Mr. Alexander had a different concern: whether U.S. authorities were closing in.

That wouldn't come for a few weeks. In the meantime, Mr. Alexander didn't waste any time establishing his family's new life in Namibia, a former German colony that later fell under the rule of South Africa. Previously known as South West Africa, it gained independence in 1990 after decades of armed struggle. A tourist destination for wildlife lovers, it recently generated headlines when actors Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt came here for the birth of their daughter.

After visiting several private schools, the Alexanders enrolled their children in an international school. Mr. Alexander bought a 2006 Toyota Land Cruiser for $107,000, he said in a sworn affidavit filed in Namibian court. He said he paid $543,000 for a two-story, beige stucco house whose backyard faces Windhoek's only golf course and country club.

Mr. Alexander hired a full-time security guard to stand outside the front of the house, which is part of a small development of 57 homes behind a guarded, locked gate. A basketball hoop hangs over the garage, and a satellite dish sits on the roof.

On Aug. 29, court records show, the Namibian Ministry of Home Affairs and Immigration issued Mr. Alexander a two-year work permit, just a day after his lawyer, Mr. Metcalfe, filed an application. Mr. Alexander also applied for permanent residency. The ministry said in a letter it will consider the residency application provided he submits plans to transfer and invest $43 million in the country. The Namibian official who signed the letter couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Truter, the local prosecutor, said foreigners essentially can "buy" work permits in Namibia by promising to invest in the country. "If you have a lot of money to invest, they will give it to you," he said.

Mr. Alexander said in his affidavit last month that he already had transferred more than $17 million to banks in Namibia from Israel and had invested about $1.6 million in various land deals, including a low-income housing project on the coast.

He also has invested $843,000 in Monarch Panelbeaters, the local auto-body shop, which he said was owned by "previously disadvantaged Namibians" who were saddled with debt and cash-flow problems, according to the affidavit. He called it "an example of a successful locally owned and operated business."

Under Namibian law, foreign investors must find local partners to invest with. Mr. Alexander's partners include Brigadier Mathias Shiweda, whom he described as "a well known Namibian business personality." Mr. Shiweda, a former Namibia Defense Force official who remains in charge of a state-owned military hardware manufacturer, is well known here. He's also the subject of some controversy. Last year, he was linked to a scandal in which Namibia's Social Security Commission invested and lost $4.3 million in an asset-management company that collapsed.

According to local news accounts, at an inquiry, Lazarus Kandara, the head of the collapsed firm, named Mr. Shiweda among the shareholders, and as one of several recipients of a commission from the management company in connection with another deal. A few days later, Mr. Kandara died in what Namibian police ruled a suicide. Mr. Shiweda later testified that he received no money from the firm. He declined to comment for this story.

By late August, U.S. authorities had tracked down Mr. Alexander to Namibia. But they were in a legal bind because Namibia has no extradition treaty with the U.S. American authorities had to ask Namibia's president, Hifikepunye Pohamba, to issue a formal proclamation adding the U.S. to a list of countries that fall under the country's extradition act. Although the president issued the document on Aug. 31, it wasn't published until Sept. 27, when it took effect. "We had to lay low before they changed their law and we could arrest him," said one U.S. official.

At a bail hearing on Oct. 2., Mr. Alexander presented the sworn affidavit that challenged his arrest, saying he had acted above board, and discussed his investments in the country. "While in Namibia I have used my own name openly and publicly in all my encounters and ventures with government officials and private individuals alike," he said. "I entered Namibia openly and lawfully, and I have not in any manner tried to hide my whereabouts from anyone."

To the surprise of Namibian prosecutors, a local magistrate agreed to release Mr. Alexander on bail. The release was unusual. A German citizen living in Namibia has been fighting extradition here for four years, and has spent all of that time in jail.

Mr. Truter says Mr. Alexander offered to surrender his Israeli passport and post $700,000 bail if he was released. The government asked for double that amount, and he agreed, Mr. Truter said, adding it was a record amount for bail. Dennis Khama, a government attorney who handles extradition cases, said the government has appealed Mr. Alexander's release, although no date has been set for a hearing. "Litigation can go on and go on and go on," Mr. Khama said. "There's no way of stopping that."

Mr. Khama says the fact that Mr. Alexander isn't a U.S. citizen should have no effect on whether he ultimately is extradited, nor should his investments in Namibia. But one issue may be whether stock-option backdating is a crime in Namibia, he added, noting that hasn't yet been decided. Mr. Cohrssen, Mr. Alexander's attorney, said: "There are many arguments" Mr. Alexander's defense team can make.

The arrest of the Israeli citizen had reverberations in the country's tiny Jewish community, especially when his bail hearing was scheduled for Oct. 2 -- which happened to be Yom Kippur, the holiest day in the Jewish calendar. Zvi Gorelick, a retired Namibian-born entrepreneur who offers kosher safari tours and performs some rabbinical functions, said he received calls from Namibia and Israel asking him to help Mr. Alexander get out of jail.

Mr. Gorelick said he quickly began "thinking like a Jew: I must get him some kosher food." But he learned that Mrs. Alexander was bringing her husband food in jail.

He said the Jewish community was divided over the fate of Mr. Alexander, though most have never met him. "On one hand you feel, 'Let's give the guy a break. He's going to bring money into the economy.' But on the other hand, you say, 'We don't need another dishonest person. There's enough dishonest people in the country,'" he said. He added that Mr. Alexander must be presumed innocent.

At the Windhoek Country Club Resort, some guests have also gotten wrapped up in Mr. Alexander's case. Sam Shapiro, owner of a fish company called Mazel Dagim in Monsey, N.Y., shook his head over Mr. Alexander's bid to stay in Namibia. "If you're asking me, it's the wrong choice to come here," he said, adding, "It's not New York, where there are movies, you can go to concerts."

Ex-Adelphia Officer Gets Lifetime Ban (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

NEW YORK -- A federal judge barred a former Adelphia Communications Corp. executive from ever serving again as an officer or director of a publicly traded company.

Ruling in a case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the judge said former Adelphia vice president Michael C. Mulcahey had helped the former cable-television giant's founding family engage in a fraud that contributed to the company's 2002 collapse.

Mr. Mulcahey was acquitted of criminal fraud charges in 2004, but the SEC sought regulatory sanctions for his conduct.

U.S. District Judge Kevin Castel conducted a trial in July and ruled yesterday that although Mr. Mulcahey wasn't an "architect" of fraud at Adelphia he had "egregiously" violated "numerous securities laws."

The judge also ruled, however, that Mr. Mulcahey hadn't been personally enriched by fraud at the company. He declined to order any fines against Mr. Mulcahey, who made $140,000 in his best year with Adelphia, but banned him from receiving "anything of value" in the future from the family of the company's founder, John Rigas, who was convicted along with a son on fraud charges.

Mr. Mulcahey's attorney, Mark J. Mahoney, said he was "grateful" the judge decided not to impose economic sanctions but intended to appeal the lifetime ban.

Adelphia was the country's fifth-largest cable television company before it disclosed that its executives had improperly concealed $2.3 billion in debt. Its remaining assets were bought last year by Comcast Corp. and Time Warner Cable.

As Scandal Unfolded, H.P.'s Profits Surged Ahead (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 16 — In a period punctuated by distracting revelations of company spying, Hewlett-Packard nevertheless sharply increased its revenue and made more profit from the revenue.

Net income for its fourth quarter, which ended Oct. 31, rose to $1.7 billion, or 60 cents a share, from $416 million, or 14 cents a share, a year ago, which included $1.57 billion in restructuring charges. After adjusting for the manner in which the charges are accounted for, net income increased 27 percent. Revenue increased 7 percent, to $24.6 billion.

With $91.7 billion in revenue for the year, a 6 percent increase over 2005, the company overtook I.B.M. as the world's largest technology company. (The consensus of analysts puts I.B.M.'s 2006 revenue at $90.72 billion.) H.P. has also overtaken Dell as the world's largest PC vendor mostly because sales of its notebook computers grew 24 percent.

"We certainly aren't taking any victory laps, but we are pleased with the progress," the chairman and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, said.

Analysts were pleased with revenue growth in the quarter, but they were focused on how the company had made more money on each dollar of revenue across all but one line of business. For example, revenue from personal computers grew 10 percent to $7.8 billion while operating profit grew 68 percent to $336 million, largely because of the strength in sales of notebook computers. While selling PCs remained a low margin business, operating profit margin increased to 4.3 percent of revenue from 2.8 percent a year earlier.

The story was similar in the company's printer business. Operating profit grew 22 percent to $1.1 billion as operating margins increased to 14.8 percent from 13.2 percent. In software, operating margins were 17.2 percent up from 9.2 percent a year ago. The company's $4.7 billion services business, which had been its weakest link, saw operating profit jump 56.8 percent as margins rose to 12.4 percent from 9 percent.

The company's top executives were distracted through much of the quarter by revelations of spying operations conducted against several directors and journalists. The imbroglio led to the resignation of Patricia C. Dunn, the company's chairwoman, who this week pleaded not guilty to four felony charges. A former company lawyer and its director of ethics, Kevin Hunsaker, also faces charges. He has pleaded not guilty. Three contractors were also charged and have also pleaded not guilty.

The fallout from the affair has not ended. The company disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission has opened an investigation of the handling of disclosures of board information. It also said the Federal Communications Commission has requested information on the company's spying, which included using false pretenses to obtain private phone records. The California attorney general is expected to sue Hewlett-Packard in civil court. In addition, the United States attorney in Northern California continues his investigation.

The strong profit is one reason that investors snoozed through a month of reports of the illegal and unethical behavior by company lawyers, investigators and private detectives.

H.P. shares rose as high as $40.51 in after-hours trading and closing at $40.13 in regular trading.

The company's executives said that the improvement in profit margins showed that Mr. Hurd's plan to cut costs and free up cash to invest in growth opportunities is starting to work. "Restructuring has done wonders for profitability and it will give them room to strengthen market share gains in key areas," said William C. Shope, a securities analyst with J. P. Morgan. "The challenge will be to sustain revenue growth."

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S., Canada To Share Forensics Data (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

ASHEVILLE, N.C. - U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials agreed Thursday to begin sharing forensics data from crimes scenes in both countries.

A memorandum of understanding signed by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day marks the first in which the United States has agreed to immediate sharing of crime-scene information with a foreign government.

"And while terrorism is a primary concern for all of us, it is not our only job," Gonzales said. "Criminals are constantly searching for new ways to prey upon our communities. To stop them, we must maintain the same vigilance we show against terrorists."

Before Thursday's action, the two countries exchanged only a limited amount of ballistics information.

Under the agreement, each country will be able to view real-time forensics data, allowing bullets and firearms to be linked across crime scenes in both countries, said Michael Sullivan, acting director of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Canada has strict laws governing handgun sales, with the result that the majority of handguns used to commit crimes in Canada are purchased in the United States, Sullivan said.

The signing took place as part of the ninth annual United States-Canada Cross-Border Crime Forum, which is held at the historic Biltmore Estate in western North Carolina. The two-day meeting brought together hundreds of law-enforcement officers from the two countries.

Also present for the signing was U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who praised the agreement as an opportunity to stop crime at the border and improve systems that attempt to keep potential terrorists from entering both countries.

Attorney General, Other Officials Discuss U.S./Canada Border Issues Here (ASHCT)

ASHEVILLE – U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff and other government officials from the United States and Canada are on the Biltmore Estate today for a meeting on fighting crime along the two countries' border.

Canadian Minister of Justice Vic Toews and Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety and emergency preparedness are also scheduled to attend.

Approximately 130 people are attending the forum, including Canadian and U.S. officials and the U.S. Attorneys General from all the border states with Canada.

Biltmore Estate spokesperson Elizabeth Sims said a past visit to the estate by Gonzales' wife inspired forum organizers to choose Biltmore for their meeting.

"Mrs. Gonzales visited the property a couple of years ago and stayed at the inn and she just really liked the Biltmore Estate," Sims said. "So when they began looking for a location for this meeting, they thought we were a great place."

Gun Data Pact With U.S. (CP)

Canadian Press, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Canada and the United States signed a deal yesterday to share more information quickly on guns, bullets and cartridges related to crime scenes.

The agreement will enable police on both sides of the border to compare evidence electronically and instantaneously instead of exchanging it manually on a case-by-case basis.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales also emphasized co-operative steps to combat the illegal flow of U.S. firearms north of the border, including a focus on the rise of gun-related violence in the Toronto area.

Canada has long complained about the weapons, particularly handguns, smuggled in from the United States.

Abramoff Reports To Prison; Officials Focus On Reid, Others (ABC)

By

ABC News, November 17, 2006

As convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported to federal prison today, a source close to the investigation surrounding his activities told ABC News that Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was one of the members of Congress Abramoff had allegedly implicated in his cooperation with federal prosecutors.

A spokesperson for Reid, elected yesterday as the Senate Majority Leader, said the senator had done nothing illegal or unethical.

"We have no idea what Abramoff is telling prosecutors to save his skin, but I do know that these kind of old allegations are completely ridiculous and untrue," Sen. Reid's spokesman Jim Manley told ABC News.

A source close to the investigation says Abramoff told prosecutors that more than $30,000 in campaign contributions to Reid from Abramoff's clients "were no accident and were in fact requested by Reid."

Abramoff has reportedly claimed the Nevada senator agreed to help him on matters related to Indian gambling.

The Associated Press reported earlier this year that Reid wrote at least four letters helpful to the tribes that had contributed money to his campaign.

Reid has denied there was any connection between the letters and the contributions and has said he is a longtime opponent of certain kinds of Indian reservation gambling.

The AP reported that Reid acknowledged "routine contacts" with Abramoff's lobbying partners and intervening to block rival tribal casinos.

The AP also reported that Abramoff's billing records showed extensive contact with Reid's office over a three-year period in which Reid collected more than $68,000 from Abramoff's firm, partners and clients.

Prosecutors have said that Abramoff's cooperation is essential to the corruption investigation, but, so far, they have brought only one prosecution against a member of Congress connected to Abramoff, Republican Bob Ney of Ohio, who resigned.

The source said prosecutors do not intend to rely solely on Abramoff's account of events, and his allegations against Reid and others will not necessarily result in criminal charges.

Sources close to the federal investigation say Abramoff has offered testimony about his contacts with "six to eight seriously corrupt Democratic senators" and an ever larger number of Republican members of Congress.

In addition to Reid, the sources say Abramoff has been most closely questioned about his contacts with Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who was defeated in last week's election.

"Being defeated may have been one of the best things that ever happened to Burns," said a source close to the investigation. "There is much more interest in members of Congress who are still in office," the source said.

Burns, who received more than $150,000 in Abramoff-connected campaign contributions, has strongly denied any wrongdoing and returned the money.

Sen. Reid has been an outspoken critic of the connections between Abramoff and Republican legislators.

In a speech earlier this year, Sen. Reid described it as "a program where the lobbyists paid and the Republican members of Congress played."

The Justice Department said it would have no comment on the ongoing Abramoff investigation.

Texas Appeals Court Takes Bush To Task For Stepping In For Foreign-born Death Row Inmate (AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press

AP, November 17, 2006

HOUSTON – A state appeals court chastised President Bush for intervening in the case of a condemned killer born in Mexico, one of several dozen cases in which Bush ordered new hearings amid international complaints.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on Wednesday rejected the argument from Jose Ernesto Medellin that he was denied legal help he should have received under international treaties.

Medellin, who spent most of his life in Texas, was sentenced in 1994 to die for the rapes and killings of two teenage girls.

"We hold that the President has exceeded his constitutional authority by intruding into the independent powers of the judiciary," the court said in a 64-page ruling.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department was reviewing the ruling and considering its options.

Medellin was supported in his appeal by dozens of countries, legal groups and human rights organizations, as well as former American diplomats and the European Union. Much of the international community is opposed to capital punishment and the execution of Mexican nationals in Texas, the nation's most active death penalty state, is a particularly touchy point.

At issue overall was how much weight U.S. courts should give to decisions of the International Court of Justice in The Hague, which ruled the convictions of Medellin and 50 other Mexican-born prisoners violated the 1963 Vienna Convention. The pact requires consular access for Americans detained abroad and foreigners arrested in the United States.

In February 2005, Bush unexpectedly ordered new state court hearings for all 51 prisoners. The Texas court said Wednesday neither the Constitution nor any act of Congress gives the president the power to issue such an order.

The decision means Medellin, 31, is not entitled to additional review of his international rights claim.

Last year, the Supreme Court rejected Medellin's case and those of the 50 other Mexican nationals on death row in the United States, citing the presidential order, and sent them to their respective state courts for review. That ruling avoided the dispute over whether international law is binding on American courts.

In their arguments to the Supreme Court, Medellin's attorneys said his court-appointed trial lawyer was suspended from practicing law for ethics violations during the case, and he failed to call any witnesses during the guilt phase of the trial. Lawyers for Mexico said the country would have made sure Medellin had a competent lawyer had it known about the trial.

Medellin, 18 at the time, was one of six members of a fledgling Houston street gang convicted in the slayings of Jennifer Ertman, 14, and Elizabeth Pena, 16. The pair had been tortured, raped and strangled.

One of Medellin's companions, Derrick Sean O'Brien, also 18 at the time of the slayings, was executed earlier this year. In a confession, O'Brien said Medellin was at one end of a belt being pulled around Ertman's neck as he yanked on the other.

Two other gang members had their death sentences commuted to life in prison when the Supreme Court last year barred executions for those who were 17 at the time of their crimes. The man authorities call the gang's ringleader remains on death row without an execution date.

The sixth person convicted was Medellin's brother, Vernancio, who was 14 at the time and received a 40-year prison term.

Lawrence Death Sentence Set Aside (WBNS)

By Lindsey Seavert & Penny Moore

WBNS-TV, CBS 10, Columbus, OH, November 17, 2006

A jury found Daryl Lawrence guilty of murdering a Columbus police officer.

But Thursday, a judge put Lawrence's death sentence on hold, taking the convicted killer off Ohio's Death Row for now.

Lawrence shot Officer Brian Hurst during a bank robbery committed January 6, 2005. That conviction stands. The dispute is over the jury's sentence recommendations on two separate murder counts.

One called for giving Lawrence the death penalty. The other recommends a life sentence.

Lawrence's lawyers argued the decision was inconsistent. On Thursday, a federal judge announced he agreed. Friends of Hurst, like his best friend Donnie Oliveiro, see the development as a bump in the road on the way to attaining justice.

"I've prepared myself for the last two years for this day to come," Oliveiro said.

Federal judge Gregory Frost issued a written decision reading the jury's sentencing on Lawrence's murder verdicts were inconsistent -- giving life on one charge and then death on another. The judge wrote: "The court has no choice but to set aside the death sentence and order a new sentencing hearing."

The judge added, "The discrepencies point to irrational arbitrary juror conduct."

That was the exact argument from Lawrence's legal team.

"What we were trying to achieve was to restore some logic to an illogical verdict," said defense attorney Kort Gatterdam.

Gatterdam argues the appropriate remedy for Lawrence is life sentences on both counts.

"There's no way for a jury to weigh the same mitigating factors and say he deserves life and go on and say he deserves death. It makes no sense," Gatterdam said.

But Oliveiro still believes in the system, and said the death penalty is appropriate punishment for the man who killed his closest friend.

"Unfortunately for us, Bryan wasn't given the opportunity to have rights and have decisions made and appeals on whether he should die that day," Oliveiro remarked.

Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien told 10TV Thursday that he will meet with Justice Department officials to decide the next step. O'Brien said they will likely appeal this decision to the Federal Appeals Court.

Another option O'Brien mentioned is to follow the judge's ruling and allow a new federal jury to re-sentence Lawrence.

FDLE Launches Criminal Investigation Into Foley's Communications With Boys (FLSUNSEN)

By By Nancy L. Othón, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, November 17, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH -- Not seen publicly since resigning from Congress in a national scandal, Mark Foley emerged on Thursday in Palm Beach County after the death of his father.

The former Congressman, who left his post as a U.S. representative in September after the disclosure that he had sent sexually explicit emails to Congressional pages, is in town for Ed Foley's funeral. Ed Foley, 85, died Tuesday.

Foley's emergence comes as the Florida Department of Law Enforcement indicated it has shifted from a preliminary inquiry to a "full-fledged criminal investigation" regarding Foley.

As the scandal unfolded and more details were made public concerning Foley's communications with teenage boys, the U.S. Justice Department and FDLE indicated they were launching inquiries.

"We found that there might be criminal violations that would warrant a full investigation," said FDLE spokeswoman Kristen Perezluha, adding that the agency also is assisting the FBI. "We don't know, but that's what we're going to look into."

Wearing a red polo shirt, Foley was seen with his attorney David Roth at the Palm Beach home of his friend Layne Nisenbaum on Thursday and later spent time at Roth's office, according to WPTV-Ch. 5. Nisenbaum has a Palm Beach dermatology practice.

It's unclear whether Foley will be at today's visitation at Quattlebaum Funeral Home or Saturday's funeral Mass at Mary Immaculate Catholic Church.

His attorney, David Roth issued a brief statement Thursday on behalf of Foley and his family asking for privacy. Roth could not be reached for comment beyond the press release.

Scott Ondich, funeral director at Quattlebaum Funeral Home, acknowledged there may be speculation about Foley's presence during services.

"This is about Ed Foley, not Mark Foley, and hopefully that's how it stays," Ondich said.

Foley recently underwent treatment for alcohol addiction in an Arizona rehabilitation facility. He previously announced, through his attorneys, that he is gay and that a priest molested him when Foley was a teen.

WPTV-Ch. 5 and Amie Parnes of Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers contributed to this report.

Judge Stays Ex-procurement Chief's Sentence (GOVEXEC)

By Kimberly Palmer

Government Executive, November 17, 2006

In an unexpected move, a judge granted a request Thursday from David Safavian, the former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy shop, for a stay of his prison sentence, pending an appeal of his June conviction of obstructing justice and making false statements.

Safavian filed an appeal in September challenging his conviction on four counts of making false statements to General Services Administration employees and obstructing an investigation by GSA's inspector general. The charges stem from Safavian's relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff while serving as chief of staff at GSA, and focused on a Scotland golf trip the men took together, along with other officials, in 2002.

Appeals can take several years, so Safavian's sentence of 18 months -- if upheld -- will not begin until after that ruling.

In his opinion granting the request, U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman cited the section of U.S. Code that says that if a person is not likely to flee, and the appeal raises a substantial question of law likely to result in a reversal, new trial or different sentence, then the judge can grant a request for release on bond.

Safavian's lawyer, Barbara "Biz" Van Gelder, raised numerous legal issues before, during and after the trial, including questions about the admission of controversial e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff as evidence.

Friedman noted in his opinion that if one or more of the legal questions raised are decided in Safavian's favor, then a new trial is likely.

Justice Department prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg declined to comment. In a filing, prosecutors agreed that Safavian was not at risk of fleeing.

Feds Looking At Cleveland Housing Agency's Land Purchase (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

CLEVELAND - Federal prosecutors are investigating the $150,000-an-acre purchase of inner-city land by the city's public housing agency.

U.S. Attorney Greg White said Wednesday that his office and FBI agents had begun a preliminary investigation of the purchase by the Cuyahoga Metropolitan Housing Authority.

White confirmed the investigation one day after Todd Davis, a developer whose company sold the land to the agency, met with federal investigators. Davis' lawyer said he requested the meeting after recent stories in The Plain Dealer about the deal.

"Mr. Davis and his companies have been transparent about their efforts during the seven years they worked on the project and have nothing to hide about the work they did turning this toxic property into a neighborhood asset," attorney John McCaffrey told the paper in an e-mail.

The agency's executive director, George Phillips, said through a spokeswoman that the agency would cooperate with any investigation.

Last month, the newspaper reported that a Davis company worked with officials to land $4.7 million in public funds to clean up and redevelop roughly 25 acres of contaminated industrial land in Cleveland. Davis' original plan was for an industrial park.

But with the approval of the agency and Cleveland officials, Davis' company instead sold the site to the housing authority for its new offices.

Northwestern Pa. Couple Wants $350,000 Reward In Trooper Shooting (NSDY/AP)

By Dan Nephin, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 17, 2006

PITTSBURGH -- A couple filed a lawsuit to claim a $350,000 reward offered for Ralph "Bucky" Phillips, a former fugitive who is accused of shooting a New York state trooper and suspected of shooting two others.

Phillips was captured Sept. 8 in Akeley, Pa., just south of the New York state line.

Jack and Gloria Young, of Warren, filed a federal lawsuit in Erie on Wednesday. The couple called Warren city police shortly before midnight on Sept. 7 after seeing a suspicious person near their property, a tip they say led directly to the capture of Phillips.

"But for my clients' phone call, (police) still would not have found Bucky, or at least not found him that night," Robert C. Greene, an attorney for the Youngs, said Thursday.

"There's little if any question that it was Bucky Phillips" that the Youngs saw, said Elliot J. Segel, another attorney for the couple.

The couple is suing the Police Benevolent Association of the New York State Troopers Inc., which they say is wrongly withholding the reward.

Greene said he sent a letter by regular and certified mail to the union on Sept. 14, but has heard nothing.

Dan De Federicis, president of the union, said its attorneys talked with the Youngs before the suit was filed. "We haven't said no. We're going slow here," he said.

"There's not a clear line. They saw a prowler. It's just not crystal clear," he said.

The union was working with the FBI on the reward, he said. The $350,000 includes $25,000 from the union, plus money from other groups.

The FBI put up an additional $100,000 reward. The lawsuit does not address that reward, but Greene said the couple is considering suing the FBI also.

Phillips is charged with attempted murder in the shooting of Trooper Sean Brown near Elmira, N.Y., in June, and authorities say he is suspected of shooting Troopers Donald Baker Jr. and Joseph Longobardo on Aug. 31 in western New York, near the Pennsylvania border. Longobardo died three days later. Baker is recovering.

Phillips surrendered five months and one week after escaping from a New York jail. The manhunt was one of the largest in New York state history.

Reputed Mob Figure Charged In Drug Case (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 17, 2006

Reputed mob associate Damion Canalichio was released on $75,000 bond yesterday after his arrest earlier this week on two-year-old drug-dealing charges.

Canalichio, 37, is the second high-profile mob figure to be arrested in the last month in what some law enforcement sources say is part of a concerted federal push against alleged South Philadelphia mob boss Joseph Ligambi.

Mob enforcer Vincent "Big Vince" Filipelli was jailed three weeks ago on gambling and extortion charges.

Canalichio, who was arrested at his South Jersey home Wednesday, was charged with cocaine trafficking. He pleaded not guilty yesterday during a brief hearing before U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Caracappa in federal court in Philadelphia.

Caracappa ordered Canalichio released on a bond secured by the deed to his home on Ganttown Road in the Turnersville section of Washington Township. He was also ordered to wear an electronic monitor and was placed on limited house arrest.

Canalichio and Christopher Kerr were charged in a seven-count federal indictment unsealed Wednesday. Kerr is scheduled to appear at an arraignment and bail hearing today.

According to the indictment, Canalichio set up three drug deals in South Philadelphia in June 2004. In each, Kerr supplied about four ounces of cocaine to a buyer who was cooperating with federal investigators.

The fact that authorities waited more than two years to bring charges in the case has fueled speculation that Canalichio is a target in a broader probe.

His attorney, Joseph Santaguida, said yesterday that he originally thought his client was going to be arrested on illegal-gambling charges. In June, the FBI raided Canalichio's home and an apartment on Snyder Avenue out of which he and Kerr allegedly operated.

No drugs were found, but authorities reportedly seized records and documents tied to a gambling operation. According to two sources familiar with the case, one of the items seized at the Ganttown Road home was a book labeled "Daddy's book... do not open." Inside, authorities said, were names and dollar amounts that investigators believe was a list of gamblers and the amounts they owed or were owed.

Canalichio, a onetime close associate of jailed mob leader Steven Mazzone, has two prior convictions. He was sentenced to 27 months in prison after pleading guilty to a federal cocaine-distribution charge in 1998. Three years later, he pleaded guilty to receiving stolen property and was sentenced to three years' probation.

Since Mazzone's arrest in 2000, Canalichio has been identified by federal and local investigators as a key player in the Ligambi organization.

Law enforcement sources say Canalichio's arrest is one piece of a broader probe into the crime family. That investigation is focusing on gambling, extortion, loan-sharking and three unsolved murders: the November 2003 shooting of John "Johnny Gongs" Casasanto, the January 2002 ambush of Raymond "Long John" Martorano, and the October 1999 slaying of Ron Turchi.

Like the charges against Canalichio yesterday, the arrest of Filipelli last month raised more questions than it has answered. The bulky former professional body-builder was charged with using threats of violence to collect debts for a mob bookmaking operation.

The operation was reportedly run by a South Philadelphia gambler now living in the Cherry Hill area. No one else has been charged in the case, but the bookmaker is believed to have ties to the Ligambi organization.

Vincent Federico - the convicted killer who became a made man in the Mafia while on a weekend prison furlough in a ceremony that was bugged by the FBI - will be paroled for Christmas after he disavowed any mob ties, the Herald has learned.

Federico, now 46, is a second-degree lifer at MCI-Norfolk in connection with the murder of a Cambridge man, Robert McFarlane, who was hit by five bullets as he helped a friend move out of a North End apartment above Federico's in 1977.

Federico had argued with the victim for no apparent reason before shooting him five times on Hanover Street, according to the parole decision. Federico is scheduled for release Dec. 15.

While imprisoned, Federico was granted a furlough, a weekend pass from prison that allowed him to become one of four men to be baptized into the Providence-based Patriarca crime family at a ceremony held in the basement of Federico's sister's Medford home on Oct. 29, 1989.

During the ceremony, which was overseen by reputed boss Raymond "Junior" Patriarca, the inductees pricked their trigger fingers, drew blood and burned a holy card of the crime family's patron saint while vowing: "As burns this saint so will burn my soul. I enter alive into this organization and leave it dead."

The baptism was secretly audiotaped by disgraced FBI head John Connolly, now facing the death penalty in Miami on murder conspiracy charges.

The FBI bug in the Medford basement was long considered the most important incursion ever by law enforcement into the innermost sanctums of organized crime, and the tapes helped bring down the Patriarca family.

Federico's pledge to protect mobsters was a major concern to the parole board, according to the decision.

"A focal point of deliberations during the past decade is Mr. Federicos much-publicized conduct in 1989, while incarcerated, with organized crime," the decision reads. "In a letter dated 2005, Mr. Federico expresses his regret and remorse of becoming involved with persons associated with organized crime."

When writing his letter, Federico apparently forgot the words of Biagio DiGiacomo, who baptized him and three other mobsters in 1989: "We get in alive in this organization and the only way we're going to get out is dead."

Authorities Confirm Investigation Into Dead Officer's Past (KTVU)

KTVU-TV, November 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Federal authorities confirmed Thursday an investigation into the past actions of San Francisco police Officer Donald Ramirez, who died of an apparent suicide last month in a Cambodian jail cell where he was being held for sex crimes.

The death of Officer Donald Ramirez, 50, has some in and around the Police Department calling for a renewed investigation into whether he was traveling for years to Southeast Asia for sexual tourism -- a name given to the crime of traveling overseas to solicit children for sex.

On the evening of Oct. 31, police Sgt. Neville Gittens confirmed that Ramirez, a 25-year veteran of the force, had killed himself days earlier in a jail cell in Phnom Penh, Cambodia. Local authorities had apparently arrested Ramirez for sexual activity with a 14-year girl.

A spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement said Thursday that Ramirez had been under investigation since 2001 when the San Francisco Police Department reported his suspicious travels.

According to Virginia Kice, immigration officials searched Ramirez as he came into the country several times but they never found any evidence of a crime.

"We have received several new leads and we will pursue those vigorously," Kice said.

Akha human rights activist Matthew McDaniel says he told an FBI agent that Ramirez "… had a real appetite for underage girls" when the agent contacted him a decade ago in Burma. McDaniel became aware of Ramirez and his habits when the officer frequented the village of Chiang Rei on the Thai-Burmese border when the activist lived there in the mid-1990s.

And McDaniel and sources in the police department told KTVU reporter Rita Williams that other officers sometimes accompanied Ramirez on his extended visits and returned to work to brag about it.

Thursday, the mayor reacted by saying that there will be an internal investigation in the police department to see who knew what and when.

"Look, we take this seriously. I take this seriously," said Mayor Newsom. "We're going to do what's appropriate."

Police Chief Heather Fong also addressed questions about the renewed investigation into Ramirez's past and whether anyone in the department knew whether or not he traveled to Southeast Asia for sexual tourism.

"As the federal investigation moves forward, and there's information, the department will take any necessary steps," Fong said. "If people had factual information then that is a problem. We are law enforcement officers who are sworn to protect the public and to enforce the law, so if someone is aware of criminal activity and they choose not to do anything about it, that is a problem."

Police commissioner Joe Veronese said last week of the investigation that "there was no greater issue in the department than this." The police commission, however, has yet to announce if it will take up the issue.

Other police organizations are staying away from any involvement in the incident.

"Whatever he does in his off-duty time is his matter," Police Officers Association Vice President Kevin Martin said. "This is not a POA issue."

FEDERAL AUTHORITIES INVESTIGATE DEAD SF OFFICER'S PAST (BAYCNW)

Fired Banker Held Without Bond In $29 Million Embezzlement (ABJ)

Akron Beacon Journal, November 17, 2006

CLEVELAND - A former KeyBank vice president accused of embezzling $29 million is a risk to flee and must be jailed to await his trial, a federal magistrate ruled Thursday in denying bond for the suspect.

Magistrate Judge Patricia A. Hemann said the overseas travels of David F. Verhotz, 56, of Cleveland, likely gave him contacts that would be useful if he fled. In addition, she noted that more than $8 million is still missing.

Verhotz was arrested Saturday at Cleveland Hopkins International Airport after getting off a flight from Dallas. He was a senior vice president and director of the international division of Cleveland-based KeyBank.

An affidavit filed by the FBI said Verhotz took out loans in the names of three European banks and put the money in his accounts.

The bank has fired Verhotz.

Comal Woman Admits Guilt In Bank Fraud (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, November 17, 2006

Nancy Lynn Limmer has been a New Braunfels councilwoman and bank branch manager, but on Thursday she became a federal felon.

In a federal court hearing in San Antonio, Limmer, 44, admitted that she defrauded more than $161,000 from the First Commercial Bank in New Braunfels, where she'd worked for 17 years.

DOJ_NMG_0095808

Accompanied by her husband, Limmer quietly answered questions from U.S. Magistrate Judge Nancy Nowak and pleaded guilty to one count of bank fraud. She admitted misappropriating money from customers' accounts at the branch she headed in New Braunfels between April 2002 and August 2005.

Her crime was discovered last year after customers reported irregularities in their accounts to the Seguin-based bank, officials have said.

Limmer left the bank at the same time she quit the New Braunfels City Council, in July 2005, just two months after being elected.

"She obviously recognizes that she made a tremendous error," her lawyer, Van Hilley, said after the hearing. "She's done everything she can to rectify it."

That includes cooperating with the FBI and striking a plea deal before Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom McHugh presented the case to a grand jury.

Hilley told the judge Limmer's conduct has "weighed heavily on her" in the Comal County community, where her husband works as a deputy sheriff.

Hilley said Limmer acted alone, and her husband was unaware of her illegal acts.

"He was polygraphed and completely exonerated," Hilley said. "It was a unilateral action on her part."

The charge carries a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison, but because of Limmer's quick plea, she will win points toward her sentencing.

Hilley estimated she could face a sentence of about 30 months.

Sentencing was scheduled for Feb. 8 before U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia. gcontreras@express-news.net

Adviser's Fraud Spree Ends With Guilty Pleas (HARTC)

By Kenneth R. Gosselin, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, November 17, 2006

Avon investment adviser David M. Faubert lived the high life for five years, taking lavish vacations, buying expensive cars and developing a love for the Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun casinos.

But that lifestyle costs money. And as Faubert racked up $1 million in gambling losses and became a heavy cocaine user, he found a new source of financing: more than $4.5 million of his clients' money.

Faubert, 50, of Simsbury, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of embezzlement from an employee benefit plan and four counts of filing false tax returns, all between 2000 and 2005.

Tuesday's plea agreement in a criminal case against Faubert is the most recent development in a case that started 18 months ago. In early 2005, federal and state securities regulators filed lawsuits accusing Faubert of defrauding clients, some of them elderly and living in Greater Hartford.

It is unclear whether the 21 clients caught in the deception Faubert devised will recoup their money. Securities regulators in Connecticut said Tuesday they are pursuing that course, but declined to comment further.

Faubert's attorney, Hubert Santos, couldn't be reached for comment on Tuesday. Faubert is free on bail of $25,000.

According to court documents, Faubert persuaded his victims to transfer money from mutual funds and variable annuities. He told them he would invest their money in "fixed accounts" with a guaranteed return of 8 percent.

But those accounts did not exist, and Faubert diverted the money into business and personal accounts for his own use, the documents said.

Faubert, who owned Faubert Financial Group Inc., perpetrated the fraud by mailing false monthly financial statements with the "representation that certain monies were earning the promised return," according to the documents.

The documents paint a portrait of a life spinning out of control. In 2001, Faubert began to frequent Foxwoods, and then Mohegan Sun. He played the slot machines and traveled to the casino several times a week for "as much as three to four hours at a time,"the documents said. Faubert told law enforcement authorities that he lost more than $1 million between 2000 and April 2005.

Faubert told authorities that he began using cocaine in 2003 and became a "heavy user" a year later. He said he has been "addressing" his cocaine "problem" since March 2005.

Faubert also embezzled from his company's retirement plan and filed false income tax returns for 2000 through 2003, court documents said.

The Securities and Exchange Commission wrapped up its civil case last year. Faubert was ordered to pay $3.8 million to defrauded clients and $3.7 million in fines. But an SEC official in Boston said Tuesday that no payments have been made.

Faubert faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 on each of the mail fraud counts, five years and a $250,000 fine on the embezzlement count, and three years and a $100,000 fine on each charge of filing false tax returns.

Sentencing guidelines in the plea agreement call for up to eight years in prison and as much as $125,000 in fines. The judge does not have to adhere to those guidelines. Sentencing is set for Jan. 31.

Avon Broker Admits Stealing More Than $4 Million From Investors (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, November 17, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- The owner of an Avon firm admitted Tuesday to using more than $4 million stolen from investors for gambling, lavish vacations and expensive cars, federal authorities said.

David M. Faubert, 50, of Simsbury, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of embezzlement from an employee benefit plan and four counts of filing false tax returns.

Faubert, owner of Faubert Investment Group, Inc., provided insurance and other financial services to about 225 clients. Faubert told clients that he would guarantee them an 8 percent rate of return if the clients invested money in a fixed investment account he controlled, authorities said.

As a result of Faubert's promises, 21 clients provided him with about $5.5 million. But authorities say the fixed investment account did not exist, and Faubert deposited the money into his business and personal accounts.

As part of the scheme, Faubert spent about $4.45 million on gambling, vacations and cars for his personal use and for business expenses, authorities said.

In order to lull the investors into believing that the investments were earning the promised rate of return, Faubert mailed false monthly financial statements to his clients.

"Crimes committed by registered investment advisers who victimize individuals hoping for a relatively modest return on their investments are particularly reprehensible," said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor. "We will argue for a strict sentence for this defendant, and will vigorously prosecute any broker who robs from trusting investors."

Faubert also embezzled $27,079 from his company's retirement plan by falsely telling two employees that the money had been withheld from their paychecks and invested in the retirement plan.

Faubert filed false income tax returns for 2000 through 2003 because he failed to report the funds he embezzled from the investment clients, resulting in a tax loss to the government of nearly $1 million.

Faubert faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 on each of the mail fraud counts, five years and a $250,000 fine on the embezzlement count and three years and a $100,000 fine on each charge of filing false tax returns. He will be sentenced on Jan. 31.

Jail Worker Gets 15-Year Sentence For Child Porn (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini, The Tampa Tribune

Tampa Tribune, November 17, 2006

TAMPA - A former Polk County sheriff's employee was sentenced Thursday morning to 15 years in federal prison after pleading guilty to child pornography charges.

After he is released, James Patrick Odle, 24, of Winter Haven, will be on probation indefinitely under the terms of his sentence.

Odle was a civilian detention technician at the South County Jail in Frostproof when investigators from the FBI's Innocent Images Task Force searched his room in his parents' home.

The search occurred after Odle transmitted 32 images of explicit child pornography during an Internet chat session, according to Odle's plea agreement.

A forensic examination of his computers and electronic storage devices revealed more than 5,000 images, including three video files, of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Specialists such as Odle work in the jail control room, monitoring video and opening electronic doors, Polk sheriff's office Chief of Staff Gary Hester said.

Odle had been suspended without pay since November 2005 and left in June, Hester said.

Former Dean Admits To Child Porn Charge (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A former dean at University of San Francisco's School of Education has agreed to plead guilty to a child pornography charge and serve more than 5 years in prison, federal prosecutors said.

William T. Garner, 66, of San Francisco, acknowledged in the plea deal that he knowingly possessed more than 15,000 images of minors engaged in sexually explicit acts, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

"The children depicted in these images are the victims of horrible abuse, and we will vigorously prosecute individuals possessing these materials," Ryan said in a statement.

Calls to Garner's lawyer were not immediately returned late Wednesday.

Garner and prosecutors agreed to recommend a 63-month prison sentence, a fine of $12,500 and $50,000 in restitution to be paid to the San Francisco Child Abuse Prevention Center, Ryan said. The penalties still must be approved by a judge.

The maximum penalty for the charge is a 10-year prison term and a $250,000 fine.

Garner was formerly the dean of the School of Education at USF. He retired from the university in July, said USF spokesman Gary McDonald.

Networking Exec Blasts Wiretapping Rules (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, November 17, 2006

Requirements for broader wiretapping on Net phone and broadband connections are too costly, unwieldy, says Global Crossing.

WASHINGTON--An executive from a company that manages a large portion of the Internet's infrastructure on Thursday slammed federal wiretapping rules expected to take effect next spring.

Paul Kouroupas, vice president of regulatory affairs for Global Crossing, strongly criticized the Federal Communications Commission's broadening of a 1994 law--originally intended to cover telephone providers--as disproportionately costly, complex, and riddled with privacy concerns. His company is one of the world's largest Internet backbone providers.

"Our customers are large Fortune 500 companies--not too many of those companies are conducting drug deals or terrorist activities out of Merrill Lynch's offices or using their phones in that way," Kouroupas said at an event here sponsored by the DC Bar Association. "By and large we don't get wiretap requests, yet we're faced with the costs to come into compliance," which he estimated at $1 million.

At issue is an order issued last fall by the Federal Communications Commission that set a deadline of May 14, 2007, by which most broadband and Internet phone providers are required to reengineer their networks for easier snooping by law enforcement. The move expanded the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or CALEA, which Congress wrote to impose obligations on telephone companies, but not Internet providers.

Even without the new FCC rules, police have the legal authority to conduct Internet wiretaps, but they have claimed the need for a "standardized" system. The formal broadening of the rules followed lobbying from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Justice Department, which said they needed to be able to eavesdrop more readily on criminals who spurned traditional telephone lines.

Kouroupas questioned repeatedly whether the rules create an appropriate balance between law enforcement needs and communication provider obligations. After all, he said, federal and state courts only signed off on about 1,700 wiretaps last year. (The secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court authorized about 2,000 more, some of which involved terrorism investigations.) If the government doesn't have the budget to finance its own tapping technology, then why, Kouroupas asked, should it have the right to "deputize the telecommunications industry" to do that work?

Tom Beers, an official in the FCC's Homeland Security Bureau, said companies can file for financial assistance in making their systems compliant--but only if they're able to successfully satisfy 11 criteria outlined by the law.

The agency also plans to stand firm with the May 2007 deadline, he said. In fact, the days of "endless" extensions for achieving CALEA compliance are effectively over for any broadband or voice-over Internet protocol company, he said, because most deployed their equipment after October 1998, thereby exempting them from relief.

Kouroupas and Global Crossing aren't alone in balking at the mandate. A group of organizations and companies that included Sun Microsystems, Pulver.com, the American Association of Community Colleges, the Association of American Universities and the American Library Association lodged an appeal against the rules last fall. But a divided appeals court panel upheld the FCC's rules, dismissing the group's argument that Congress never intended CALEA to force broadband providers--and networks at corporations and universities--to build in surveillance hubs for the police.

for voice-over Internet protocol traffic? If the cops approach Global Crossing for the voice data alone, the company doesn't have ready access to that isolated stream, Kouroupas said, so it would probably be forced to hand over all of the packets traveling over that company's network.

"Is that really allowed?" he asked. "Aren't these wiretaps supposed to be narrowly tailored?"

Maura Quinn, unit chief of the FBI's CALEA Implementation Unit, acknowledged that it's difficult for officials to say authoritatively who is covered and not covered by the law.

"If there's any question of whether you need to comply," Quinn added, "CALEA is the law of the land, and it's expected people will comply with that."

Man Arrested In Burglary At Site Of Slaying (WP)

By Allison Klein And Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A burglary at a Northwest Washington townhouse has drawn the attention of D.C. homicide detectives investigating the unsolved slaying of a prominent lawyer three months ago at the same address.

Police have arrested a 36-year-old man in the burglary of the house, which was unoccupied during the break-in Oct. 30. Authorities quoted the man, Phelps Collins, as saying that he got inside with help from a friend -- the brother of the townhouse's owner.

Detectives have not drawn a connection between the break-in and the stabbing of Robert Wone on Aug. 2, but homicide detectives have been looking into the burglary in hopes of uncovering potential leads, authorities said. Wone, 32, was stabbed in the chest while visiting friends at the home in the 1500 block of Swann Street NW, on the edge of Dupont Circle.

New details about the burglary emerged through interviews, court papers and testimony at a hearing for Collins this week in D.C. Superior Court. Collins was arrested last Friday on a burglary charge.

Police said Collins told them that the friend, Michael Price, had a key to the house because it belonged to his brother, Joe Price. Police also quoted Collins as saying that Michael Price turned off the alarm once the two men entered the house. About $7,700 worth of electronics were stolen, police said.

Michael Price has not been charged in the burglary. He could not be located to comment.

After the break-in, detectives went to nearby pawnshops and found an audio system, two DVD players and other stolen goods, which led them to Collins, authorities said. Police also found a CD changer in a search of Collins's home on Calvert Street NW. Collins sold other stolen items on the street for money or drugs, they said.

Joe Price, a lawyer at a Washington firm, told police that he did not know Collins but that he had heard of him through his brother, according to an affidavit filed by police to get the search warrant for Collins's residence. Joe Price also told police that "his brother is known to use drugs and hang with subjects who use drugs on a regular basis," the affidavit said. Price told police that he did not give his brother or Collins permission to enter his house or remove and sell his property, the affidavit states.

Collins was jailed after his arrest and has been moved to a halfway house pending more hearings. His public defender declined to comment.

The Swann Street homeowners -- Joe Price and Victor Zaborsky -- were on vacation at the time of the break-in, police have said.

Joe Price, Zaborsky and another man, Dylan Ward, were in the home when Wone was killed there, police said. Wone, a lawyer for Radio Free Asia, worked late that night and was staying at the house instead of going to his home in Oakton. His body was found on a sofa bed in a guest room.

Police have offered no motive for the killing. Joe Price, Zaborsky and Ward have said they did not see what happened. They have said they believe Wone was killed by an intruder who slipped in and out of the back door without notice.

Until the break-in, police expressed doubt about the intruder theory. There was no sign of forced entry, the killer used a knife from the kitchen, and the crime scene appeared to have been cleaned before officers arrived, police said.

Investigators have convened a grand jury and enlisted the help of the FBI in the homicide. They kept control of the $1.2 million house for more than three weeks after the killing, removing flooring, pieces of walls, a chunk of staircase, the washing machine and sink traps in a search for blood and other evidence.

Although he is not charged in the burglary, Michael Price also faces legal trouble. He was arrested in Silver Spring hours after the break-in, accused of stealing a 1998 Mercury Sable belonging to his domestic partner, who had reported it stolen. During the arrest, Montgomery County police found a "broken glass pipe," the kind that often is used to smoke cocaine, in the pocket of his sweat pants, according to charging papers.

Collins, who is unemployed, has a criminal history that includes four drug convictions between 1998 and 2004 in the District and Montgomery, records show.

Authorities said some items taken in the burglary turned up at Sam's Pawnbrokers on 14th Street NW, a few blocks away.

Sam Levy, a manager at the store, said in an interview that Collins had pawned goods at the shop in the past. Detectives visited the store last week to retrieve the items.

Levy said a detective whom he declined to identify told him that the burglary is "connected possibly to a homicide."

Stores Protect Turf From Gangs Of Thieves (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, November 17, 2006

SEMINOLE, Fla. — Justin Reed is scanning images from 18 cameras at a Beall's department store here when saleswoman Carissa Tunis calls from the juniors department to direct his attention to four young men behaving oddly.

Reed, sitting in the store's so-called loss-prevention room, zeros in on the men and sees one slip a wallet in his pocket. He goes back over the image a few times to be sure. When another camera shows the group leaving the store, Reed and Jim Stevenson, a Beall's loss-prevention senior manager, slip out the security door and nab a 17-year-old.

As the two beefy investigators hustle the teen back inside, he pleads that he's just off probation. They call the police anyway. Within minutes, he's the first of two shoplifters arrested during four hours that USA TODAY spent observing the store's crime-fighting efforts.

On this November day, the culprit is a fairly harmless high school dropout. But the retail industry spends billions on technology and investigators such as Reed to combat what they call “organized theft rings”: gangs of shoplifters who sweep through stores with military precision. The retailers are fighting back with a new national crime database, electronic receipts, digital video recording technology and their own brand of detective work.

Stymied by police and courts that are often unwilling or unable to tackle crimes they may see as petty theft, the retailers build their own cases against the gangs, connecting crimes that often cross county and state lines. To help document the scope of this organized thievery, investigators for Walgreens, Target, Safeway, Limited Brands and others even follow thieves from their stores to the “fences” where they sell the goods.

The FBI and retail groups expect that by the end of this year, every major retailer will be able to share crime data — including photos of suspects from their store cameras — in a computer database. Beall's, a Florida-based chain, and other retailers now track shoplifting gangs using the database, which has already helped link a suspect to thefts of $500,000 worth of goods from 12 retailers. The man is still a fugitive, but warrants for his arrest are out in three states.

Retail theft cost the industry more than $37 billion last year, up from $31 billion in 2003, according to a University of Florida report. It is especially problematic during the holiday season when overcrowded stores make shoplifting more difficult to detect and fraudulent returns easier to conceal. The retail federation said this month that retailers expect to lose $3.5 billion due to just fraudulent returns this holiday season alone.

“Our retail loss numbers are below the industry average, but it is a tremendous amount of work to keep it that way,” says Daniel Doyle, Beall's vice president of loss prevention and chairman of an NRF loss-prevention committee. He wouldn't say how much the company spends on loss prevention.

Retailers are particularly concerned about gangs, which have established supply chains that make organized theft, known as “boosting,” too profitable to give up without a fight.

A single shoplifter operating as part of a gang can steal up to $200,000 worth of merchandise in a weekend, retail and police investigators say.

One night last August, Beall's cameras caught a gang of exotic dancers that stole about $170 worth of goods from the Bradenton store, police records show. Apparel from other retailers filled the women's rented SUV. Two of the three women, who worked for an exotic dancing and escort service called Black Xtasy, admitted that they were traveling the state to steal. The suspected ringleader had retail theft warrants against her in two other Florida counties.

Jerry Biggs, Walgreens' divisional coordinator for organized retail crime, says one group shoplifted from 24 of the drugstores in seven hours. In a videotaped interview with police and Biggs, admitted Walgreens shoplifter Jesus Hernandez said he could easily boost $10,000 worth of merchandise in four hours. Hernandez specialized in stealing diabetic test-strip packages, which sell for up to $100.

In one Walgreens investigation, a shoplifter's fence was caught with $35,000 worth of chewing gum 10-packs.

During a typical boosting, one or more gang members distract store clerks while one or two others lift merchandise. Some members stand outside the store doors, ready to signal if police or security officials are coming. Still others are in parking lots ready with getaway cars.

The gangs often are armed. One Beall's investigator was hospitalized last year after being pummeled by a man wearing brass knuckles who was serving as a gang's lookout.

The thieves usually seem to be one step ahead of security devices. Even locked glass display cases can be cracked. Fourteen Target stores in California, Illinois and Colorado were hit by thieves who broke open locked cases, filled carts with iPods and pushed the carts out the doors.

Professional shoplifters usually carry shopping bags lined with foil and duct tape to block the electric current that detects security tags.

Some thieves remove security tags and hide things under larger packages.

Anti-theft systems "only work against people who don't know how to thwart them," says Tony Heredia, Target's director of investigations. "We call them organized thieves for a reason."

Retailers worry about frustrating paying customers while attempting to thwart thieves. "We want to keep customers happy," Biggs says. "But the things that keep them happy, like keeping large quantities of merchandise readily available, also keep thieves happy."

Doyle says his investigators are "200% sure" before they apprehend a likely shoplifter, so they don't cause a customer-relations nightmare.

Returns are one area where retailers have cracked down. While some will still give cash for a return without a receipt, many major retailers require receipts. And many are using electronic receipts that can track purchases made with a credit card or check. These receipts nearly eliminate the ability to use counterfeit receipts or to return stolen goods. They also use display devices that make it difficult to slide all the items on a hanging rack into a bag, but not too difficult for legitimate customers to use.

"The retail world is so competitive that they are deathly afraid of alienating any customer or raising a ruckus," says Peter Junger, president and founder of the electronic receipt company SiRAS.com, used by retailers including Wal-Mart.

Prosecuting retail crime is complicated in part because much of the merchandise stolen doesn't come with serial numbers. That makes it difficult to single it out as stolen.

Unless goods are made under a retailer's private label and the store has alerted police of a theft, police who stop the driver of a car full of stolen items are "probably not going to arrest them and, most likely, they're not even going to hold the merchandise," Biggs says. "Part of what we do is help police pursue criminal charges."

Eric Ives, unit chief for the FBI's major theft unit, which includes organized retail crime, says most of the FBI's retail crime cases come from retailers who have already done their own national surveillance and proved the interstate component the FBI needs.

Montgomery County, Md., Detective David Hill is one of the few detectives in the USA who specializes in retail crime full time. He arrested former Bush administration official Claude Allen earlier this year for felony theft after he repeatedly returned items he hadn't paid for. Allen pleaded guilty to misdemeanor theft. Hill says he got ribbed by colleagues who called him "mall man" when he took the post.

But that's quieted now that he's found connections to drug dealing and other crimes and has helped bust several organized theft rings, including a Peruvian and Colombian gang that was caught at a Maryland mall in February 2005 with $50,000 worth of apparel stolen in less than an hour.

"It definitely was a case that shows how much damage they can do in a short amount of time," Hill says.

"The criminal world has recognized this as a much more profitable crime than burglary with much less penalty," Biggs says.

Indeed, while larceny overall was down 4.5% from 2000 to 2004, shoplifting increased nearly 12%, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report.

In Florida, the arrest of the shoplifting strippers at Beall's Bradenton store led police to a warehouse in Ocala, Fla., that they suspect was being run by a fence serving multiple gangs.

"We certainly hate to hear about groups, because they are difficult to catch, particularly with all the aliases," says Tim Osborne, a Beall's loss-prevention director who was on the scene when the strippers were arrested. "We were fortunate that night."

Armed Robbers Hit String Of City Bars (BSUN)

By Annie Linskey

The Baltimore Sun, November 17, 2006

A masked man put a gun to the head of a bartender at Dizzy Issie's and demanded that she open the register while he counted to five. The man yelled, "Keep down don't move" to the 50 or so people at the hipster Remington bar. A second man, also masked, stood lookout at a side door.

DOJ_NMG_0095814

After prying the till free, the pair ran out with about $800 and hopped into a waiting car. Shaken customers picked themselves up. Several called police, and then everyone cleared out for the night.

Police say they believe the same men have held up eight bars in the past three weeks, usually the same way.

Either two or three men enter the tavern wearing gloves and masks or bandanas to cover their faces, according to police. One man, waving a gun, immediately jumps behind the bar and, in most cases, removes the entire cash drawer. Another man stands as a lookout and prevents people from leaving the bar.

"We're pursuing this very aggressively," said Matt Jablow, a police spokesman. "This is unusual for us. We're giving it a lot of attention."

In addition to the Tuesday night robbery at Dizzy Issie's, police believe the group is responsible for holding up three other bars this week -- one in Charles Village on Monday night, one in Upper Fells Point late Wednesday and another in Pigtown early Thursday morning. In recent weeks other bars have been held up in Remington, Mill Hill and Carroll-South Hilton in West Baltimore.

"It was really, really quick," said Gary Deane, the owner of I Bar, a cozy Charles Village watering hole that was robbed of about $350 Monday night. "I told the police it was almost military, the way he was in [and] out." Deane said he didn't know until after the robbery that a second man was standing at the door preventing people from leaving.

The tavern is a tiny room with exposed brick walls, a flat-screen television and a square bar. When one man flashed a gun, he said, most customers immediately crouched for cover.

"I was the only one left standing," Deane said. "It was a very frightening thing when it happened." Later, the police came and some customers trickled out. But others stuck around to exchange war stories. The next day, he said, 90 percent of his customers returned.

Police said the robbers want the cash register and don't ask customers for money. But at Molly's Public House, a Remington corner bar in a converted rowhouse that was robbed Nov. 1, one customer was apparently so flustered that he emptied the cash in pockets onto the bar without being instructed to do so.

The robbers scooped up the man's $8 as they fled with the till, according to the police report.

Getaway vehicles

Police believe the robbers have used three different escape cars: a red Dodge pickup, a black Volkswagen station wagon and a brown Mercedes. "We're cautiously optimistic that we'll make arrests in these cases," Jablow said.

In the Northern district, where three of the eight robberies have occurred, police have stepped up patrols and have additional plainclothes officers in the area.

"They are pretty brazen to do something like this," said Northern District Deputy Major Ross Buzzuro, "This is not the norm. We want this to stop. We don't want anybody to get hurt."

Buzzuro said he believes the bars are targets of opportunity: "It is a quick way for people to get money." But, he cautioned, "these are dangerous individuals."

Remington targeted

One community particularly hard-hit is Remington, an up-and-coming residential neighborhood with a strong community association. Situated several blocks south of the Johns Hopkins University and the Baltimore Museum of Art, it attracts a mix of students and artists but also has families who have lived there for decades.

"Something needs to be done," said Elaine Stevens, the owner of Dizzy Issie's, which counts filmmaker John Waters among its patrons. Stevens said she has been a bar owner in the city for 20 years and has never experienced anything like this.

Stevens, however, was gratified that nobody was shot. And, she said, the loyalty of her customers surprised her. When the robbers left, people hugged each other. Customers left $200 cash on a table for various bills -- even though with the register out of service they couldn't settle up.

And the next day many of those who had left the bar without paying came in with money:

"My customers said they weren't going to be scared away."

District Slayings Usually With Gun (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The District is among the major U.S. cities with the highest percentage of people being killed by firearms, despite having one of the strictest gun-control laws in the country.

A recent Metropolitan Police Department report on homicides from 2001 to 2005 states that 901 of 1,126 homicide victims, or about 80 percent, were fatally shot.

"It's a problem," Chief Charles H. Ramsey said. "It may be something that's with us for a while."

Firearms last year alone were used to commit 157 of the District's 196 homicides, or about 80 percent. That percentage has remained relatively consistent since 2001, when a five-year low of 78.4 percent of homicides were committed using guns.

FBI crime statistics for 2005 show 10,100 of the country's 14,860 homicide victims, or 68 percent, were killed by guns.

The District's percentage of gun homicides is comparable to those in other big cities, according to the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics.

In 2004, the last year for which comprehensive statistics were available, the 79.3 percent of homicides involving guns in the District was higher than the 61.1 percent in New York. Chicago reported 75.2 percent, and Baltimore had 77.5 percent.

Atlanta had a significantly lower percentage of gun homicides than the District, 73.2 percent, despite less-restrictive gun laws. In Georgia, gun owners are not required to obtain a license or a permit, there is no waiting period to buy a handgun and no background check for second-party sales.

The District did have a lower percentage of gun homicides than New Orleans at 92 percent, Los Angeles at 80.9 percent and Detroit at 80.5 percent.

D.C. law restricts ownership of most guns that were not registered before 1977. Privately owned rifles and shotguns must be kept at home and stored unloaded, disassembled, or bound by a trigger lock or a similar device.

Michael Campbell, a spokesman for the Washington field office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said that part of the problem is the District being surrounded by jurisdictions with less-restrictive regulations.

"You can't seal the borders," he said. "There's always going to be a market for guns."

Chief Ramsey agreed.

"We have tough gun laws, but most of our guns are coming from Virginia and Maryland," he said.

D.C. police have recovered nearly 2,400 guns thus far this year, the most during the past five years. Those figures do not include the 337 guns turned in as part of a gun buy-back program in September.

Chief Ramsey thinks most gun owners are responsible, thus is not in favor of eliminating gun ownership.

"Guns and our society go hand in hand," the chief said. But he favors "very, very stiff penalties" for people who violate the law.

The District's firearms restrictions, which were passed in 1976, include a maximum one-year penalty or $1,000 fine for first-time offenders and a maximum five-year penalty or $5,000 fine for second offenders.

"To me, that's not strong enough," the police chief said.

Carrying a pistol without a license in the District can be either a felony or a misdemeanor charge, depending on whether the offender was carrying the pistol someplace other than in his or her home or business.

Felons convicted of firearms possession can get up to 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine. Felons who use a firearm during the commission of a violent crime can receive a maximum 15-year prison sentence. Possessing unregistered ammunition always is a misdemeanor.

Corruption Target Faces Sex Charges (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong And Paul Pringle, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

John Malburg, son of the Vernon mayor and a focus of a voter-fraud case, allegedly molested boys while dean at an L.A. Catholic school.

A political corruption scandal took a sordid turn Thursday when a defendant in the Vernon voter-fraud prosecution was charged with sexually molesting four boys while serving as dean of students at Daniel Murphy Catholic High School.

John Joseph Malburg, son of Vernon Mayor Leonis Malburg, who is also accused in the corruption case, pleaded not guilty to numerous counts of child sexual abuse, lewd acts and making a videotape for sale of a minor engaged in sex acts.

Authorities said one student appeared in a sexually explicit tape in exchange for a higher grade. In addition, Malburg, 37, is charged with possessing child pornography and secretly videotaping boys while they showered at his Hancock Park home.

As an offshoot of the 19-month corruption probe, investigators began to examine Malburg's contact with the boys over a period of 10 years, according to the Los Angeles County district attorney's office.

The Archdiocese of Los Angeles learned about the sex abuse inquiry sometime before Malburg was fired in July but did not notify parents at the Fairfax-area school, spokesman Tod M. Tamberg said.

Tamberg said the district attorney's office asked the archdiocese to keep the matter confidential. Jane Robison, a district attorney's spokeswoman, could not confirm that.

"The school has been cooperating fully," Tamberg said. He said there had been no earlier complaints against Malburg, who joined Daniel Murphy in 1997.

In the complaint, Malburg is accused of surreptitiously videotaping one of the students two months after the school fired him.

Outside the Detroit Street campus, several students and parents said they had not been told of the charges against Malburg and declined to discuss them.

One parent, who asked not to be named, said she was "shocked" at the news but didn't fault the school for not informing parents.

"There's no need to panic," she said.

The allegations come as the archdiocese struggles to settle more than 500 sexual abuse lawsuits. At least six of those named in the suits once worked at Daniel Murphy, although not in recent years.

Mary Grant, western director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, a group that represents alleged victims of pedophile priests, said the Malburg case "shows that nothing has changed in the L.A. Archdiocese."

She also said it "seems odd" that the archdiocese did not alert parents.

Malburg also pleaded not guilty Thursday to charges of perjury and false voter registration in connection with an alleged family-run, decades-long corruption scheme in Vernon, a tiny industrial city a few miles south of downtown Los Angeles, where his father has held elective office for more than 50 years.

Leonis Malburg pleaded not guilty to seven felony counts alleging various forms of voter fraud. His wife, Dominica, who is the younger Malburg's mother, entered a not guilty plea to two counts of voter fraud.

The Malburgs are accused of living in Hancock Park while voting in Vernon, 20 miles away.

The district attorney's office said investigators looking for evidence of corruption allegedly found child pornography on a computer seized from John Malburg's home.

They also confiscated pornographic home videos, officials said.

The 12 counts against Malburg cover alleged incidents from 1996 through 2000 and from 2004 to September of this year. He is accused of molesting a boy whom he met while working as a psychologist — before he was hired at Daniel Murphy.

Malburg was released on $495,000 bail. Approached in court, he declined to comment.

Daniel Murphy, formerly called St. John Vianney, is named for a Los Angeles philanthropist. It has produced several prominent graduates, including Los Angeles City Councilman Bernard C. Parks and Fire Chief William Bamattre.

"It's disturbing," Parks, a 1961 graduate, said of the allegations. "It doesn't help the school and it doesn't help the church."

Parks said it was particularly troubling given the extensive publicity of the archdiocese's sexual abuse crisis. "With all the press coverage on this, you wonder why there are those who still think they can get away with it," he said.

Bamattre's office did not return calls.

In the Vernon case, longtime city administrator Bruce Malkenhorst Sr. pleaded not guilty to charges that he spent $60,000 in city money for personal use, including massages, golf outings, meals and political contributions.

Malkenhorst was the highest paid municipal official in the state before stepping down two years ago. He earned more than $600,000 a year for running a city with fewer than 100 residents. The city also provided him with a limousine.

Prosecutors allege that the Malburgs and their allies ran Vernon as a fiefdom.

Earlier this year, the city hired armed private investigators to shadow candidates running against Leonis Malburg and other City Council incumbents.

The city evicted the challengers from their residences and removed their names from the ballot, although a judge later ruled that the election, Vernon's first in 25 years, had to go forward.

Malburg was reelected, but the results were disputed and the case ended up in court.

Vernon was founded in 1905 by a charismatic Basque immigrant named John Baptiste Leonis, who over the next few decades built a political machine that chased dissenters out of town.

CIVIL LAW:

Exonerated In Mob Killing, Men Seek Retribution From Government (AP)

By Jay Lindsay

BOSTON - Two Boston men spent 30 years in prison for an underworld slaying they did not commit after a judge ruled that the FBI withheld evidence that would have cleared the pair to protect a mob hitman who was serving as an informant.

Now, in a trial that opened Thursday, those men and the families of two others who were wrongfully convicted are seeking damages from the government that could total more than $100 million.

Joseph "The Animal" Barboza was a known mob assassin responsible for numerous hits during Boston's gangland wars of the 1960s. He was also so vital to FBI efforts to crack the mob that the agency allowed him to wrongly implicate four men for murder, attorneys for the plaintiffs said in opening statements.

Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone and the families of two other men who died while behind bars accuse the federal government of malicious prosecution, conspiracy and depriving the men's family of companionship.

"It was a rigged game, a charade, a story concocted by Mr. Barboza and assented to by the FBI," said attorney Austin McGuigan, who represents Salvati. "There was no hope the real story in this case would be uncovered."

The case is the latest development in a scandal that unfolded in Boston about a decade ago, when it was learned that the FBI had a corrupt relationship with the mob, protecting killers who were informants and even tipping them off to pending indictments.

The lawsuit was filed after the Justice Department released documents in 2001 that showed the FBI withheld evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men so the agency could protect an informant who actually committed the crime.

The lawsuit does not ask for a specific dollar award, but briefs filed in the case point to past decisions that have awarded $1 million for each year wrongly imprisoned, which would total more than $100 million in this case.

Justice Department attorney Bridget Lipscomb said federal authorities had no duty to share information with state prosecutors, and cannot be liable for the results of a separate state investigation. She also noted the four men had access to some FBI information, as well as top-notch attorneys who raised doubts about Barboza's testimony at their trial.

Limone, Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo were sentenced to death in 1968 for the murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan, but were not executed before the death penalty was banned in 1975. Salvati was sentenced to life in prison.

Salvati, 72, and Limone, 74, were exonerated in 2001 after the Justice Department documents were released. Greco and Tameleo died behind bars before being exonerated.

The case is being tried without a jury before U.S. District Judge Nancy Gertner.

On Thursday, attorneys for the men and their families, said the problems were rooted in a 1960s FBI policy of protecting informants identities at all costs.

Days before Deegan was shot in the head in a Chelsea alley, FBI wiretaps caught Barboza and Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi asking a Rhode Island mob boss for permission for the hit. Informants later told FBI agents that Barboza, Flemmi and three other men were responsible. FBI agent Paul Rico, who handled top echelon informants, listed Deegan as among seven people killed by Flemmi.

"The Deegan murder was literally surrounded by information that Jimmy Flemmi was one of the killers," said Michael Avery, who represents Limone and Tameleo.

But the FBI had recently recruited Flemmi as an informant and believed he would provide valuable information for years, McGuigan said. And when Barboza agreed to testify, he told the FBI he would never say anything to implicate his friend Flemmi, McGuigan said.

The FBI did not share any of this evidence with the state, Avery said, making the FBI "masters of this prosecution."

In his testimony in the Deegan case, Barboza implicated Limone, Salvati and Greco because of personal grudges, and Tameleo because an FBI agent wanted to arrest him, according to attorney Juliane Balirro, who represents Limone.

The FBI had at least 20 descriptions of the Deegan murder that conflicted with Barboza's testimony, but did not share them with prosecutors, she said.

Barboza was sentenced to a year and a day in prison after the Deegan trial, and later moved to California as the first participant of the federal witness-protection program. He was shot to death in San Francisco in 1976.

Lipscomb, the Justice Department attorney, said Barboza was subjected to more than six days of intense cross-examination during the trial, which included questions about Flemmi's possible involvement and accusations that he switched who was involved.

Trial Begins Over FBI Role In Wrongful Convictions (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 17, 2006

There's no question that the FBI recruited notorious hitman Joseph "The Animal" Barboza as a witness against local Mafia leaders, then turned him over to state prosecutors in a case that led to the wrongful conviction of four men for a 1965 gangland murder in Chelsea.

But Thursday, on the first day of a civil trial seeking more than $100 million in damages from the federal government, a Justice Department lawyer insisted the FBI can't be blamed because state prosecutors were responsible for investigating and trying the case.

"The FBI is not liable," said the government attorney, Bridget Bailey Lipscomb.

But lawyers for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati, Henry Tameleo, and Louis Greco accused the FBI of making a "mockery" of justice by failing to tell state prosecutors or defense lawyers about evidence that suggested Barboza had framed the four men for the slaying of small-time hoodlum Edward "Teddy" Deegan.

Limone, 72, and Salvati, 74, spent more than 30 years in prison before they were exonerated five years ago, while Greco and Tameleo both died in prison.

"The FBI initiated the prosecution by delivering a perjurious witness to the state prosecutor, knowing his testimony was false," said Boston attorney Juliane Balliro, who represents Limone and Tameleo's family. "But for the deliberate misconduct of the FBI, these men would not even have been indicted, let alone convicted for the murder of Edward Deegan."

The lawsuit accuses the government of malicious prosecution, intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligent supervision of FBI agents, conspiracy, and loss of consortium by the men and their families.

Deegan was gunned down in a Chelsea alley in March 1965, but local police were unable to solve the slaying until the FBI struck a deal with Barboza. He was sentenced to a year in prison for his role in Deegan's murder and his testimony led to the 1968 conviction of the four men. Tameleo, Limone, and Greco were initially given the death penalty, then later sentence to life. Salvati was also sentenced to life in prison.

Feds Pay The Price For Botched Mob Job (BOSH)

By Peter Gelzinis, Boston Herald Columnist

Boston Herald, November 17, 2006

That the prospect of justice has arrived 40 years late for Joe Salvati and Peter Limone, along with two fellow defendants who died in prison, Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo . . . is shameful.

That the Department of Justice has seen fit to send Bridget Bailey Lipscomb back to Boston to defend the putrid reputation of the FBI . . . well, that could be called a blessing.

With Ms. Lipscomb at the government table, the only question may well be how much of a potential $100 million in civil damages will these men and their families see.

Five months ago, Lipscomb's attempt to convince U.S. District Court Judge Reginald C. Lindsay that the FBI could not be blamed for enabling their Teflon rat, Whitey Bulger, to slaughter John McIntyre, turned into graceless courtroom hash.

Though Lindsay was swayed by absolutely none of it, he tossed the government a considerable bone by confining the McIntyres' award to $3.5 million instead of a possible $50 million.

This time, however, the FBI's crime is even more egregious. And the case will be heard by a different federal judge, U.S. District Court Judge Nancy Gertner.

In a nutshell: H. Paul Rico - the Darth Vader of gangster G-men and mentor to fallen FBI agent and murder defendant John "Zip" Connolly - framed four men for a murder two of his informants committed.

From the first moment, more than 40 years ago, Rico knew that Salvati, Limone, Greco and Tameleo were innocent, yet watched them go off to prison, where three languished on death row.

During yesterday's opening arguments at the Moakley Courthouse, Lipsomb countered 40 years of government treachery with the Professor Irwin Corey defense, namely:

The feds were not obliged to share information with state prosecutors (who tried the original case) and can't be held liable for the results of a separate state investigation.

Makes perfect sense, doesn't it?

In the face of such circular reasoning, Peter Limone's defense lawyer, Juliane Balliro, was moved to note, "Despite all the exposure and attention this case has received, and the fact that these men were exonerated. Despite all that was revealed during the Wolf Hearings. Despite the condemnations of a congressional committee, the government does not change its stripes. They still remain in complete denial."

If "staying the course" in Iraq means holding the U.S. death count to, say, 10 soldiers a week, then perhaps staying the course when it comes to the rancid saga of Boston FBI criminals means holding the cash award to a small fraction of what is being asked.

Will Bridget Bailey Lipscomb get accolades from her DOJ bosses if the plaintiffs in this case came away with only $10 million or $20 million payout? Would that pass for a government victory?

Because the sheer weight of the evidence suggests she cannot win on the merits. Because in this case, the feds have no merit.

Juiliane Balliro sees this moment as an opportunity "to finally connect all the many threads of this case into a rope." Too bad such a rope cannot be slipped around H. Paul Rico's neck, for the decrepit old son of Hoover expired in a Florida jail, awaiting his own murder trial. [continue]

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Democrats Pledge To Scrutinize Justice's Civil Rights Arm (BOS)

By Charlie Savage, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday vowed to impose intense oversight on the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division next year, telling a Bush administration official in charge of the agency that the next Congress will scrutinize whether civil rights laws are being properly enforced.

Speaking at the first Civil Rights Division oversight hearing since May 2002, the Democrats cited several newspaper articles about the agency over the past year -- including a Globe analysis of changes in the hiring process for lawyers in the division -- and said they would investigate the administration's stewardship of the agency after they regain power in January.

"There are disturbing reports that career lawyers have been shut out of the division's decision-making process, that the division's civil rights enforcement on behalf of racial minorities has sharply declined, and that the department has packed the division with attorneys who have no background in civil rights litigation," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will become committee chairman in January.

Senator Russell Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said he wanted to know whether the Bush administration was exerting political interference on the division's decisions about when to file cases. The agency has long been a source of political tension because it is charged with enforcing antidiscrimination laws and reviewing changes to state voting rules.

"For the separation of powers designed by the Framers to work, we in the legislative branch need to take our oversight authority seriously," Feingold said. "While this hearing is the first good step, it is just a first step. It is clear that the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice requires our attention and that one hearing will not suffice."

Wan Kim , assistant attorney general for civil rights, said he welcomed congressional attention.

"I certainly share your . . . interest in oversight," Kim said, adding that he has "a deep and abiding respect for this committee and the work that it does in making sure that all branches of government are operating consistent with the law."

One major focus by the lawmakers was a change in hiring procedures. In July, the Globe reported that in late 2002, the Bush administration disbanded a longstanding hiring committee of veteran career lawyers. Political appointees took over screening résumés, interviewing applicants, and deciding who should fill vacancies in the permanent civil service ranks.

After the change, successful applicants were significantly less likely to have civil rights backgrounds, according to a Globe analysis of résumés obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. New hires were also more likely to have conservative credentials, such as membership in the Federalist Society, a group that takes a skeptical view of aggressive civil rights enforcement.

Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, each raised the Globe article as an example of mounting "concerns" over the division's direction. Also, Leahy read a summary of the Globe's findings, then pressed Kim on whether ideology had become a factor in the hiring process.

Kim acknowledged that the hiring committees had been disbanded by then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. But he said "ideology is not a factor in my hiring process." He pledged that he would hire only "talented lawyers" who "share a commitment for the work that we do in the division."

Leahy accepted Kim's answer, but told the assistant attorney general that "I suspect during the coming year . . . we'll probably chat some more."

Specter then observed to laughter: "Sounds like a well-founded suspicion to me."

The senators also pressed Kim about several voting-rights decisions in which the division's leadership overruled career staff recommendations. In several cases, courts later rejected the division's conclusion that redistricting plans or laws were lawful.

One case involved a Georgia law that required voters without driver's licenses to buy an ID card for $20. A federal judge later blocked the law, comparing it to a Jim Crow-era "poll tax." Kim defended the Justice Department's decision to sign off on the new requirement, saying it was consistent with all relevant statutes.

Lawmakers also raised concerns about the division's process of deciding whether to bring discrimination cases. The number of cases alleging systematic discrimination against blacks has declined from previous administrations.

OC Apartment Owners Accused Of Discriminating Against Hispanics (AP)

The U.S. Justice Department sued two apartment building owners for housing discrimination Thursday, claiming they favored Vietnamese tenants over Hispanic tenants.

Gary Luke and Mary Ngo, owners of adjacent apartment complexes in Garden Grove in Orange County, violated the federal Fair Housing Act barring discrimination against people based on national origin, the government claims.

The lawsuit arose from a charge made recently by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. The suit seeks monetary damages, civil penalties and a court order prohibiting future discrimination.

Federal authorities say Luke and Ngo issued notices in the last year to Hispanic tenants telling them they had 60 days to leave so their units could be renovated.

When Hispanic tenants later tried to move back into the remodeled units, all were either told that they could not return or were promised rental applications that were never provided, authorities said.

Vacated units were later rented out to Vietnamese tenants, the government said.

In one case Luke refused to rent to a Hispanic woman, saying his "partner has in mind only to rent to Vietnamese families," the government claimed. Ngo, who co-owns one of the properties with Luke, is of Vietnamese heritage.

Luke and Ngo could not be reached for comment; their telephone numbers were unlisted.

A call after business hours to defense attorney Christine Baran, who authorities say represents Luke and Ngo in the case, was not immediately returned Thursday.

Justice Department Possibly Investigating Election Day Fliers (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A senior Justice Department official said yesterday that the misleading fliers distributed by Republicans in Maryland on Election Day may -- or may not -- be the subject of an investigation by the department's criminal division.

Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said during a Senate hearing that he believed the matter was under investigation but quickly added, "I'm not 100 percent sure about that."

Two public affairs officers at Justice Department headquarters in Washington said they could neither confirm nor deny that an investigation is underway.

The fliers -- authorized by the campaigns of Republicans Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who lost his bid for a second term, and Michael S. Steele, who was defeated in his bid for a Senate seat -- have been widely denounced for implying, incorrectly, that the two candidates were endorsed by prominent black figures including former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume and Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D).

Two Face More Charges In Sex Trafficking Case (ROBCT)

By Kate Howard, Staff Writer

Robertson County (TN) Times, November 17, 2006

Indictment says man, woman forced minor teen into sex ring

Two people are facing additional federal charges this week for allegedly forcing a Mexican teenager into prostitution as part of a sex trafficking ring that operated in Nashville and Memphis, federal officials said.

A federal grand jury in Memphis issued indictments Thursday charging Juan Mendez and Cristina Andres Perfecto with using fraud and coercion to force an adult woman and the teenager into a life of prostitution. They were charged in October with sex trafficking of children.

Federal investigators believe the teenager was smuggled into the country from Oaxaca, Mexico, and thought she was going to get a job as a waitress at a Nashville restaurant.

She was taken to a Harding Place-area apartment, where she was beaten, raped and forced to have sex with as many as 40 men per day, according to court documents.

DOJ_NMG_0095821

The girl, now 15, was taken into the custody of the state Department of Children's Services and placed with a Spanish-speaking foster family, DCS spokesman Rob Johnson said.

Raymundo Flores, Raul Santillan-Leon and Fernando Reyes-Santillan also were indicted on charges of conspiracy to launder money and harbor illegal immigrants at a brothel in Memphis, justice department officials said in a news release.

All five of those indicted were connected to the same sex-trafficking ring, according to federal officials.

Court documents said that some of the teenager's adult relatives were also lured to Tennessee with the promise of jobs and enough money to send back to their families in Mexico.

Leigh Anne Jordon, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Memphis, said Thursday night that she couldn't release any additional details on the case.

Teel Defense Requests No Interference (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, November 17, 2006

GULFPORT - Ryan Teel's attorney wants a judge to instruct the government not to interfere with the defendant's investigation in preparation of Teel's trial involving an inmate death.

The Harrison County Sheriff's Department has denied the defense a request to examine the county jail booking room and to question jail employees, according to a motion filed by Jim Davis, Teel's attorney.

Teel, a former corrections officer, is set to stand trial May 28 on criminal charges of civil rights violations in the fatal beating of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. The incident occurred in the jail booking room on Feb. 4. Regina Rhodes, also a former jailer, pleaded guilty to her role in the assault and to lying to cover it up.

Davis asked for an emergency telephone conference with a judge today to discuss his concerns.

Allowing the defense access to the booking room and jail employees is "necessary in order to properly prepare for trial," Davis wrote in his motion. He was not available for comment Thursday.

Teel is in custody at an undisclosed location.

Davis' latest motions claim Capt. Steve Campbell, who runs the sheriff's professional standards unit, agreed Nov. 7 to allow a booking room visit and witness interviews, but changed his mind the next day. Campbell said permission was needed from the U.S. Attorney's Office, an affidavit stated.

Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. declined comment and referred questions to his attorney, Cy Faneca, who said he advised the sheriff to let the U.S. Justice Department make that decision.

"We are not involved in the criminal case because the Justice Department is conducting that investigation," Faneca said. "Nobody has told us what the ground rules are, so it certainly would be prudent to let Justice make that decision."

"The sheriff and I don't want to do anything that might interfere with the investigation by the Department of Justice."

The U.S. Attorney's Office, which is prosecuting Teel in the criminal case, operates under the Justice Department.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said his office will file a response to Davis' complaint today.

"The judge has asked that we not talk about these matters so a court document is the appropriate response."

A two-count indictment was unsealed after Teel's arrest by the FBI on Aug. 28.

One count accuses Teel of depriving Williams of his civil rights under color of law by using excessive force in an attempt to kill Williams. That count carries a penalty of any number of years to life in prison.

Prosecutors could upgrade that count to seek the death penalty. They have until Feb. 16 to decide.

The second count accuses Teel of falsifying a report with the intention of impeding or obstructing justice. That count carries a penalty of up to 20 years.

Two other sealed documents were filed in court on Oct. 25. Public records show no details.

UCLA Police Stun Student In ID Dispute (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A UCLA police officer shocked a student with a stun gun at a campus library after he refused repeated requests to show student identification and wouldn't leave, police said.

The student, Mostafa Tabatabainejad, was shocked Tuesday at about 11 p.m. as police did a routine check of student IDs at the University of California, Los Angeles Powell Library computer lab.

"This is a long-standing library policy to ensure the safety of students during the late-night hours," said UCLA Police Department spokeswoman Nancy Greenstein.

She said police tried to escort Tabatabainejad, 23, out of the library after he refused to provide identification. Tabatabainejad instead encouraged others at the library to join his resistance, and when a crowd began to gather, police used the stun gun on him, Greenstein said.

Tabatabainejad was arrested for resisting and obstructing a police officer and later released on his own recognizance. He declined to comment Wednesday night.

New Focus On Affirmative Action (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson And Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The number of minorities -- particularly black Americans -- winning government contracts and being admitted to public colleges and universities in California has dwindled since a ballot measure was passed 10 years ago outlawing preferential treatment for minorities in those areas, according to a study released yesterday.

The report comes as the longtime controversy over affirmative action is gaining new attention. Michigan voters last week adopted a constitutional amendment essentially taking the same action as California, and the American Bar Association is facing criticism from some groups for strengthening its diversity requirements for accreditation of law schools.

The study of California's Proposition 209 shows that it has had a major effect, according to Ellis Cose, who wrote the report for the Institute for Justice and Journalism at the University of Southern California's Annenberg School for Communication.

At the University of California's two flagships, the campuses in Berkeley and Los Angeles, the impact of Proposition 209 was immediate: The number of black and Hispanic freshmen admitted the year after the law took effect fell by half.

In California's transportation system, the report says, two-thirds of the minority contractors certified to do business with the state when the law went into effect have folded. "Once Proposition 209 passed, the contracts just dried up," Cose said.

The study comes after Michigan voters approved a ballot measure that aims, through a constitutional amendment, to bar public universities and state and local governments from discriminating or giving preferential treatment based on race, sex, color, ethnicity or national origin.

The vote shows that "there is a huge sense on the part of white voters that affirmative action needs to end," said Cose, an author and columnist for Newsweek. Although the national implication remains uncertain, "if this thing is put before states where there is a significant white majority, it's likely to pass," he said.

Michigan is a textbook example of what Cose calls the "chipping away of affirmative action," a process that began in the 1970s and gained political steam in the 1990s. In 1974, the Supreme Court rejected as a throwback to "separate but equal" a Detroit plan to bus city children to suburban schools. In 2003, the court ruled that a diverse student body was important enough to support race-conscious admissions at the University of Michigan's law school.

"The measure in Michigan, as did the measure in California, passed along very clearly racial lines," Cose said, showing that "even though jurists see a legitimate state interest in diversity voters, at least white voters don't."

Opponents to last week's ballot measure promise a legal battle, as do proponents. Although the Supreme Court has repeatedly ruled in favor of affirmative action programs, the court's written opinions have signaled for years that the programs' end may be near.

The question, the California report says, is whether Americans, decades after Jim Crow, still feel legally obligated to help boost people whose race puts them at an economic and educational disadvantage. Affirmative action opponents say special treatment based on race implies lesser treatment of others based on their majority status. So by addressing one injustice, they say, the programs commit another.

Because college admissions of minority students have slid nationwide in recent years, many admissions directors have changed their recruiting focus to identify not only minorities but low-income students, including whites.

"In the last couple of years, there has been a much more concerted effort to do this in a race-neutral way," said Lee Coffin, admissions dean at Tufts University in Massachusetts. "The poor white kid has a voice that needs to be heard, in addition to the kind of racial diversity we want to create."

University of Virginia Admissions Dean Jack Blackburn said his school has changed policies and part of its recruiting approach to find more needy applicants. "We realized that we are not providing access," he said. "We are not educating very many kids from low-income backgrounds. The numbers are shockingly low."

That, he said, was one key reason the university recently announced it was dropping its binding early-decision program.

Whether last week's elections -- which returned control of Congress to Democrats, who generally favor affirmative action -- will have an impact on such programs' future remains to be seen.

An important test could come next month, when the American Bar Association undergoes review of its authority to accredit university law schools. A Department of Education hearing, aimed at recertifying the ABA's Council of the Section on Legal Education and Admissions to the Bar as the official accrediting agency for law schools, is expected to be a forum for complaints.

The ABA recently rewrote a diversity standard for law schools, requiring more concrete action to promote a diverse faculty, staff and student body. The new standard drew fire from both sides of the debate: The Congressional Black Caucus did not think it went far enough, and the Bush administration's Commission on Civil Rights said this past summer that it went too far.

The National Association of Scholars has asked the Education Department not to renew the ABA's accrediting power if it does not eliminate all requirements of racial, ethnic and gender diversity from its accreditation standards.

Sources familiar with the issue said the department is divided over the question, with some administration political appointees sympathetic to that request.

Even if affirmative action were to disappear, "the universities are going to try very hard to admit a reasonable number of minority candidates," Cose said. "But they are inevitably going to see the numbers go down."

English As Official Language Gains Support At Local Levels (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Voters and town boards in several states recently passed laws making English the official language, garnering Hispanic support in one case for what many say was a message to Washington.

Arizona voters last week approved Proposition 103, a constitutional amendment making English the official language of the state. Passing similar laws were the city councils of Taneytown, Md.; Farmers Branch, Texas, and the town board of Pahrump, Nev.

“The voters in Arizona are sick and tired of the federal government doing nothing on immigration,” said Arizona State Rep. Kyrsten Sinema of Phoenix, in explaining why she thought the measure passed in Arizona. She was an opponent of the proposition.

While English-only proposals in the U.S. Congress have gone nowhere, the Arizona measure passed by a 3-to-1 ratio, with 48% of Hispanics supporting it, according to an Associated Press exit poll.

Hispanic support is a sign that “the majority of Hispanics believe that the key to success in America is to learn the language of the land, learn English,” says Jose Esparza, vice chairman of the Arizona Latino Republican Association.

Lydia Guzman, chairwoman of the Coalition for Latino Political Action in Phoenix, opposed the bill. She said she is worried it will be misused by anti-immigrant extremists.

Guzman was not surprised that nearly half of Hispanic voters supported the measure. She says the Hispanic community includes people who have been here for generations, who don't speak Spanish and haven't experienced the “immigrant struggle.”

In Taneytown, where only 1.5% of the population is Hispanic according to the 2000 census, Councilman Paul Chamberlain says the official-English law will make “no practical change” because Taneytown does not provide services in Spanish.

“We will be helping immigrants learn the English language and not segregate into different communities,” he says.

Political scientist and pollster Fred Solop of Northern Arizona University says Arizona voters, including Hispanics, have made clear that the issue of illegal immigration is their number one concern.

“There were four immigration proposals on the ballot, if there were six, they would have all passed,” he says.

Among the ballot initiatives that accompanied the official-English proposition were three others that targeted illegal immigrants.

Arizona State Rep. Russell Pearce of Mesa calls official English “part of us doing our job to help (immigrants) learn to communicate.

“Government has an obligation to promote and enhance English,” he says, “to help people assimilate.”

Sinema derides that sentiment as “so cute,” pointing out that one of the propositions that passed denies illegal immigrants state benefits, including state-funded English classes.

“To punish people by taking away funding to learn English, and at the same time demand people learn English, makes no sense at all,” Sinema says.

Esparza, who supported the official-English ballot initiative, also sees “an irony” in the voters' decision to deny state funding for English education. He said conflicting measures passed “because the public, including Hispanics, is frustrated that illegal immigration continues to be a problem and they want the federal government to take action.”

A Chance To Get Into The Room (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

They didn't leave work until after 4 a.m. Four hours later, they were back in the office -- frazzled and on edge. Sitting around a conference table, eight employees of Enlightened Inc., a technology consulting firm, were struggling to polish a proposal that could well determine the firm's future. It was not going well.

Chief executive Antwanye Ford was rubbing his forehead in frustration. He was dressed meticulously, as always, in a pressed Donald Trump-brand suit and a French-cuff shirt. Not even a succession of 18-hour days could make this man look rumpled. But on this day, he was oozing tension. Enlightened's bid for a multimillion-dollar contract to update the computer system used by the District's probation and parole officers was simply not good enough, he told his staff. The proposal needed more graphics, more punch. As Ford saw it, this bid was his fledgling black firm's ticket to a new competitive league.

Suddenly, Ford's cellphone was vibrating. He excused himself and headed into his private office. It was Larry Daniels, one of the District's chief accountants who oversees city spending. Daniels had received complaints about Enlightened's work on another project, a $400,000 contract to do inventory of D.C. property: police cars, fire trucks, public school furniture.

It was too much. Frustrated and embarrassed, Ford heaved his bottle of water across the room. "You only get one opportunity, maybe two at the most, to prove yourself," he later fumed to a visitor. "As a minority, you have to work extra hard. . . . We're constantly being watched and judged."

As the day wore on, Ford felt that what he had spent years seeking -- acceptance, respect, an unchallenged level of achievement -- had been put at risk. In danger of losing one contract and not winning another he coveted, Ford wondered: Would his aspirations for Enlightened ever be realized? Would he feel this extra pull to prove himself if he were not black?

Ford's anxiety about image is common among black businessmen who are barreling into territory where relatively few of them have established ownership: information technology, construction, real estate, financial management. Many bring with them advanced degrees, years of corporate experience, and cultural and emotional complexities that can both enrich and burden their lives as business owners. Many struggle with whether they must sacrifice their identity to be successful. In Ford's case, that means questioning whether Enlightened should even promote that it is black-owned.

"The dilemma is you don't know whether doing this or not will help," says Barron H. Harvey, dean of Howard University's School of Business and a long-time consultant to minority businesses. "There are some firms that have decided they are going to be who they are and not downplay that they are black-owned. But then they question if they had done it differently, would they have been more successful? You never know."

Ford decided he would take no chances. Enlightened's Web site features stock photos of three young, white men in suits and a white woman gathered around a laptop computer. There are no obvious indications that the firm is run by black men. "We don't want people to shut the door on us before we show them what we can do," Ford says.

The population of black male entrepreneurs has grown dramatically in the past 15 years, as more black men have abandoned corporate jobs and converted their expertise into livelihoods that they control. According to a recent U.S. Census report, the number of black men who own businesses increased by nearly a third from 1997 to 2002, and now number more than 571,000 nationwide. In eight years, at the current growth rate, that number will top 1 million. Previous generations of black businessmen were concentrated in the service and retail fields: They owned restaurants, barbershops, small grocery stores. Most relied on a black customer base. They were people like Ford's parents, who opened an upholstery shop on H Street in Northeast during the 1970s.

But that business model has markedly changed, and black entrepreneurs such as Ford are grappling with a different set of challenges.

Ford is not aware of ever having lost a contract because of his race, but he is mindful of America's history of racial prejudice. If minority companies did not face discrimination, he said, there would not be federally funded set-aside programs. Enlightened participates in such a program administered by the Small Business Administration. The 8(a) program offers business-development assistance and the opportunity to compete for federal contracts that have been reserved for small firms owned by "socially and economically disadvantaged" people, those whose net worth is less than $250,000. Enlightened, which has been in the program since 2001, is certified to participate for four more years.

But even though the program has generated considerable business, Ford is conflicted. He does not want Enlightened to be known as "just" an 8(a) firm. The designation, he believes, whispers: inferior company in business because of government handouts.

Some business choices do not come easily. The decision about what would appear on the Web site was agonizing. Asked whether he is hiding his heritage or is ashamed of it, Ford's smile disappears and his eyes narrow. He wonders aloud if it's being suggested that he is a sellout, then abruptly leaves the office to lift weights.

The next day, he admits the questioning angered him. "I had to pray about that," he says. Ford then proceeds to defend his racial consciousness: He mentors black teenagers interested in becoming entrepreneurs. He makes a point of employing black interns at his firm. And he still lives in the 'hood (in the Brookland section of Northeast), near vacant lots where he played football as a boy and within walking distance of his elderly parents. "It's expected that when you obtain a certain level of success, you move out to the suburbs, but that's not me," he says. Not even after his house was mistakenly riddled with bullets five years ago in a drive-by shooting.

Do not mistake his business decisions for some lack of black pride, Ford insists. Like many black businessmen who have long felt like outsiders, Ford just wants "a chance to get into the room."

"If I get in the room," he says, "I'll show you what I can do. And I'm going to do whatever I can do to get in that room."

The 'Myth Men'

In a sense, Ford's quest to "get in the room" originated on George Washington University's campus in 1983. He, Andre Rogers and Thomas Spann -- classmates who became good friends -- would meet at the black student union and fantasize about owning a business together.

At the time, blacks made up about 2 percent of the student body. On the first day of a class on race relations, the men recall, some white and Asian students talked openly about their perceptions of black people: lazy, good only at sports, the biggest beneficiaries of affirmative action. It was the first time anyone had voiced such perceptions in their presence.

"We sat there with our mouths open," Ford, 41, recalled.

The trio, along with nine other black male students, decided to form a group called the "Myth Men," in part because no black fraternities existed on campus and they craved a social outlet. But the group's other mission was to try to dispel the negative stereotypes about black men.

After graduating, Ford, Rogers and Spann worked in various corporate jobs for 10 years before deciding to pursue their college fantasy. In 1998, they began meeting in Rogers's basement after work, throwing out questions and ideas about launching an information technology consulting firm. Where should they be based? What would attract clients? Where would funding come from? With his outgoing personality, Ford was chosen as chief executive. Rogers's fondness for spreadsheets and numbers made him a natural finance chief. And Spann, who had experience in management, would be the company's chief operating officer. Because they planned to illuminate clients' possibilities, they chose a name that suggested imparting knowledge and insight. Companies that worked with them, the partners figured, would be enlightened.

In 1999, the three men resigned from their corporate positions -- Ford as a manager at Intelsat; Rogers as a software developer for Fannie Mae; Spann as a senior analyst at NASD, a financial regulatory company. With their severance packages as seed money, plus $15,000 each in cash advances on credit cards, they rented a small, windowless space, just big enough for five desks, in an office building at 11th and G streets NW. (Enlightened still has that space but has since expanded to another floor.) The company's initial work came from small government jobs subcontracted to Enlightened by larger minority firms.

Enlightened now employs about 60 salaried and hourly workers who make as little as $9 an hour and as much as $110,000 a year. Expectations are high, and so is turnover: Since Jan. 1, 21 employees have either resigned or been dismissed. Last year, Spann left his executive's chair to become a consultant because he was away from his family too much.

Enlightened designs software programs, hosts Web sites and creates management systems for such clients as the departments of Labor, Housing and Urban Development and Veterans Affairs, as well as Fannie Mae and AOL. This year, Enlightened projects revenue of about $4 million. By the end of next year, Enlightened hopes to reach $8 million in sales and double its workforce, to 120.

The company has attracted notice. In 2003, Entrepreneur magazine named Enlightened one of the country's "best and brightest" companies. A year later, Inc. magazine ranked it among the 500 fastest-growing private companies in the country -- No. 264 -- based on its 550 percent revenue growth from 1999 to 2003. Enlightened also has one of the best credit rating and financial strength scores of small companies nationwide, according to Dun & Bradstreet, an independent financial analysis firm.

With such success, why so much fretting about image?

High Expectations

To Ford, perceptions are powerful.

Take what happened when former Enlightened accountant Frank Wentink was hired last year. His friends told him that working for a black firm would not be so hard. Set-aside programs, they said, would make his workload easier. But Wentink, who is white, soon found that he was working through the weekends and pulling all-nighters and that Ford and his senior managers were always in the office "working their tails off," he said.

Such false assumptions drive Ford, the firm's big thinker who is responsible for long-range planning. A muscular 5-foot-11 and 205 pounds, Ford thunders into a room like a politician, laughing, shaking hands, demanding eye contact. With employees, he is often like a jovial, joke-cracking big brother. But when problems surface or deadlines approach, employees say, the big brother turns into a stern, no-excuses businessman.

Ford doubts that executives at BearingPoint Inc. or Perot Systems Corp., much larger competitors, have his kind of anxiety. They never have to worry about race being a factor in winning major contracts, he says.

Some of Ford's worries about image can be traced to a 2003 meeting between Enlightened's partners and a black procurement officer for a federal agency whose contract the company had just won. [Ford declined to identify the woman or her employer because the agency remains a client.]

The procurement officer told Ford that she had noticed the startled reaction of her colleagues, most of whom were white, when Enlightened's all-black team had entered the conference room to pitch its proposal. She said Enlightened needed to "lighten up" -- hire some white staff members -- to succeed in this town. According to federal personnel statistics, nearly 70 percent of federal contracting officers are white.

Ford was offended, but he did not let it show. He told the procurement officer that he understood she was trying to be helpful. But her comments suggested that no one would take a black-owned firm seriously. And he didn't want to believe that. But her advice began to eat away at him. He started looking to hire white men, white women, anyone who would signal that his company was diverse -- and thereby more desirable to clients.

He kept thinking back to his early years in the business world, after he had attended night classes at GWU to get his master's degree in information systems, landed a job with MCI Inc.'s internal consulting division, did well and ran into what he thinks was a racial ceiling. His bosses said he simply needed more patience. They also suggested something else.

"I think he was overly conscious of race to the point where it didn't serve him well," said Lynn K. Hall, his former boss at MCI. "He focused on it. It was an internal motivator, but it also colored his perception." Hall, who is white, said that when clients questioned Ford's abilities as a consultant, Ford often attributed those assessments to racial prejudice. She remembers when Ford was tapped to implement a new finance system at MCI. During the initial meeting, employees, most of whom were white, grilled Ford with questions about his plan's practicality. Ford thought his ideas were challenged because he is black. Hall disagreed. "All consultants face those challenges," she said, adding that Ford was an "excellent" worker who "always delivered" and would have eventually moved into management.

But Ford thought the company was devaluing him. The final insult: when he learned he was being paid less than a white woman he had trained to take over one of his former jobs. The woman, he was told, had a year more experience than Ford, which is why she was paid more. "But she was doing my old job," Ford says, exasperated. "Every time I would jump a hurdle, they still wouldn't let me in the room."

So he left MCI, became a manager for Intelsat's consulting arm, and for six years prepared for the day when he could run his own business.

Among Ford's most critical hires at Enlightened: Anita Hinnerichs, 33, the company's No. 4 executive, who manages most of its day-to-day operations. In the office, Hinnerichs wears her shoulder-length brown hair in a ponytail. But when accompanying Ford or Rogers to client meetings, she lets her hair fall to her shoulders. "I realize being a white woman in this town is an advantage," she says matter-of-factly. "If I can help get them get in the door, the work will keep them there."

One of Hinnerichs's unofficial roles is to make male clients, particularly white men, feel at ease. Recently, Hinnerichs attended a meeting with a white male government official who would not return phone calls or e-mails from Rogers and a senior male employee. Now, the client responds promptly -- but only if the correspondence is from Hinnerichs.

"If we're selling to men, females are more of a plus," Ford said. "But being passionate and hungry are more important than anything."

This strategy may be good for business, but it has caused tension in the Enlightened offices, especially among black employees, who number seven of the 18 core staff members at headquarters. Some feel like systems analyst Akisha Campbell, who says that with seven years in business and a long list of satisfied clients, Ford has proven himself. "I don't see why race would still be a problem," Campbell said.

Managing black employees, Ford and Rogers say, can be challenging. Some work hard and want executives who look like them to succeed. Others are extremely talented and therefore difficult to keep because larger firms can offer them as much as $25,000 more in salary. And then there are those who expect special breaks, challenging their bosses to the point of insubordination.

"I have very high expectations, regardless of race," Ford said. "But when it is an African American person who disappoints me, I get hurt."

Work Ethics

DOJ_NMG_0095827

Working through the night is common at Enlightened, though it is not always pleasant. Gospel music, late-night inspiration for Ford and Rogers, blares through their computer speakers. If you hear Fred Hammond or Byron Cage singing, you know Antwanye Ford and Andre Rogers are around.

But not everyone can fight exhaustion with church music. During a recent all-nighter, six workers were collaborating on a proposal due at 9 a.m. By 3 a.m., weary senior manager Habib Nasibdar demanded to know why only half the staff was still working. Where were the other senior staffers, he asked Ford. "Don't raise your voice at me. This is my house," Ford snapped.

Days later, the two men joked that whenever they fight, they end up getting a contract. "We have to fight more often," Ford said.

Ford and his No. 2, Rogers, often handle confrontations differently. Rogers, 40, is more patient, more pragmatic than Ford. When he deals with employees, he gives them specific, detailed instructions so there is no confusion. More introverted than Ford, Rogers was teased for being a bookworm while growing up in New York. He is happy to let Ford take center stage.

Ford was meeting recently with one of his advisers, a George C. Scott look-alike named Joseph Libby, when Rogers walked in. Libby took one look at Rogers's black suit and joked that it matched his dark skin. Rogers just laughed. "You'll never change," he told Libby, who runs a Fairfax insurance firm. Ford dropped his head, clearly irritated. As much as he treasures Libby's counsel, his gruff jokes are difficult to accept.

Embracing diversity can be as tricky at black-owned companies as anywhere else. Ford and Rogers are vocal Christians in a workplace that includes Jews and Muslims. Ford says he tries to ensure that all employees' faiths are respected. During Ramadan, he joined his Muslim workers in a sunrise-to-sunset fast. More recently, Ford opened a senior staff meeting with a prayer, asking God to "give us the guidance and wisdom to make the right decisions," which was followed by Rogers's, "thanking you, Lord, for the opportunity to worship."

"One of the perks of owning your own business is you don't have to deny who you are," said Ford. Though some people see spirituality as a sign of weakness, he says, he believes the opposite.

"We will be humble before God but bold before man."

Source of the Drive

Ford is driving his 2005 Porsche Carrera toward Saratoga and Montana avenues in Northeast. Growing up, he spent many days in this neighborhood hanging out with friends. It's 2 p.m., and Ford notices a dozen black men his age and younger standing in front of an apartment building. Some are holding wads of cash, others are shooting dice. Cruising by, Ford feels uneasy. He jokes that in his designer suit, he is dressed like "a victim," an attractive robbery target.

His family had a house near Hechinger Mall when he was a child. After school, Ford and his sister spent evenings at the J&K Upholstery shop their parents owned on H Street NE. John and Katherine Ford put their children through Catholic schools by exchanging tuition for upholstering chairs and sofas. Ford grew up hearing Jim Crow stories from his parents, who migrated to Washington from the segregated rural areas of North Carolina and South Carolina in the 1950s. Katherine Ford taught her children that the best way to overcome racism was through hard work and professionalism. "I wanted them to be the best at what they do," she said. "No matter what it was, be the best. No one can stop you if you're the best at what you do."

But trying to be the best can exact a toll. Now four months into his second marriage, Ford admits that his first marriage fell victim to the 18 to 20 hours a day he routinely put in starting Enlightened. Time management still isn't easy. His first son, 8-year-old Antwanye Eric II, was diagnosed with leukemia when he was 3. The disease is in remission, but watching young Antwanye endure years of chemotherapy and steroid treatments inspired Ford to give more to social causes. Every Enlightened employee is required to participate in at least two volunteer efforts a year. Through his wife, Tanya, Ford is stepfather to Jahleel, 10, who talks of opening his own dog-walking business.

Driving past his old haunts, Ford reflects on the economic progress that has rejuvenated some District neighborhoods while skipping others. Most of his childhood buddies are either dead or in prison, he says, victims of the 1980s crack epidemic. Though his heart tells him he can still hang out here because he is a local homeboy, his mind whispers that he no longer belongs here.

"It's just something I think about at times," he says.

Resolution

Ford wasted no time dealing with the headache that caused him to hurl his water bottle across the room. If the District was dissatisfied with Enlightened's work on the $400,000 D.C. inventory project, so was Ford.

He discovered that most of his employees were having the same problem: They would show up to count copying machines or fire trucks and be told that the work had already been done. Unknown to Enlightened's employees, another contractor had a similar assignment. The employees never reported this to their supervisors, and the supervisors never asked.

Immediately, Ford decided that more aggressive supervision was needed and moved one of his senior managers, Colleen Moses, off the project. He shifted two other managers from another assignment to take over. Moses was distraught. She had been in charge of the inventory project for nearly two years; Ford's quick decision stunned her. She sat alone in the conference room, tears streaming down her face. "I just hate that I disappointed him," she said. "I just wish I had the opportunity to fix it."

But her opportunity had passed. "The customer wanted it fixed now," Ford said. "Period."

Within days, Daniels, the D.C. official who hired Enlightened for the inventory project, called to say that everything was back on track. He had heard no further complaints. In appreciation, Ford gave his project workers $25 Chipotle restaurant gift cards.

Soon afterward, Ford received even better news: Enlightened was among four companies chosen for that multimillion-dollar contract updating the computer system used by the Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency. A guaranteed four-year stream of income. Ford gathered everyone for cake to celebrate.

Finally, Ford thought, he was in the room. The relentless hours and tough choices had paid off -- for now. Enlightened could indeed compete with the big boys. Not that Ford would stop worrying about the company's image -- or his own. Worrying, he says, keeps him hungry.

Conservatives: Keep Gay Marriage Out Of The Courts (NYT)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

CONSERVATIVES have consoled themselves since Election Day with the knowledge that many “conservative” social issues did well — including (and especially) the eight state “marriage amendments” on the ballot — even if the Republican candidates faltered.

These marriage measures, of which only Arizona’s was defeated, generally prevent recognition of gay marriages by defining marriage as a “union between a man and a woman” in the state constitutions. More than half of the states now have such constitutional provisions (some of which would also forbid same-sex civil unions), and conservatives need to reconsider whether that’s really what we want. There are, in fact, some very good reasons conservatives should oppose this approach.

The definition of marriage is, of course, of critical importance to individuals on both sides of the issue and to society at large. But at least since independence, the question of who may marry and under what conditions has been the province of the state legislatures. And it should have remained that way.

The justifications for stripping the legislatures of authority in this area and settling the matter in a state’s constitution are wanting. It’s true that courts in certain states — for example, Massachusetts — have interposed themselves in this debate, misconstruing “equal protection” guarantees as requiring recognition of gay marriages. But errant or aggressive judges can be corrected by amendments that simply deny the state courts authority over this issue, reserving the definition and regulation of marriage to the legislatures alone.

Moreover, the meaning of marriage, as important as it is, is no more crucial than many other issues of individual autonomy and morality that have also historically been decided by the legislatures. These include adoption and child-welfare laws, as well as a host of criminal and other regulatory measures of the greatest moment.

Indeed, cluttering state constitutions with the disposition of many difficult social issues — and this process will probably go on, and even accelerate, especially if all of the states choose to define marriage in their constitutions — is likely to empower the judiciary more. This paradoxical and unwelcome result would arise because some of the newly enshrined constitutional definitions and guarantees are sure to conflict with one another, leaving the courts the only venue for resolving the tension. Conservatives should find this outcome highly unpalatable.

At the same time, leaving the marriage issue to the state legislatures has many benefits. As Edmund Burke taught, time-tested institutions and practices should be changed only upon the clearest need, and then only to the extent necessary. If the courts in some states have trespassed on the legislatures’ traditional and legitimate authority over marriage, they can be checked without altering the otherwise established norm of legislative power in this area.

Also, allowing the issue to be decided by state legislatures would be in the best tradition of American federalism: the states act as laboratories of political change, and remain free to give divergent answers to difficult social questions. Operating within the federalist context, state legislatures are likely to enact different definitions of marriage, some allowing same-sex unions, others banning them. Significantly, the federal Defense of Marriage Act, signed by President Bill Clinton in 1996, already ensures that the choices of one state cannot be imposed on others. If that statute is ultimately found to be ineffective or unconstitutional, additional steps can be considered at the federal level to ensure that individual state choices are respected.

If state legislatures were free to define and re-define marriage, we would have genuinely political solutions to an especially difficult and incendiary issue. Very few people do not hold deep convictions regarding same-sex marriage. To enshrine the definition of marriage in a state's constitution removes the issue from the give-and-take of the normal political process. That process rarely produces an absolute victory for any side, but it also rarely results in absolute defeat. The outcome is never final; the defeated party can rally, regroup and try again.

By contrast, a constitutional amendment resolves a policy issue with a sufficient finality to prompt a more or less permanent sense of injustice and bitterness on the losing side. Conservatives, religious conservatives especially, should understand these dynamics. In Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court granted victory on constitutional grounds to the abortion-rights position in the abortion debate, and that decision has polarized American politics for nearly two generations. America does not need another such issue. The wave of marriage amendments — at least those that go beyond removing the issue from judicial resolution — should stop.

Pentagon Alters Homosexuality Guidelines (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, November 16, 2006

Pentagon guidelines that classified homosexuality as a mental disorder now put it among a list of conditions or "circumstances" that range from bed-wetting to fear of flying.

The new rules are related to the military's retirement practices. The change does not affect the "don't ask, don't tell" policy that prohibits officials from inquiring about the sex lives of service members and requires discharges of those who openly acknowledge being gay.

The revision came in response to criticism this year when it was discovered that the guidelines listed homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders.

Mental health professionals said Thursday they were not satisfied by the change.

"We appreciate your good-faith effort to address our concern that the document was not medically accurate," James H. Scully, head of the American Psychiatric Association, wrote David Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. "But we remain concerned because we believe that the revised document lacks the clarity necessary to resolve the issue."

The guidelines outline retirement or other discharge policies for service members with physical disabilities. The rules include sections that describes other specific conditions, circumstances and defects that also could lead to retirement, but are not physical disabilities.

Among the conditions are stammering or stuttering, dyslexia, sleepwalking, motion sickness, obesity, insect venom allergies and homosexuality.

"More than 30 years after the mental health community declassified homosexuality as a mental disorder, it is disappointing that the Pentagon still continues to mischaracterize it as a 'defect,' said Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said "homosexuality should not have been characterized as a mental disorder. A clarification has been issued."

The psychiatric association declassified homosexuality as a mental disorder in 1973. Questions about the Pentagon's guidelines were raised in June by a research institute at the University of California at Santa Barbara.

There were 726 military members discharged under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy during the budget year that ended Sept. 30.

Nursing Mom Files Complaint Against Airlines (USAT)

By Emily Bazar And Sam Hemingway

USA Today, November 17, 2006

A clash between a nursing mother and a flight attendant has sparked a discrimination complaint, an airline investigation and a grass-roots protest.

Emily Gillette, her husband, Brad; and their then 22-month-old daughter, River, were removed from an Oct. 13 flight from Burlington, Vt., to New York after a flight attendant asked Gillette to cover up while she was breast-feeding the girl.

Freedom Airlines operated the Delta Airlines flight.

Gillette, 27, filed a complaint against both airlines last week with the Vermont Human Rights Commission alleging that the airlines violated a state law that allows women to breast-feed "in any place of public accommodation." The airlines have until Nov. 27 to respond, Gillette's attorney, Elizabeth Boepple, says.

In a show of support, about 30 mothers and fathers and dozens of children staged a “nurse-in” protest at Burlington International Airport on Wednesday.

“I've always nursed my children when I'm on a plane,” says Carolyn Beer, 34, of Burlington. “Their ears hurt with the altitude change, and it's a strange environment for them. The alternative is to let your kid scream.”

The Gillettes, of Espanola, N.M., boarded the flight shortly before 10 p.m. They had been in Vermont visiting friends and were headed to New York to see other friends and Emily Gillette's sister.

Gillette took the window seat in the second-to-last row, she says, and her husband took the aisle. She began nursing River, using one hand to hold her shirt closed. “I was not exposed,” she says.

The flight attendant approached, tried to hand her a blanket and asked her to cover herself, she recalls. “You're offending me,” Gillette quotes the woman as saying.

“I'm not doing anything wrong and I will not cover up,” Gillette says she said in response.

Spokesmen for the airlines declined to discuss specifics of the incident.

The flight attendant walked away, Gillette says, and a few minutes later, a ticket agent boarded and said the flight attendant had ordered them removed.

The airline arranged for a hotel for the family for the night and a flight with a different airline the next morning, but Gillette wasn't satisfied.

“No woman should ever be ashamed of breast-feeding,” she says. She wants “both airlines to create policies that protect a woman from being harassed for feeding her child on an airplane.”

Delta is working with Freedom on an investigation, Delta spokesman Anthony Black says. “Delta supports a mother's right to breast-feed-slash-bottle-feed her babies on our aircraft,” he says.

Freedom spokesman Paul Skellon says breast-feeding on a plane is OK if it's done in a “discreet way.”

Forty-three states have some form of legislation protecting a woman's right to breast-feed, according to Mary Lofton, spokeswoman for La Leche League International, a group that encourages breast-feeding.

Lofton says the league has had a growing number of contacts from women who say they were harassed for breast-feeding on planes.

Sharon Panitch, 37, a massage therapist who organized the Burlington nurse-in, says people who object are “hypocritical.”

“We just want to take care of our children,” Panitch says.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department Supports AT&T Merger (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department's top antitrust official on Thursday defended the agency's unconditional approval of AT&T's $82 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. as "pretty straightforward" despite criticism from Democratic regulators and lawmakers.

The buyout would further reunite parts of the old Ma Bell phone monopoly, broken up by the government in 1984, and create the largest U.S. provider of telephone, wireless and broadband Internet services.

"We're living a very different world than we were in the 1980s," Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett said in an interview during an antitrust conference. "The mere size of a company in general doesn't tell you whether a merger is going to harm consumer welfare."

The Federal Communications Commission, the final regulatory hurdle for the deal to be approved, has delayed a final vote three times. Two Democrats on the FCC, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, have accused the Justice Department of falling down on the job.

Barnett said the agency spent months reviewing documents and interviewing customers and competitors before concluding that the deal probably would save customers money.

Once that conclusion was reached, "it's a pretty straightforward deal for us," he said.

If the deal wins final government approval, the merger would give San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. total control over the nation's largest cellular provider, Cingular Wireless, a joint venture of the two phone companies that serves 57.3 million customers.

Consumer rights groups have criticized the deal as putting too much of the telecommunications infrastructure under the control of one company.

DOJ_NMG_0095831

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who is in line to become the next chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, told reporters last week that the FCC should wait until after the first of the year before making a decision. Dingell later backpedaled, saying he was only suggesting the deal should be "looked at and looked into carefully."

Companies Investigated Over Bidding (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 17, 2006

Law enforcement agents seized documents from three brokers and subpoenaed companies including at least two insurers and General Electric in a criminal investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments.

The investigation by the Justice Department centers on guaranteed investment contracts, which municipalities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects.

F.B.I. agents searched CDR Financial Products, a financial adviser and broker in Beverly Hills, Calif., on Wednesday, said Laura Eimiller, a spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in Los Angeles, without providing further details.

Financial Security Assurance Holdings, a unit of the Brussels-based financial services company Dexia, said Wednesday that it was subpoenaed by the Justice Department.

The FGIC Corporation, a New York-based bond insurer, also received a Justice Department subpoena, Brian Moore, a company spokesman, said yesterday. Mr. Moore said FGIC, a former unit of General Electric, had exited the guaranteed investment contract business in 2003 when G.E. sold the company. The outstanding contracts remained with G.E.

G.E. also received a subpoena as part of the investigation, said a spokesman, Russell Wilkerson.

Federal investigators took documents Wednesday from the Investment Management Advisory Group, a broker of guaranteed investment contracts and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pa., said Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the company.

Yesterday, a third guaranteed investment contract broker, Sound Capital Management, based in Eden Prairie, Minn., said federal investigators seized documents and served a subpoena for more documents.

FBI Seizes Montco Investment Broker's Records (PHI)

By Mark Fazlollah

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 17, 2006

Federal agents have seized records from a Montgomery County investment broker and a California company in an investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments.

The investigation centers on alleged bid-rigging in guaranteed investment contracts, which cities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects.

Federal agents took documents from Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a Pottstown broker of guaranteed investment contracts, firm spokesman Gene Grabowski said. Besides seizing boxes of documents, FBI agents copied the hard drives of computers at the firm.

FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said agents from New York were assisted by the bureau's Philadelphia office.

"IMAGE received a subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, and the company is cooperating fully with the authorities," the company said in a statement. "It is our understanding that subpoenas have been issued to numerous other firms and that the investigation is industry-wide. We are confident that our business practices and employees will be fully vindicated as this investigation continues."

IMAGE has been involved in at least two other recent federal corruption investigations.

Its top executives were among dozens of Philadelphia-area business officials listed on subpoenas issued last month by a federal grand jury in Puerto Rico looking into alleged improper campaign contributions.

A company spokesman said last week that IMAGE advised the Puerto Rican government on a bond deal in 2000.

IMAGE president David Eckhart and executive William Howell gave a total of $11,500 in 2002 to Anibal Acevedo Vila, the governor of Puerto Rico. Acevedo Vila's campaign returned part of the money because it exceeded contribution limits.

City Hall scandal

IMAGE also surfaced in the Philadelphia City Hall corruption investigation in 2004. According to testimony in the City Hall corruption trial, IMAGE provided former Philadelphia City Treasurer Corey Kemp with a $1,700 ticket to special events surrounding the 2002 NBA All-Star Game and a limousine ride to a concert in Scranton in 2003.

Kemp was sentenced to 10 years in prison. IMAGE was not charged with any crime.

FBI agents also searched CDR Financial Products, of Beverly Hills, Calif., on Wednesday, said Laura Eimiller, a spokeswoman for the FBI in Los Angeles, without providing further details. Allan Ripp, a spokesman for CDR, declined to comment.

CDR - which also gave gifts to Kemp and the late power broker Ron White - had a secret agreement with the provider of a guaranteed investment contract for bonds issued in 1999 by an authority in Gulf Breeze, Fla., Bloomberg News reported on Oct. 4. Bloomberg said the deal allowed CDR to increase its fees if none of $220 million in bond proceeds was used for its intended purpose - affordable housing.

Belgium firm subpoenaed

Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a unit of Brussels, Belgium-based financial services company Dexia S.A., said Wednesday that it was subpoenaed by the Justice Department.

The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest money raised in the $2 trillion market for tax-exempt bonds has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue.

"There's a lack of transparency in the whole market," Dan Veres, executive vice president of Grant Street Group, a Pittsburgh-based firm that conducts guaranteed investment contract auctions on its Web site, told Bloomberg News. "It is ripe for abuse, the whole process."

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was conducting an "investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal-bond industry."

The IRS's Office of Tax-Exempt Bonds said in January 2005 that it found pervasive bid-rigging for guaranteed investment contracts.

The IRS is looking into possible improper bidding that may have diverted money to banks and brokers that should have been paid in taxes.

Advisory Firms Raided In FBI Bid-rig Probe (LAT)

By E. Scott Reckard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

A Beverly Hills office is among those searched for evidence of possible collusion in investments sold to public agencies.

The FBI raided financial firms on both coasts, including Beverly Hills-based CDR Financial Products, as part of an investigation into possible bid rigging on investments sold to public agencies, federal authorities and the firms said Thursday.

Federal authorities also seized information from at least one municipal bond insurer in connection with the probe. Another of the companies raided, Investment Management Advisory Group of Pottstown, Pa., said the investigation was industrywide and had resulted in subpoenas to a number of other firms.

CDR Financial and the other companies help cities, counties and public agencies invest money generated by bond sales in guaranteed investment contracts. Such contracts are used to allow the proceeds of bond issues to earn interest until they are spent on public projects.

CDR said it was cooperating with the investigation and remained open for business.

"The firm believes it has acted appropriately in all of the financings under review," CDR said in a statement.

The 20-year-old company, which employs about 25 people nationwide, said it had provided advice on $158 billion in transactions, including deals to invest municipal-bond proceeds.

FBI agents and criminal investigators from the Internal Revenue Service served a search warrant on CDR about 6 a.m. on Wednesday and remained there all day, said Laura Eimiller, an FBI spokeswoman in Los Angeles.

She said details weren't available because a judge had sealed the search documents.

A U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, Cynthia Magnuson, said the agency's antitrust department was investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the municipal bond industry. She wouldn't elaborate.

Statements issued by CDR and several other firms said they had been searched as part of a 3-year-old investigation by federal agencies into suspected collusion in the market for guaranteed investment contracts.

Municipal bond issuers are required to select providers of such contracts through competitive bids, and generally hire brokers to determine which bid is best.

Bidding in any industry can be rigged if one provider submits a realistic offer and the others agree to propose terms so poor that they are certain to be passed over.

In such a scheme, participants typically divvy up the business by taking turns submitting the realistic offer.

DOJ_NMG_0095833

Subpoenas in the case have been issued by the Securities and Exchange Commission in addition to the Justice Department and the IRS, said Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a New York municipal bond insurer that also was searched.

Financial Security, a unit of European financial services group Dexia, said it "is not aware of any specific allegations concerning its own practices."

FBI investigators also seized files and copied computer hard drives at Investment Management Advisory Group. Like CDR, the Pennsylvania firm acts as a broker for municipal bond issuers. It said it was cooperating with the antitrust investigation.

"It is our understanding that subpoenas have been issued to numerous other firms and that the investigation is industrywide," Investment Management said in a statement. "We are confident that our business practices and employees will be fully vindicated as this investigation continues."

2 Men Convicted In Scheme To Fix Concrete Prices (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, November 17, 2006

Noblesville cousins could face prison, fines; ready-mix company could owe $10 million

A two-year criminal investigation into price-fixing by ready-mix concrete companies in the Indianapolis area ended Thursday when a federal jury convicted two Noblesville men and their company of participating in the scheme.

After hearing 21/2 days of evidence in U.S. District Court, a jury of eight women and four men found cousins Chris A. Beaver, 42, and Ricky J. Beaver, 43, conspired with other ready-mix concrete companies to set prices from July 2000 through May 2004.

Frank J. Vondrak of the U.S. Department of Justice's Antitrust Division would not rule out further charges involving officials of companies serving Marion, Muncie and Bloomington, where trial testimony indicated price-fixing also took place.

Vondrak led a team of lawyers, including Jonathan A. Epstein and Eric L. Schleef, that won Thursday's guilty verdicts after a series of pleas by other participants. Most executives cooperated with the FBI and Justice Department in exchange for lighter sentences or immunity from prosecution.

During the trial, prosecutors repeatedly reminded jurors of guilty pleas made by concrete executives, including four officials of Greenfield-based Irving Materials Inc. That company agreed last year to pay a $29.2 million fine, the largest financial penalty ever in a domestic antitrust case.

"We are pleased that the jury decided to hold accountable these participants in a price-fixing scheme that deprived consumers in Indianapolis of the benefit of a competitive marketplace," Antitrust Division leader Thomas O. Barnett said in a statement.

As a result of the trial, the Beavers face maximum prison terms four times longer than those recommended for the ringleaders. The men face fines of up to $600,000 each. No sentencing date has been set.

Their company, MA-RI-AL Corp., which does business in Noblesville as Beaver Materials, faces a $10 million fine, or nearly as much as the company generated in average yearly sales during the scheme.

Chief Judge Larry J. McKinney will sentence the conspiracy's ringleaders, Gus "Butch" Nuckols III, 46, Fishers, and Scott D. Hughey, 51, Carmel, on Dec. 14.

Nuckols, president and owner of Builder's Concrete & Supply Co., testified under a plea agreement in which prosecutors agreed to recommend a 21-month sentence. Prosecutors have recommended a 24-month sentence for Hughey, who owns Hughey Inc., which does business as Carmel Concrete Products.

Hughey's testimony was critical to tying the Beavers to the conspiracy.

Testimony showed Nuckols and Hughey called a series of secret meetings with competitors to fix ready-mix concrete prices.

Much of the price-fixing involved setting a floor on discounts to already-uniform concrete prices, according to testimony from concrete executives who pleaded guilty or agreed to cooperate with officials.

Nuckols and Hughey also made repeated phone calls and held a series of smaller meetings with competitors to enforce compliance with price-fixing agreements. Testimony indicated the executives often violated these agreements, submitting bids for work that fell below the agreed-upon prices.

"I guess we all -- all the competitors -- were too selfish or too greedy to lose the accounts we had," testified Price C. Irving, 44, an Irving Materials executive who's already served his five-month sentence in a Terre Haute federal prison.

The Beavers' attorney, Jeffrey Lockwood, Anderson, argued that neither man had authority within the company to set prices. Chris Beaver was in charge of operations and was in line to run the company one day. Ricky Beaver was commercial sales manager.

Vondrak told jurors the Beavers' intent was clear: They showed up at several price-fixing meetings and never once objected to discussions about capping discounts to boost profits. Price fixing carries a maximum three-year prison term.

The Beavers also were found guilty of lying to the FBI, which carries up to a five-year sentence.

Family members wept and hugged the defendants as government attorneys, deputy U.S. marshals and the FBI case agent, Steven Schlobohm, stood silently nearby.

3rd Company Convicted Of Concrete Price Fixing (AP)

INDIANAPOLIS - A federal jury convicted a Noblesville company and two of its executives on charges of conspiring with central Indiana competitors to fix the price for ready-mix concrete.

Jurors on Thursday found MA-RI-AL Corp., which does business as Beaver Materials, guilty of conspiracy. They also convicted cousins Chris Beaver, 42, and Ricky Beaver, 43, on charges of conspiracy and lying to FBI investigators.

Two other companies have been fined more than $30 million and several company executives have been sentenced to prison for their role in what prosecutors said was a scheme that lasted from January 2000 to May 2004 and resulted in millions of dollars in illegal profits.

Officials from the other companies testified during this week's trial that Chris Beaver, the operations manager for Beaver Materials, and Ricky Beaver, the commercial sales manager, attended meetings during which the firms agreed on prices and discounts and the timing of price increases.

The Beavers and the family owned company were the only ones whom prosecutors tied to the conspiracy that did not admit to their involvement.

Beaver Materials faces a potential fine of $10 million as a result of the verdict, but defense attorney Jeff Lockwood said he did not believe his clients regretted their decision to fight the allegations.

"When you're not guilty it is pretty difficult to make a deal," Lockwood said. "We didn't believe that there was ever any real evidence that they came to an agreement, joined a conspiracy, because no witness testified that they did anything except remain silent at these meetings."

Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division, said he was pleased with the verdicts against the Beavers, calling them "participants in a price-fixing scheme that deprived consumers in Indianapolis of the benefit of a competitive marketplace."

Ready-mixed concrete is made on demand and often delivered to work sites by mixer trucks. Buyers include home owners, building contractors, schools and the government for projects such as sidewalks, patios, driveways, bridges and roads.

The scheme came to light last year when Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield agreed to pay $29.2 million in fines, which prosecutors said was the largest ever assessed in a domestic antitrust investigation.

A judge in June ordered Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. of Fishers to pay a $4 million fine for its role.

Burlingame Exec To Plead Guilty In Chip Probe (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) BURLINGAME A former executive at a computer chip maker is the latest person to agree to plead guilty in a global U.S. Justice Department price-fixing probe, the government said Thursday.

D. James Sogas of Burlingame, ex-vice president of sales for Elpida Memory, agreed to plead guilty to violating the Sherman Act. He agreed to serve a seven-month prison term and pay a $250,000 fine if the plea deal is approved by a federal judge.

To date, the Justice Department has charged four companies and 17 people, and has secured fines totaling more that $731 million in the probe.

Four executives each from Samsung Electronics Ltd., Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and Infineon have pleaded guilty or agreed to do so.

Court papers filed in San Francisco said Sogas conspired to fix the price of DRAM chips from April 2001 to June 2002.

The price of DRAM or dynamic random access memory soared 95 percent in less than two months in late 2001. The six largest DRAM manufacturers control 96 percent of the global market.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, generating some $25 billion in sales worldwide last year. It provides high-speed storage and retrieval of electronic information for personal computers, laptops, workstations, mobile phones, digital cameras, video recorders, TVs, game consoles and digital music players.

Sogas is charged with discussing with competitors the prices of DRAM to be sold to certain customers and agreeing with competitors to coordinate bids submitted to Sun Microsystems Inc.

The price-fixing scheme affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq, IBM Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc.

US Executive For Japan Firm Gets Prison In DRAM Probe (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 17, 2006

A former US executive for a Japanese chipmaker agreed to plead guilty and accept a seven-month prison term for participating in a global price-fixing conspiracy, officials said.

The Justice Department said D. James Sogas of Burlingame, California, former vice president for Japan-based Elpida Memory, also agreed to pay a 250,000 dollar criminal fine in the agreement filed in federal court in California.

Including Sogas, US prosecutors have charged four companies and 17 individuals, and have levied fines totaling more that 731 million dollars in the probe into price fixing of dynamic random access memory (DRAM), a widely used memory component in electronics.

"The (Justice Department) antitrust division remains steadfast in its commitment to deter illegal cartel activity and to hold accountable those who participate in price fixing conspiracies," said assistant attorney general for antitrust, Thomas Barnett.

According to the agency, DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product and is used in variety of computer, telecommunication, and consumer electronic products.

The chips are used in personal computers, mobile phones, digital cameras, video recorders, game consoles and digital music players. There were approximately 25 billion dollars in DRAM sales worldwide in 2005.

Last November, South Korea's Samsung pleaded guilty as a company to charges of price fixing in a deal that came with a fine of 300 million dollars.

US authorities have alleged a conspiracy with Samsung and other producers to fix DRAM computer chip prices between April 1, 1999 and June 15, 2002.

Former Elpida Executive Pleads Guilty To Price-Fixing (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, November 17, 2006

Nov. 16 (Bloomberg) -- A former executive at Elpida Memory Inc., Japan's biggest maker of computer memory chips, has agreed to plead guilty to participating in a scheme to fix chip prices, the Justice Department said.

D. James Sogas, a former vice president of sales at Tokyo- based Elpida, conspired with unnamed employees of other chipmakers to fix the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips from April 2001 to June 2002, federal prosecutors said in a statement.

The plea agreement stems from a four-year federal investigation into price fixing in the chip market that has led to claims against four companies and 16 individuals, and fines of $731 million, the U.S. said. Worldwide DRAM sales were $25 billion in 2005, the Justice Department said.

Sogas has agreed to serve a sentence of seven months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine, prosecutors said. He is also cooperating with the federal investigation. Elpida agreed in January to pay $84 million to settle price-fixing charges.

The agreement resolves allegations made against Sogas by federal prosecutors in San Francisco.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product. It's purchased by manufacturers such as Dell Inc. and Hewlett- Packard Co. for use in products including personal computers, laptops, printers, mobile phones, digital cameras and digital music players.

Sogas is the first Elpida Memory executive to agree to a prison sentence in the DRAM investigation, the Justice Department said. Lee Altschuler, Sogas's attorney declined to comment.

The case is U.S. v D. James Sogas, 06-0752, U.S. District Court, Northern District of California (San Francisco).

Banks Aid Buy-out Of Clear Channel (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Two buy-out groups and five Wall Street banks on Thursday combined to buy Clear Channel Communications for $18.7bn, taking the largest US radio station chain private after a short but dramatic auction.

The deal, led by Bain Capital and Thomas H. Lee Partners, marks the latest and biggest effort by cash-rich private equity firms to refashion chunks of the traditional media industry challenged by the digital age.

The two firms will control a large outdoor advertising business and 1,200 radio stations accumulated in 30 years of deals by members of the Mays family, who founded Clear Channel in 1972 and will continue to run the company under its new owners.

JCDecaux, the French outdoor advertising company, said it was interested in buying Clear Channel Outdoor and the buyers "are aware of our interest". Analysts have speculated that any buyer of the radio group would sell the outdoor advertising business to help finance the transaction.

The offer by T.H. Lee and Bain, already joint owners of Warner Music, surprisingly edged out a competing bid by Providence Equity Partners, Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, which had been discussing a deal for months before the company was put up for sale in October.

The chances of Bain and T.H. Lee emerging with the winning bid appeared to be further reduced this week when Texas Pacific Group, a third member of their consortium, pulled out.

But in a sign of how some of the largest banks are aching to participate in the private equity boom, Morgan Stanley, Citigroup, Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank and Royal Bank of Scotland agreed to contribute about a third of the equity cheque, estimated at more than $5bn, as well as to finance the debt package of more than $21bn.

The deal could attract regulatory scrutiny, given the rising presence of private equity groups in the media industry. The Federal Communications Commission is reviewing whether to loosen media ownership limits.

The Clear Channel auction was controversial because of its short time-frame, which critics saw as preventing the board from attracting the highest offer, and the large pay-out that the Mays family will receive in the deal.

The Texas-based company responded by allowing the board to solicit higher offers until December 7. In addition, the Mays family agreed to reduce the incentives it was entitled to in a "change of control".

Clear Channel shareholders will receive $37.60 per share, or $18.7bn, in the buy-out. This values the company at about 12 times next year's estimated ebitda. The buyers will be taking on about $8bn of its debt.

In A Big Bet On Radio,Private-Equity Group Buys Clear Channel (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride And Dennis K. Berman

In an age of intense competition from iPods, satellite radio and other glitzy new media, many investors have given up on the traditional radio industry. With an $18.7 billion buyout of radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., a group of private-equity investors is betting that the medium will be able to ride out the current storm much as it weathered past threats from television and other rivals.

A group led by Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and Bain Capital LLC has agreed to acquire Clear Channel for $37.60 a share, plus the assumption of about $8 billion in debt. Thomas Lee and Bain beat out a second group comprising Providence Equity Partners Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Blackstone Group, which had bid $36.85 a share. Each firm will have about a one-third equity stake, leaving the remaining third divided among a consortium of banks and the Mays family, who will be eligible for an options pool representing 3% to 5% of the new company. Mark Mays, currently chief executive, and Randall Mays, currently president and chief financial officer, will continue in those roles. Founder Lowry Mays may stay on as chairman emeritus.

Separately, Clear Channel said it was selling its 42 television stations and 448 of its radio stations in smaller and medium-size markets. That would still leave the company a radio giant, with more than 700 stations around the country.

The deal is the latest in a string of private-equity transactions in the industry, underscoring the growing attraction of radio to private equity despite stagnant advertising revenue and other problems. The business's steady cash flow and what some see as an opportunity to increase revenue using new technologies such as digital radio have some investors saying the business has been undervalued by Wall Street.

The founding Mays family has a stake of only 7% in the company. Nonetheless, it has continued to be the dominant force even as the company's market value plummeted steeply in recent years because of lackluster ad revenue and the perception that the industry faced steep competition. Lately, advertising at Clear Channel's more than 1,150 radio stations has been trending upward, and its robust outdoor advertising business has been growing.

The Mayses are expected to cash out most of their stake through the transaction. The fact that the Mayses will stay on while also likely receiving a new chunk of equity from the firm's owners led to investor concern that the transaction might unfairly benefit the family more than other shareholders. The board's independent directors, led by Perry J. Lewis, moved to address such concerns by, for example, pressing the Mays family to give up a chunk of their change-of-control benefits as part of the transaction. Those benefits awarded the Mayses payments that are seven times their salaries and bonuses.

It was the willingness of the Mayses to waive more than half of those payments, according to a person familiar with the matter, that helped both the Lee/Bain group and the rival group move their bids higher. And it was additional equity funding from the winning group's banks that helped Bain and Thomas H. Lee pay up after one of their consortium members -- Texas Pacific Group -- dropped from the race.

Those equity backers include banks who don't usually put up their own capital in deals. Consortium lead adviser Morgan Stanley, for instance, is investing $500 million in the transaction, according to people familiar with the matter. Citigroup Inc., Deutsche Bank AG, Credit Suisse Group and Royal Bank of Scotland are also providing equity commitments. In addition, Wachovia Corp. is helping finance the transaction. Law firms Ropes & Gray and Dow Lohnes advised the buy-out consortium.

In an interview, Scott Sperling, co-president of Thomas Lee, and John Connaughton, a managing director at Bain, said they expect annual returns in the 20%-30% range for the company. The firms say they are largely behind the strategy that Mark and Randall Mays are already executing.

The firms plan to step up investments in areas such as cutting-edge radio technology, using the Internet as an extension of the main radio business, and digital billboards, for which advertisers pay higher rates. Clear Channel had already been investing fairly heavily in those areas.

Bain and Thomas Lee already have radio experience through their stakes in Cumulus Media Partners, a group that runs more than 30 stations in big markets like San Francisco and Houston. In addition, Thomas Lee is a member of a group that bought Univision, which has substantial Spanish-language radio assets.

The existing stakes in other media ventures create a potential conflict with the Federal Communications Commission, which imposes limits on the number of stations any one company can own in a market. Lawyers say the companies can get around this by cutting back their involvement in the smaller groups, such as Cumulus, so they no longer have active roles in running those companies. Alternatively, they could sell their stakes in the smaller ventures.

Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and attorneys at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld advised Clear Channel, with Lazard Ltd. and law firm Sidley Austin advising the company's "special advisory committee."

Clear Channel Sale To End Era (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Clear Channel Communications Inc. has agreed to sell the company to a consortium of private-equity firms and plans to shear off more than one-third of its 1,150 radio stations, dismantling a giant that dominated the industry and became the bogyman of media consolidation for the past half-decade.

Clear Channel is hard to avoid in Washington. It owns eight local radio stations, including popular rocker DC101, top 40 station Hot 99.5 and sports-talk WTEM-AM. It sells ad space atop hundreds of taxis and on the sides of bus stops and provides traffic updates through its Total Traffic Network unit.

The buyers, led by Bain Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, agreed to pay $26.7 billion for the company, which includes the assumption of $8 billion in debt.

In a separate transaction also announced yesterday, Clear Channel said it would seek buyers for all of its television stations and 448 of its smaller radio stations, presumably because the private-equity buyers are not interested in owning television or small-market radio. The stations marked for sale are all outside the nation's top 100 markets, which would exclude Washington, the eighth largest.

The sell-off will mark the end of the consolidation era for the radio industry and its largest player, Clear Channel, and an acknowledgment by the company that it no longer is interested in smaller radio markets.

The predecessor to Clear Channel was founded by L. Lowry Mays and Red McCombs, former owner of the Minnesota Vikings, with the purchase of one San Antonio radio station in 1972. The company went public in 1984 and grew remarkably in the 1990s as the result of favorable Federal Communications Commission rules allowing for radio consolidation. The company topped out at more than 1,200 stations in 2000, just before radio ratings and ad revenue began to flatten as listeners moved elsewhere.

As the company grew, it received unfavorable press for its size and influence on music playlists and artist development. Clear Channel was criticized for homogenizing the sound of FM radio and strong-arming acts into playing company venues in return for airplay. The criticism became so intense that the company posted a "myth vs. facts" section on its Web site to answer charges.

Mays's sons, Randall and Mark, will continue to operate the stations under new ownership. As part of the sale, all three received substantial payouts, the value of which was not disclosed.

Bain and Lee also are bidding for Tribune Co., which owns several newspapers and television stations. That process is ongoing. But now that the two private-equity firms are set to own Clear Channel, an additional purchase of Tribune could force the private-equity firms to sell certain papers and television stations to comply with FCC regulations prohibiting one company from owning a newspaper and radio or television station in the same city.

Clear Channel stock closed up $1.24 yesterday to close at $35.36. The buyers paid $37.60 per share, the highest price the stock has seen since mid-2004, and a 25 percent premium on its average price in the month ending Oct. 24. Last year, Clear Channel radio reported more than $3.5 billion in revenue, tops among radio groups. CBS Radio was second at $2.1 billion.

It's been all downhill for Clear Channel stock since its high of nearly $100 per share in 2000, and a buyout likely represents the greatest value its owners felt they could get for their shareholders and themselves.

The buyout is a "significant milestone in radio industry history," said BIA Financial Network radio analyst Mark R. Fratrik, noting the move of traditional media from public to private ownership.

"By going private, these companies and their financial backers believe that they can grow in value over the long term without being concerned about investors' quarterly targets," Fratrik said.

Bennett Zier, who managed Washington's Clear Channel stations until January, when he left to launch Daniel M. Snyder's Triple X ESPN Radio venture, said: "We're private, and we love it."

Top Task At Reader's Digest: Revival (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Private-equity firm Ripplewood Holdings LLC, leading a group that agreed to buy Reader's Digest Association Inc. for $1.6 billion, now faces the tough challenge of turning around the long-declining magazine publisher.

To help do so, Ripplewood plans to integrate its existing media businesses, which include Time Life Books and the Weekly Reader, with Reader's Digest direct-marketing machine. Aside from the pint-sized magazine, Reader's Digest publishes 26 other titles, including faster-growing names such as Every Day with Rachael Ray and Backyard Living.

The deal comes as private-equity firms are bidding on a growing number of media properties struggling to cope with shifts in consumer habits brought on by the Internet and other new media. Reader's Digest, well known to many older Americans and people overseas, has been losing circulation for many years.

Four years ago, under pressure from investors unhappy with the company's performance, the founding Wallace family agreed to eliminate a dual-share voting structure that had allowed them to retain control of the company.

But there's been no improvement in the performance of the business, based in a sprawling colonial complex in Pleasantville, N.Y. Revenue has been flat for the past three years. And the company, which has taken write-downs of book-fair business Books Are Fun, has posted operating losses for the past two years.

Still, the company has been steadily building up other parts of its business, launching 14 magazine titles in the past three years. By taking the company private, Ripplewood and the company's management see an opportunity to invest more heavily in faster-growing properties such as Every Day with Rachael Ray; Taste of Home, a cooking magazine that prints recipes from readers; and the Web site Allrecipes.com.

"One of the big advantages of being private is that you can tolerate failure and make experiments," said Tim Collins, Ripplewood's chief executive officer. Reader's Digest has put "very little money into [celebrity cooking host] Rachael Ray and it is going gangbusters. And we can do more of that by not worrying about next quarter's earnings."

Ripplewood also hopes to push the titles more heavily into the Web. Mr. Collins suggested that readers of Family Handyman magazine, for instance, could ask home-remodeling questions of an editor online, contribute to an online forum, and read electronic advertising related to the project.

Reader's Digest CEO Eric Schrier told employees in a memo yesterday morning that the sale was a "momentous step, but it does not fundamentally change what we are trying to accomplish together."

Ripplewood is paying $17 a share, a 9.6% premium on Reader's Digest's closing stock price Wednesday. Reader's Digest shares were up $1.19 to $16.70, below the offer price, in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Coming after several years of stagnation in the company's stock, the deal pleased some shareholders. "We applaud Reader's Digest Board on the transaction announced today," said Clifton S. Robbins, CEO of Blue Harbour Group, which owned 6.9% of the company as of Sept. 30.

Other shareholders are holding out hope that another bidder will emerge. "We're not hostile towards the announcement but it remains to be seen is if this is the best price available," said Leon Cooperman, chairman and CEO of investment firm Omega Advisors Inc., which owned about four million shares of Reader's Digest, or 4.2% of the company, as of Sept. 30.

Ripplewood has emerged as a somewhat different animal compared with the mass of large-scale buyout firms competing for the likes of Clear Channel Communications Inc. Preferring to work alone and in areas deeply out of favor with other investors, it has scored a number of large successes. The best was a deal shared with former banker J.C. Flowers, in which the two turned a $1 billion investment in a Japanese bank into a stake worth about seven times that amount back in 2004.

Aside from Ripplewood, J. Rothschild Group, GoldenTree Asset Management, GSO Capital Partners, Merrill Lynch Capital Corp. and Magnetar Capital are part of the group purchasing Reader's Digest.

RTL Eyes £5bn Move For ITV Group (FT)

By Andrew Edgecliffe-johnson

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

RTL, Europe's largest broadcaster, is working with private equity backers on a possible £5bn-plus ($9.4bn) offer for ITV, the UK television company that is waiting for NTL, the US-listed cable company, to formalise the bid approach it made last week.

Its plan envisages private equity groups putting up most of the funds needed to acquire ITV, which has a market capitalisation of £4.5bn and almost £1bn in debt.

The structure would allow RTL to acquire a minority stake without calling on Bertelsmann, the German media group that owns 90 per cent of its shares, to fund the deal.

After Bertelsmann bought out its only outside shareholder in May for €4.5bn ($5.8bn), it said its debt load would preclude any large deals until the end of 2007.

RTL would not comment, but the group is understood to be concerned about overpaying, so a steep rise in ITV's share price could yet derail its plans. One media executive cautioned that the plan had just a 50 per cent chance of succeeding.

A formal offer by NTL for ITV could also deter RTL. The chairmen of ITV and NTL have yet to meet, but NTL has already begun lining up financing for the deal, which would greatly increase its debt load, and has approached Michael Jackson, the former Channel 4 chief executive, to run ITV if its offer succeeds.

RTL is thought to be examining alternative purchases in the European television industry at the same time, but its interest in ITV will heighten expectations that ITV's board could find it hard to remain independent.

Gerhard Zeiler, RTL's chief executive, said on Monday that it was not in talks with ITV "at the moment" but would not rule out a deal.

Private equity groups are rumoured to be struggling to value ITV at much above 125p, but valuations will depend on their estimates of when its declining advertising revenues turn round, something Mr Zeiler said on Monday he did not expect to see within a matter of months.

Buying the UK's largest commercial broadcaster would fill an important gap for the Luxembourg-listed group, which owns a smaller UK terrestrial channel, Five, but has market-leading positions in most other European markets.

RTL and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts are understood to have been looking at ITV since the spring, when a private equity team of Apax Partners and Goldman Sachs attempted to gain control of the company for 130p per share. However, KKR is not currently thought to be involved in RTL's pursuit of ITV.

It is expected that RTL would have to sell Five, where it acquired full control last year, for regulatory reasons and to help finance the deal.

J&J To Buy Conor Medsystems For $1.4B (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

J&J to Acquire Conor Medsystems for About $1.4 Billion Cash, or $33.50 Per Conor Share

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. (AP) -- Johnson & Johnson said late Thursday it will buy cardiac stent maker Conor Medsystems Inc. for $33.50 per share in cash, for a total value of about $1.4 billion. The purchase price represents a 21 percent premium to Conor's Thursday closing stock price.

The company said the deal gives J&J's Cordis unit the controlled drug delivery technology currently used on the CoStar Stent System, a paclitaxel-eluting cobalt chromium stent with a bioabsorbable polymer.

The CoStar Stent is currently sold outside the United States, and enrollment in its U.S. pivotal clinical trial has been completed. The stent is used for the treatment of narrowing of the arteries and the company hopes it will be used as a treatment for heart attacks.

Conor Medsystems' CoStar Stent uses reservoir drug-delivery technology that enables site-specific drug delivery as well as the potential for delivery of multiple drugs that may be useful in the treatment of cardiovascular, peripheral vascular and neurovascular diseases.

The boards of both J&J and Conor have approved the transaction, which is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007, subject to antitrust clearance, Conor stockholder approval and other customary closing conditions.

Menlo Park, Calif.-based Conor Medsystems will operate as part of the Cordis franchise. The company has about 200 employees and posted 2005 sales of $2.3 million.

Upon closing, Johnson & Johnson expects to record a one-time charge of about $600 million to write off in-process research and development costs. Excluding these items, the deal will modestly dilute J&J's earnings per share in 2007.

J&J shares closed earlier down a penny at $66.53 on the NYSE, and slid 13 cents after-hours. Conor shares rose 47 cents to close earlier at $27.52 on the Nasdaq.

FTC Chair: Gasoline Price-gouging Law Is Unneeded But Will Pass (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON – The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages.

FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law.

“We looked vary carefully but didn't see any new legislation needed to protect consumers,” Majoras said at an antitrust conference Thursday. “Will new legislation be passed? I think we will see a price-gouging statute pass, perhaps at the end of this (incoming) Congress.”

With gas prices rising to over $3 per gallon this spring, the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, “There's a lot more that has a higher priority.”

Majoras said she understood the public's frustration and concern but said an upcoming FTC report on the price spikes found that consumer demand was up at the time.

“There is a distinction between a market determination you don't like and a market failure,” she said.

Testifying in May before the Senate Commerce Committee, Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution. She noted the price spikes after Hurricane Katrina last year resulted in more fuel getting to market.

Majoras, who has previously questioned whether a price-gouging law could easily be enforced, said Thursday that despite her concerns, the agency would enforce the law if it passed.

The Justice Department's top antitrust official, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, attended Thursday's conference and said addressing fuel prices was a tricky issue for his agency.

He said that like all cartels, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is bad for consumers. But he said any effort to hold OPEC to U.S. competition laws would have to be balanced with national security and diplomatic interests.

Delta Seeks Creditor Help To Fend Off US Airways Bid (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Delta Air Lines began trying to rally support from creditors for its push to fend off an $8.76 billion hostile takeover bid by US Airways, with the Atlanta carrier firmly reiterating its determination to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone company.

Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein and other executives at the third-largest U.S. airline by traffic held a series of conference calls yesterday with creditors to sift through terms of US Airways' cash-and-stock offer, pressing creditors to back Delta's restructuring plan. The move could give Delta an early advantage in its fight to remain independent, since US Airways hasn't had any face-to-face meetings with Delta's official creditors committee.

US Airways officials were still trying to arrange a meeting with representatives of Delta's official creditors committee. People familiar with the situation said such a meeting could come as early as next week, with Delta officials expected to attend. "We're looking forward to meeting with them. We want to sit with them and show them the value of this deal," said US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader.

The Atlanta airline said the executives were reviewing the unsolicited proposal, which seeks to combine US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., with its much bigger rival under the Delta name and become the biggest US airline in terms of passenger traffic.

"As we are obligated to, we will continue to work, including with our creditors, to examine the unsolicited proposal from US Airways," said Marshall S. Huebner, of Davis Polk & Wardwell, who has led Delta's restructuring.

Delta faces the burden of proving to creditors that the airline would be more valuable by itself after restructuring than US Airways' bid. US Airways said its offer of $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million of its shares was at least a 25% premium based on where unsecured Delta bonds were trading. Delta's 8.300% coupon bonds maturing Dec. 15, 2029, are up nearly $236 per $1,000 of face value since Tuesday according to data from bond-tracking company MarketAxess. Doug Parker, US Airways CEO, has pointed to the rise in Delta's unsecured bonds as a sign that at least unsecured bondholders thought US Airways offered a better deal.

However, antitrust concerns could squelch a deal or make it less attractive. Also, Delta management has the exclusive right to present restructuring plans through Feb. 15 and could stymie US Airways' efforts to gain financial data necessary to put together a detailed offer to creditors. Delta officials are aiming to exit bankruptcy as early as April, which puts pressure on Mr. Parker to act fast.

US Airways stock continued its post-proposal rally, rising $1.11 to $60.61 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading; the shares are up 19% since Tuesday, the day before the bid was announced.

Meanwhile, Mr. Grinstein continued his defense to employees and creditors of his plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone carrier. Mr. Grinstein learned of the proposal from a radio report as he was getting ready for work. He rushed to his Blackberry to find a letter and a voicemail from Mr. Parker.

People familiar with the matter said Mr. Grinstein was steaming from being blindsided. In a message to employees he said "we had no advance warning of any kind." He said his intent was that Delta remain a "standalone company."

One of the biggest hurdles for a successful US Airways-Delta merger will be resistance from US Airways' labor union leaders, who voiced opposition to a proposed deal yesterday. Management must still combine the work forces of its two predecessor airlines, US Airways and America West, and negotiate new pay and benefit contracts.

"If this airline can't successfully put two airlines together, we're very skeptical about their chances of putting three together," said Jack Stephan, chairman of the unit of the Air Line Pilots Association union at US Airways.

Even before the Delta bid surfaced, pilots at US Airways had planned to picket this week at airports in Phoenix and Charlotte. Yesterday nearly 600 of them showed up to protest what they say are substandard contracts with little-to-no improvement in pay or benefits and unreasonable work rules.

Ms. Rader, the US Airways spokeswoman, said the negotiations have had some progress, though it has been on low-hanging issues so far. She disagreed with the union's assertion that the current merger is not working well. "There are a lot of milestones that we are hitting and that we're on track to meet and when we make mistakes we get them fixed," she said.

If Delta Merges: Fares Up, Fewer Seats (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

Whenever a big airline deal is proposed, the first question that arises usually is: What will it mean for the flying public?

In the case of US Airways' announcement this week that it hopes to acquire bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion, the simple answer is: higher prices.

That's because the merger would cut capacity by about 10 percent - in other words, passengers would have 10 percent fewer seats to choose from when they fly, which usually drives up prices. That would be good for the overall industry's bottom line.

But the dynamics behind this proposed merger, and the still precarious state of the nation's recovering aviation industry in the post-9/11 world, make the ramifications for the public far less clear. Add to that, it's far from a done deal: It still needs approval from the bankruptcy courts and the Justice Department. As a result, analysts have starkly different assessments of "just what this will mean."

One camp thinks it's the best thing to happen to the industry bottom line since jet fuel prices dropped below $70 a barrel. That's because it will cut capacity. "Anytime you take capacity out of the industry, I would view it favorably," says Helane Becker, an analyst at the Benchmark Company in New York.

But a different school of thought says that with planes already flying 80-to-90 percent full, overcapacity in the industry is no longer a major issue. After all, the traditional, so-called legacy carriers are making money even with oil at $60 a barrel.

"Forget the capacity canard: Everything is already full. There's already a resurgence in the industry," says Michael Boyd, president of the Boyd Group, an aviation consulting company in Evergreen, Colo. "If we take another 10 percent capacity out, that means airlines will carry fewer people and charge them more. Congress will just love that."

Then, of course, there's the question of what it will mean for competition. US Airways contends the combined company, which would become the "New Delta," would be more efficient and thus a better competitor in the recovering marketplace. The combined operations would save $1.65 billion a year by doing away with duplication, consolidating information systems, and reducing overhead, it says. And all those efficiencies can be achieved without cutting a single destination that's currently served by either airline, according to Doug Parker, US Airways chairman and chief executive.

"Even with a 10 percent reduction in capacity, all existing U.S. destinations served today by US Airways and Delta will remain part of the new, improved network," Mr. Parker wrote to Delta's chairman in an open letter released Wednesday morning. "Consumers will have the advantages of a larger, full-service airline with the cost structure of a low-fare carrier, and the communities we serve, as well as those Delta serves, will have access to a wider range of network options."

Some analysts like Mr. Boyd doubt those touted savings can be achieved. He also thinks the airlines' route structures - which are similar, particularly in the South and East, where they own the competing Northeast corridor shuttles - could cause problems at the Department of Justice.

"It doesn't make any sense at all. The synergies aren't there like they're claiming," says Boyd. "And the DOJ might turn this down in a heartbeat, because it just decimates competition, particularly in the Deep South."

Other analysts also question whether the cut in capacity brought about by the merger would result in anything but a short-term gain for the industry as a whole, particularly if there's a recession next year. In that case, the majors might start increasing capacity to fend off competition from low-cost carriers, which have continued to expand their market share, says Kevin Mitchell of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa.

And then, the industry could find itself right back where it is today: charging prices that are so low it is just barely able to make a profit.

Another question is how easy it will be to make one company from two that have very different corporate cultures. There are seniority lists to merge and very different unionized workforces to integrate. The companies even fly different planes.

"This is not an industry where mergers often go smoothly, even when both parties are willing participants," says Clint Oster, an aviation expert at Indiana University in Bloomington. "It's hard to believe that it's not going to be very difficult to do in this case, particularly because it appears to be more of an equivalent to a hostile takeover."

But other analysts, who believe next year will be a good one for the industry, say the merger will help consolidate what is still a fairly fragmented industry. They also believe that higher prices brought about by a merger not only are necessary, but could be here to stay.

"If you compare by historical standards, we're still flying very cheap," says Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities in New York. "Longer term, if you can continue to get some of the peripheral capacity out of the system, it will give [the majors] even stronger pricing power."

In the end, all the analysis could be academic. US Airways still has to convince Delta's creditors and a bankruptcy judge that a merged company could do better than Delta alone. It also has to win approval from the Department of Justice, which frowned on a merger between US Airways and United just a few years ago.

US Airways, Delta Deal Would Cut Options (USAT)

By Dan Reed And Barbara Hansen

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Travelers in at least two dozen Eastern and Southeastern cities would see their air travel options significantly reduced by a merger between US Airways and Delta Air Lines.

According to a USA TODAY analysis of airline data from Back Aviation Solutions, a merged carrier would have 50% or more of the scheduled capacity in 111 markets in the USA. That's up from 55 markets for US Airways and 31 markets for Delta. Both carriers are strong in the East and South, so not surprisingly, many of the communities that would see the biggest loss of choice are there, too.

The analysis follows a bid Wednesday by US Airways to acquire Delta Air Lines for $4 billion in cash and for stock valued at about $4.7 billion. US Airways is seeking to acquire its bigger rival out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy. If successful, the merged airline would eclipse American as the world's largest.

Delta management has been resistant to any takeover bid, and says it prefers to emerge from bankruptcy reorganization next year as an independent carrier. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein had previously rejected two private approaches from his counterpart at US Airways, Doug Parker.

The proposed deal would require approval from the bankruptcy court, federal antitrust officials and US Airways shareholders.

The USA TODAY analysis combines the number of seats currently offered by both carriers at airports across the country to identify areas of greatest impact. US Airways officials have said that the “New Delta” would trim current capacity by about 10%. It also plans to divest one of two Boston-New York-Washington, D.C., shuttles operated by US Airways and Delta.

According to the analysis:

·Six Eastern airports that now have competition would be served exclusively by the combined airline: Wilmington and Fayetteville, N.C.; Florence, S.C.; Huntington, W.Va.; Lynchburg, Va.; and Augusta, Ga.

·In 25 Eastern and Southern airports, where neither carrier now provides more than 50% of the service, the combined carrier would become dominant by providing more than half of the capacity. Among them: Asheville and Greensboro, N.C., and Charleston, S.C., Mobile, Ala., and Richmond, Va.

·Travelers in the carriers' respective hub markets in the East wouldn't see their choices diminish much. Delta already has 73% at Atlanta. A merger would nudge up that share by a percentage point. At Charlotte, where US Airways' capacity share is now 88%, the combined carrier would have 90%.

Additionally, US Airways says that “New Delta” would rank as the No. 2 carrier in the Pacific Northwest, No. 3 in the Southwest and California, and No. 4 in the central USA.

It's not clear that the proposed merger would reduce competition enough for the U.S. Justice Department to oppose it on antitrust grounds. In fact, it's not certain that US Airways' bid to buy Delta will even get that far.

If it does, says Mark Schechter, an antitrust attorney at the Howrey firm in Washington, D.C., “I would see a pretty extensive investigation.”

The last two big reviews of proposed airline combinations were challenged by the Justice Department because of its concerns about market concentration, says Schechter, a top attorney in the antitrust division in the 1980s.

A separate analysis Thursday by JPMorgan analysts Jamie Baker and Mark Streeter identifies six big markets where the merged airline would move from “moderate” to “high” in market concentration under a measure used by antitrust regulators. They are New York/Newark; San Francisco; Washington; Las Vegas; Seattle; and Boston.

US Airways officials began addressing potential concerns about market concentrations right out of the box on Wednesday. CEO Parker, in a conference call with analysts, stressed that last year's acquisition by America West, his old company, of then-bankrupt US Airways led to an average 24% drop in fares.

ATLANTA - When JetBlue announced in April it was launching flights to Charlotte, N.C., a major hub city for US Airways, JetBlue's CEO belittled the service passengers in that city had been getting as "substandard."

US Airways' chief executive, Doug Parker, shot back in a letter to his own employees: "US Airways is going to be here long after JetBlue."

Analysts, industry experts and those familiar with Parker's reputation said Thursday the 45-year-old's hostile bid to acquire a bigger rival in Delta Air Lines was not surprising, given bold statements like that one.

"I think anybody has to be feisty to do what he's doing," said Boston University School of Management Professor Allen Michel, referring to the unsolicited offer for Delta launched Wednesday by US Airways. The cash and stock bid to buy Delta once it emerges from bankruptcy is currently valued at $8.8 billion.

Parker's also been described as genial and approachable. Observers say those qualities could help him and his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline win over Delta employees.

"He looks like a guy who runs an airline and works at it very hard," said Fruman Jacobson, a bankruptcy attorney at Sonnenschein Nath and Rosenthal in Chicago. "If you go out for beers, Doug Parker is a guy you'd like to have with you."

Parker, who has held management positions at Northwest Airlines and American Airlines, led America West when it bought US Airways last year and adopted the US Airways name. While he's still integrating the two carriers, he says he's ready to tackle an even bigger challenge in acquiring Delta. This time, the company would keep the Delta name, becoming the nation's largest carrier in terms of revenue.

Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, said in a memo to employees late Wednesday that the Atlanta-based airline is committed to its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier.

He also said "the history of mergers in the airline industry is almost always one of failure, with over-promise of synergies and under-delivery of results."

Parker clearly has a different view, that consolidation is the wave of the future in the airline industry. He also knows that the bankruptcy process gives him an opportunity to pitch an alternative plan to Delta's creditors. Whether his bid for Delta works or not, analysts tend to agree with Parker that major carriers need to combine to reduce capacity in the industry.

"I think he's gotten a little bit emboldened by the merger with US Airways," said Jacobson.

Parker, with bankers, investors, creditors, politicians and consultants biding for his time Thursday, did not immediately return calls seeking comment. He said in an interview Wednesday he believes the Delta bid is a fair one. Efforts to reach Delta executives Thursday were not successful. One senior executive, Glen Hauenstein, canceled a lecture at Georgia's Kennesaw State University, according to a school spokesperson.

In an audio message to employees Thursday, Grinstein answered concern from some Delta employees that they learned of US Airways' offer from the media rather than Delta. "We had no advance warning of any kind," Grinstein said.

Michael E. Levine, who was an executive at Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest Airlines Corp. during the same period as Parker, said Parker is aggressive and driven.

"He takes risks," said Levine, now a senior lecturer at the New York University School of Law. "He ran with the bulls at Pamplona - I wouldn't do a thing like that. He can certainly count. He would like to run a big airline, and apparently this one isn't big enough."

Levine said the only question one might ask about Parker is whether at some point he might bite off more than he could chew.

"I'm not claiming this is that case," Levine said. "Doug is a guy who pushes ahead, and is unlikely to hesitate in the face of obstacles that might daunt other people."

Bernie Han, who has worked with Parker at three different airlines over the past 18 years, said the bold move to buy up Delta doesn't surprise him.

"I've seen him move up about every step of the way in his career," said Han, a former chief financial officer at Northwest and now the CFO at EchoStar Communications Corp. "Every time he gets the bigger job it seems effortless. I think it's clear he's always had the capacity to do more than his current role."

Even so, the bid for Delta poses several challenges. Those include proving to creditors that the offer is superior to what they'd get from the solo bankruptcy reorganization plan Delta plans to file, or a potential rival bid prompted by the US Airways offer. Parker also needs to nail down an agreement soon, as Delta has said it plans to emerge from Chapter 11 in the first half of next year.

US Airways also still has the America West integration to deal with. Its pilots pressed their case for a consolidated contract by taking to the picket line at the company's Phoenix and Charlotte hubs on Thursday.

"It's a question of, do you think an independent restructuring can create that kind of value or is the roll-up a more compelling structure because you can get revenue synergies and force out additional costs," aviation consultant Robert Mann said about how creditors would view the Delta deal.

News of the proposed US Airways buyout has also caught the attention of the Justice Department' top antitrust official. At a conference on antitrust law Thursday, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett discussed his agency's priorities, then added: "I strongly suspect we may be spending some time in the airline industry as well."

After a big run-up in its stock Wednesday that added to the initial $8 billion value of its bid for Delta, shares of US Airways Group Inc. rose another $1.11, or 1.9 percent, to $60.61 in trading Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange. Delta Air Lines Inc. shares are traded over the counter.

AP Business Writers Joshua Freed in Minneapolis, Vinnee Tong in New York and Matt Apuzzo in Washington contributed to this report.

Flying High In The Busy Skies (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

US Airways' $8 billion offer for Delta Air Lines could kick off a wave of consolidation in the airline industry. The question for regulators is whether the result is a leaner, meaner industry with lower costs or just a case of less competition driving prices higher. Without allowing a free-for-all to break out, there is clearly some room for combining operations in this changing industry.

Even with high fuel prices and strong demand for tickets, the fierce competition between airlines has helped hold prices down on many routes, keeping consumers happy. Low-cost carriers like JetBlue Airways and Southwest Airlines have put particular pressure on older full-service carriers like Delta. US Airways went through bankruptcy twice in the last four years, before merging with the discount carrier America West Airlines.

According to US Airways, if it succeeds in its bid for Delta the combined company would save $1.65 billion a year by eliminating redundancies. The fact that the two airlines offer competing shuttle service between Boston, New York and

Washington raises a big concern: that all these savings could come about as a result of dampened competition and thus at the expense of consumers.

But the carriers clearly aren't just crying wolf. No one could have missed the fact that oil prices have been sky high. The low-cost airlines are a high-profile presence, all over the airwaves touting their competitive advantages. If the Justice Department is aggressive about keeping competition by demanding that airlines divest part of their business on individual routes like the shuttle, some sensible consolidation could take place.

Domestic carriers should take care when it comes to raising fares. There are plenty of foreign carriers that would love to gain access to the United States domestic market. If the locals get lazy and expensive, they could compel Congress to open the door to outside competition. It wouldn't be a bad idea to re-examine the idea now, before the merger wave has crested.

Grupo Mexico To Fight Antitrust Ruling (AP)

MEXICO CITY --Mexican mining and railroad company Grupo Mexico said Thursday it will fight the federal antitrust commission's decision to uphold a previous ruling that blocked the company's plans to merge two railways.

The company "will take all legal means at its disposal" to fight the ruling, Grupo Mexico said in a filing with the Mexican stock exchange.

In November 2005, Grupo Mexico said it would merge its Ferromex unit with Ferrosur, controlled by multibillionaire Carlos Slim. The antitrust commission rejected the proposed merger in June, and Grupo Mexico appealed.

The commission rejected the appeal on Wednesday, arguing that a merger would have led to excessive concentration in the railroad industry to the detriment of consumers and competitors.

Grupo Mexico has argued it must expand in order to compete with U.S.-based railroad Kansas City Southern.

Kansas City Southern last year gained full control of local railway TFM, which runs through the heart of Mexico's industrial region to the border town of Nuevo Laredo from the Pacific port of Lazaro Cardenas.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Natural Political Gas (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Congress will return for one more lame-duck go-round after Thanksgiving, and if it wants an easy victory for the U.S. economy it'll whip through the offshore drilling bill that has passed the Senate and awaits action in conference.

The Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act, crafted by New Mexico's Pete Domenici, would open 8.3 million acres of the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and natural gas drilling. The bill doesn't go nearly as far as we or many in the House would like, but it's the best opportunity for new U.S. energy exploration in years.

While this Gulf acreage is known to hold oil reserves, the real significance is its bonanza of natural gas. Unlike the global oil market, most natural gas is produced regionally. Short supplies and high prices are punishing American industry, causing plant closures and job flight overseas. It is one of the larger economic messes in recent history, yet the political class barely mentions it -- perhaps because the politicians have done more than anyone to cause it.

As recently as 1995, the average cost for natural gas in the U.S. was about $1.70 per million British Thermal Units; by 2002 it was $3.54. It had climbed by 400% by last year, when it ranged from $11 to $14.50 per million BTUs. Japan, China, India and most of the rest of the world pay far less, putting U.S.-based companies at a huge global disadvantage.

Hardest hit has been chemical manufacturing, which in 2004 shuttered more than 70 U.S. facilities and marked an additional 40 for closure, resulting in a loss of 100,000 jobs. Did someone say "outsourcing"? Of the 120 chemical plants with $1 billion price tags being built around the world, only one is in the U.S. Dow Chemical CEO Andrew Liveris says his firm has shut down more than 30 factories in North America in the past several years, and he blames it on energy.

Natural gas is also a component of many everyday consumer goods, from plastic cups to carpets to semiconductors. Many of these manufacturers have faced shortages or steep price hikes, including Simmons (bedding), Goodyear (tires) and Newell Rubbermaid (packaging/containers). Massachusetts-based Union Products, originator of the famous pink plastic flamingos, recently closed its doors because of rising costs for plastic resin (made from natural gas) and electricity. The company's workers should thank Senator John Kerry and other Democrats who have blocked offshore drilling for gas and liquified natural gas imports.

The fertilizer industry, which relies heavily on natural gas, has lost more than 36% of its domestic capacity since 2002. The U.S. forest products industry has seen energy costs rise 50% for pulp and paper mills in three years; it has closed 232 mills and lost 182,000 jobs since 2000. The National Association of Manufacturers estimates that 3.1 million high-wage manufacturing jobs have been lost since 2000 largely due to inadequate supplies of natural gas. The next time Democrats wail over lost manufacturing jobs and try to blame it on "free trade," tell them to start drilling for the truth.

All of this is reason for Congress to act now. Gulf Coast Democrats are supporting this Senate bill, largely because it offers their states a cut of the royalties. The House has passed a much stronger bill, and in a better world would prevail. But with coastal, anti-drilling Democrats set to run Congress next year, now is the time for the House to swallow its pride, pass the Senate version without amendment to avoid a conference, and send it to President Bush.

The 8.3 million acres to be opened in the Senate bill would conservatively yield 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas -- a significant amount under any measure. Moreover, drilling in the Gulf has typically yielded three to five times more oil and gas than originally estimated. With any luck, the money that would start flowing to the Gulf states under revenue-sharing with the feds might also encourage other states to demand their own coastal exploration.

That should continue to be the long-term policy goal, as the outer shelf is estimated to hold an extraordinary 420 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, enough to keep the U.S. in affordable energy for decades. It's a disgrace that Congress has locked up that supply and driven high-paying jobs overseas. Passing this drilling bill would make a lame-duck Congress a little less lame.

Congress Seen Passing Price-gouging Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages.

FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law.

"We looked vary carefully but didn't see any new legislation needed to protect consumers," Majoras said at an antitrust conference Thursday. "Will new legislation be passed? I think we will see a price-gouging statute pass, perhaps at the end of this (incoming) Congress."

With gas prices rising to over $3 per gallon this spring, the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, "There's a lot more that has a higher priority."

Majoras said she understood the public's frustration and concern but said an upcoming FTC report on the price spikes found that consumer demand was up at the time.

"There is a distinction between a market determination you don't like and a market failure," she said.

Testifying in May before the Senate Commerce Committee, Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution. She noted the price spikes after Hurricane Katrina last year resulted in more fuel getting to market.

Majoras, who has previously questioned whether a price-gouging law could easily be enforced, said Thursday that despite her concerns, the agency would enforce the law if it passed.

The Justice Department's top antitrust official, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, attended Thursday's conference and said addressing fuel prices was a tricky issue for his agency.

He said that like all cartels, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is bad for consumers. But he said any effort to hold OPEC to U.S. competition laws would have to be balanced with national security and diplomatic interests.

California Plots Greenhouse-Gas Strategy (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- On a smog-free day, from his office on the 25th floor of California's Environmental Protection Agency, Robert Sawyer can see his problem: cars moving in slow procession on distant freeways, emitting carbon dioxide that is believed to be warming the atmosphere -- hastening the melting of the snow that caps the mountains to the east.

The soft-spoken mechanical and aeronautical engineer is chairman of California's Air Resources Board, a semi-independent agency that has been given the job of drawing up the nation's first regulatory program intended to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions by all sectors of the economy.

To accomplish this, Dr. Sawyer and his agency, which is known outside California as CARB, will likely face fierce lobbying by industries and consumer groups, and difficult political questions that haven't yet been answered in the U.S. But California regulations have shaped national legislation in the past, and CARB's efforts will be closely watched by other states and by the new Democratic Congress in Washington, where emissions reduction is likely to get increased traction.

The change will be most dramatic in the Senate, where Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, will succeed James Inhofe, an Oklahoma Republican, as chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works. Mr. Inhofe refused to consider regulations on carbon dioxide, calling global warming "the most media-hyped environmental issue of all time." Ms. Boxer, who believes "global warming could reshape the world as we know it," says she will introduce federal legislation that is similar to California's.

CARB, the nation's largest and most influential state environmental regulatory agency, has about 1,000 employees, including scientists and engineers who, working there in the 1960s, helped design the nation's pioneering antismog program. The agency enjoys enough bipartisan political support that when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger announced in August that California would impose the nation's first broad cap on greenhouse-gas emissions, the state Legislature simply set deadlines for reducing emissions and left it mostly up to CARB to figure out how to do it, telling the agency to prepare regulations by 2012. California's goal is to cut emissions by about 25% by 2020.

To flesh out California's law, Dr. Sawyer, who was appointed by Mr. Schwarzenegger in December, says he will push every approach that is cost-effective. He plans to send staff members to the United Kingdom and Japan to see how their pioneering regulatory programs work. He plans to hire 100 experts, including economists who will develop computer models of the state's past and future emissions. He is also looking for specialists who can design an emissions-trading program tailored to California's economy.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has successfully used emissions trading to get coal-fired utilities to curb sulfur-dioxide emissions, which cause acid rain. The government puts a cap on allowable sulfur-dioxide emissions, issuing credits needed for each ton of pollutants. In emissions trading, a company that reduces emissions below its assigned cap can finance its efforts by selling excess credits to companies that may need them to cover their own emissions.

California's legislature has left it up to CARB to determine whether and how to use emissions trading; Dr. Sawyer says it is a tool he wants to use, designed in a way that makes trading possible beyond the state's borders. "It is essential that what we do will be compatible with other states, nationally and internationally," he explains. "We definitely anticipate trading across boundaries. California can't solve this alone."

Making reductions in California won't come cheaply or easily, says Andrew Ertel, president of Evolution Markets Inc., a White Plains, N.Y., brokerage firm that specializes in emissions trading. The state's tough air-pollution laws have already driven out coal-fired utilities and other dirty industries where big cuts could be made. To meet California's target in reducing emissions, Mr. Ertel says CARB will have to focus on the transportation sector, which has roughly double the traffic of most states and produces 41% of the state's total emissions.

Among other approaches, CARB could recommend taxes or other incentives to reduce gasoline consumption. On this subject, Mr. Ertel predicts, the agency will experience "some heavy-duty lobbying" before its program emerges.

Jason Grumet, staff director of the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy in Washington, says CARB's struggles will be closely watched by national industrial groups. He believes industries opposed to federal regulations may soon swing around to support them -- as they did with the Clean Air Act of 1970, which had its seeds in California -- to get Congress to pre-empt a "patchwork" of conflicting state regulations from evolving.

Mr. Grumet notes that the political forces that shape California's climate-change regulations will be somewhat different from those that will emerge when the issue comes before the Democratic-controlled Congress. The influence of coal-fired utilities, the coal-mining industry and car makers, he explains, is much stronger in Washington than in Sacramento, where the biggest players will include oil companies, the state Chamber of Commerce and agricultural interests.

Environmental groups are also stronger in California and have used successful state programs in the past to sell environmental proposals to Congress. As a result, California's antismog regulations and appliance-efficiency standards made it into national law.

But some of CARB's most ambitious regulations haven't worked as advertised. On many fall days, when Dr. Sawyer gazes out of his office windows, he sees a dirty brown haze, and the distant mountains aren't visible. That is because California, while it has the nation's most stringent air-pollution regulations, hasn't even met weaker federal standards.

New Game A Pheasant Boom Lifts Farm Fortunes On Great Plains (WSJ)

By Joseph T. Hallinan

DOJ_NMG_0095848

VIVIAN, S.D. -- For nearly 100 years, LeRoy "Frenchy" Authier's family has ranched and farmed along the banks of a slender stream known as Medicine Creek.

They grew wheat and raised cattle. But farms got bigger and prices got lower and after a while, the money didn't add up the way it used to. So nine years ago Mr. Authier's 46-year-old son, Mike, and his wife, Katherine, sold off the last of the cattle and turned to a new crop: pheasants.

Today, they have four separate lodges on their land, including a converted barn and granary, that can accommodate up to 35 guests a day. Called the Medicine Creek Pheasant Ranch, about 30 miles south of the state capital of Pierre, it draws hunters from across the country.

Thanks to a federal program that pays farmers to idle millions of acres, the once-decimated pheasant is making a comeback. Many states in the nation's midsection are reporting their biggest populations of the game bird in nearly a half century. Hunters are also turning out in force, willing to pay people like the Authiers thousands of dollars a week to shoot the birds.

One result is an unexpected boom that is raising land values, propping up farms and generating new businesses in many parts of the Great Plains. In a good year the Authiers' pheasant operation will gross six times what the farm did, allowing them to raise their children in the house where Frenchy was born.

"Pheasant hunting is a good way to keep the farm in the family and the family on the farm," says Katherine Authier, who helps cook the meals for Medicine Creek's hunters.

The pheasant phenomenon has created an unusual alliance of farmers, hunters and environmentalists bent on preserving the program that pays farmers to leave some lands idle. For them, the biggest threat to the bird's well-being today isn't coyotes. It's corn, which is used to make ethanol -- the other big growth industry on the Plains. High oil prices have created intense interest in ethanol, an alternative fuel usually mixed with gasoline. As Congress prepares to write next year's farm bill, some want to see a portion of idled cropland planted with corn for ethanol production.

"There are other ways to conserve land," says Kendell Keith, president of the National Grain and Feed Association, whose members include ethanol producers. The outcome of the land debate could help shape the economy of the Great Plains, a dry spine of land that flanks the Rocky Mountains from North Dakota to Texas. Pheasant hunting, soaring land values and tourism have helped prop up local coffers here. Although the past two years have seen "unprecedented income creation," according to the Department of Agriculture, a drought this year has taken its toll on many farms and ranches. As a result, many welcome the new revenue from pheasant hunters.

In Iowa, for example, officials estimate that pheasant hunting brings between $170 million and $250 million to the state. That's a small part of the state's $113.6 billion economy, but a big number in a state of three million people. In South Dakota, pheasant hunters spent an estimated $153 million, according to the state Department of Game, Fish and Parks. And Minnesota, which last year recorded its highest pheasant harvest in 40 years, is developing a long-range plan to increase bird numbers. It pegs annual pheasant-hunter spending at about $63 million.

"This is just great," says Larry Spiegel, moments after a pheasant he shot from high overhead tumbles into a field of milo. He sells financial products to retirees in Las Vegas and is affectionately known around the Authiers' place as Las Vegas Larry. He's been coming to Medicine Creek since it opened. Each year he spends about a month hunting its hills and sloughs behind his dogs, G.G. and Bliss. He is such a regular that Mike Authier even named one of the ranch's buildings "Larry's Lodge."

The pheasant has long been the iconic game bird of the Midwest, featured on collector plates and tavern signs. In the postwar years, pheasants were everywhere, and returning GIs hunted the tasty bird in record numbers. A male, or cock, pheasant weighs about three pounds and can fly at speeds exceeding 45 miles an hour, making it a challenge to shoot. Hunting them often turned into a social occasion, drawing in friends and family from far away.

In the '50s and '60s, hyper-efficient farming practices, and the sacrificing of trees and grasses for cropland, destroyed much of the pheasant's habitat. The birds nearly vanished. According to state records, hunters in North Dakota bagged nearly 500,000 pheasants in 1963. By 1965, the number plunged to just 58,000. The following year, the state closed the season.

The U.S. government reignited the pheasant boom two decades ago with a new land-idling program intended to rein in American farmers' tendency to generate price-depressing gluts of subsidized grain. Under the Conservation Reserve Program, or CRP, Uncle Sam enters into long-term contracts that pay farmers nearly $49 an acre on average not to grow crops on roughly 36 million acres -- an area larger than New York and New Jersey combined. This year, CRP payments equal $4,143 per participating farm, or $1.76 billion altogether. Freed from the plow, these lands are reverting to grasslands and once again generating armies of wildlife.

South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds says he strongly supports continued CRP funding as part of the farm bill. "I'm just convinced that the more CRP we can get in, the better off we're going to be," he says.

Some groups, like the National Grain and Feed Association, want the program to allow more acres to be farmed. Such a change would benefit many of its members, which range from ethanol producers to operators of grain elevators. With the recent shift in control of both congressional houses, it remains unclear which side will prevail.

The ethanol boom is already transforming much of the Plains, where steam-belching new plants are replacing grain elevators as the tallest structures on this flat expanse. The plants have sucked in not only natural resources, like water and grain, but a vast pool of investors' money as well. Ethanol is the hottest investment play across the Farm Belt, attracting billions of dollars from everyone from Main Street merchants to Wall Street financiers.

Ethanol boosters say their product is helping reduce America's dependence on foreign oil and sparking the rural economy. As idled land is pulled back into production, they say, sales are likely to grow for companies that make everything from tractors and combines to fertilizer and seeds. The ethanol industry's enormous appetite for corn has already raised the price of the nation's largest crop to its highest price in a decade, brightening prospects for thousands of growers, potentially reducing the cost of government subsidies.

Land is the single largest asset and source of collateral for farmers on the Plains. Increasing land values are making the farmers wealthier at the same time that they are making the region's banks more financially solid. Last year, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the value of farm real estate, which accounts for 86% of farm-sector assets, gained 16.3%. Farm bank profits before taxes and extraordinary items jumped 8.2% last year, according to the American Bankers Association, boosted by strong farm incomes and appreciating farmland values.

Investors are snapping up land for pheasant hunting in places like South Dakota's McPherson County. Ten years ago, land around here sold for between $350 and $400 an acre. Now, the going rate is $1,000 or more. The real-estate boom even extends to the cheapest grade of land, which usually is too hilly or wooded for grain production, because birds thrive there.

Merchants in South Dakota have come to count on the 11-week hunting season, which brings in visitors to a part of the country that typically doesn't see many strangers.

At Tubby's Kwik Stop, a convenience store in Bowdle, where shotgun shells and hunting licenses can be bought with a morning coffee, "our sales probably double for the first two weeks of the season," says Lanny Stiklestad, the owner.

A few blocks away, at the Triple C Steakhouse bed-and-breakfast, the basement dining room was packed on opening weekend last month . Burly men in blaze orange, the traditional hunting-safety color, sat elbow to elbow, joking and watching a ballgame on TV.

Candice Williamson and her sister Cindy Lowens bought the town's long-abandoned hospital to open the place about 10 years ago. Now, it is typically booked solid months before the start of the season. On busy nights, says Ms. Lowens, the dining room will serve 120 people, a big crowd for a town whose population is just over 500.

In 2002, out-of-state pheasant hunters in South Dakota outnumbered residents for the first time since the state began keeping statistics in 1919. The gap is only widening. Nonresident pheasant hunters now provide more than $108 million a year to the state, according to South Dakota Game, Fish and Parks Department. That's about $140 for every man, woman and child in South Dakota.

In 2003, North Dakota hunters persuaded their state officials to give them exclusive shooting rights on certain lands during the first week of the bird season. The Minnesota Attorney General sued the state of North Dakota in federal court, alleging the plan infringed on interstate commerce. In August, a federal appeals court sided with North Dakota.

Last year, South Dakota alone counted nearly 10 million of the birds, its highest pheasant population since 1963. It also licensed a record 95,000 out-of-state hunters.

The Friday before the opening day of pheasant season is the busiest day of the year at the Sioux Falls Airport, says airport manager Mike Marnach, surpassing even Christmas and Thanksgiving. About 2,000 people will arrive, twice the normal daily total. Disembarking hunters are greeted by local merchants in booths bearing cookies and coffee.

"We used to have the Hooters gals," says Mr. Marnach, and they would hand out free beer to the arriving hunters. "But that didn't work out so good," he says, noting the line of hunters trying to rent cars with beer on their breath. One local pheasant operation, he says, now sends stretch Hummers to pick up its guests, who come from across the country.

Pheasant money goes a long way in small towns on the Plains, where there are few extra ways to pick up spare income. Curt Honeyman's family has farmed in this area for years. But come pheasant season, he works for Cannonball Co., in Regent, N.D., one of the largest commercial pheasant-hunting outfits in the state. He guides 55 days a year, the first 40 without a day off.

"That brings in, oh, six, seven grand that I wouldn't normally have," he says. "For that short a time, that's not bad."

Making a living out here has never been easy. "'33 was dry. '34, the grasshoppers ate everything," says Frenchy Authier. He is 83 now and widowed, but still gets around the place, pointing out fence lines still buried from the Dust Bowl. For reasons lost to history, the opening days of pheasant hunting in South Dakota generally don't begin until noon. That is just fine with

Frenchy because it gives him time to watch his favorite TV show, "The Price is Right." Then he fires up a Ford pickup and trundles hunters out into the fields of his youth.

Gun Lake Land To Be Taken Into Trust (ICT)

By Gale Courey Toensing, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, November 17, 2006

BRADLEY, Mich. - The Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band of Pottawatomi's planned casino and entertainment center took a great leap forward recently when the federal government announced it would take land into trust for the project early next year.

The Interior Department will take 146 acres in Allegan County into trust for the tribe, which is known as the Gun Lake Tribe, on Jan. 5, 2007, according to an Oct. 27 Justice Department filing in the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., and with Michigan Gambling Opposition (MichGO), an anti-Indian casino group.

"This is another very significant step forward for our tribe. We applaud the actions of the federal government in their efforts to provide relief to the tribe and the local communities that are eager for the thousands of jobs and economic growth the casino will provide," Chairman D.K. Sprague said.

The tribe expects to begin construction next spring, Sprague said.

MichGO has until Jan. 5 to file an injunction against Interior, a legal step the group will take, spokesman John Helmholdt said.

"MichGO will be filing the preliminary motion for injunction and we're going to continue to cooperate and work with the court in a timely manner and leave it up to the court to decide," Helmholdt said.

The 300-member Gun Lake Tribe was federally acknowledged in 1999, but its effort to take land into trust have been snarled in court and at Interior since then.

Interior granted final approval to the tribe's land into trust application in May 2005. MichGO immediately challenged Interior in a lawsuit that is pending in the Washington federal court.

Last January, the tribe and the Justice Department filed for a summary judgment of MichGO's lawsuit, but the court has not acted since then. Around the same time, a federal appeals court dismissed an identical lawsuit that sought to delay the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi from developing Four Winds Casino Resort in southwestern Michigan. The dismissal set a precedent for MichGo's action against Gun Lake.

Helmholdt said the latest decision "is a very heavy-handed legal maneuver by the federal government and tribe in an attempt to force the court to take action. We believe due process should be allowed and we should be given a fair hearing in court before the tribe is allowed to take any action."

But Justice reminded MichGO that it already had turned down an offer to expedite matters.

"The Gun Lake Tribe has demonstrated to the Department that it may suffer irreparable harm should the trust acquisition be delayed any further. In light of this, the United States requested that MichGO join the United States in requesting expedited hearing on the summary judgment motions before the District Court. MichGO rejected this request and proposed instead that the United States prepare an Environmental Impact Statement. The United States does not believe an EIS is warranted in this case," Gina Allery, a trial attorney for the Justice Department, said in an Oct. 27 letter to MichGO.

Interior's final land into trust approval last May followed an unexplained 14-month delay after it had issued a preliminary approval with a "Finding of No Significant Impact" document in February 2004.

Helmholdt said MichGO's continuing request for an EIS - a more rigorous analysis than an Environmental Assessment - is "a central part of our legal argument."

But Justice may see the request as a replay of a tactic used by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who was indicted on corruption and fraud charges earlier this year. During its investigation, Justice found that Abramoff tried to get Interior to require an EIS in order to block the Gun Lake casino, because he believed it would threaten the market share of a nearby casino operated by one of his clients.

"MichGO's irresponsible decision to continue to pursue its flawed lawsuit to block our casino has wasted millions of taxpayer dollars and caused irreparable damage to the tribe and West Michigan's economy," Sprague said.

Sprague said the tribe continues to seek a gaming compact with the state and is pursuing an agreement, similar to others in the state, that would provide 8 percent of slot machine revenues to the state and two percent to local governments.

But Gun Lake plans to go forward with a Class III gaming facility with or without a compact, Sprague said. He cited a recent Interior decision to authorize Class III gaming for the Seminole Tribe in Florida without a tribal/state compact unless the two sovereigns negotiate a compact within 60 days. Without a compact, the state does not receive any gaming revenues and has no regulatory oversight role.

"A Class III compact would be best for the tribe, the state and surrounding communities. We are hopeful the Michigan Legislature and governor understand that for the benefit of Michigan and its residents, the time has come to sign the Gun Lake Casino compact," Sprague said.

Liz Boyd, spokesman for Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm, acknowledged the argument for a compact that would provide revenues for the state and municipal governments.

"We are having discussions with the tribe. Our former govenor, John Engler, perhaps said it best when he said, 'One way or another that tribe will have gaming, so the question is with or without a compact.' So the governor is really weighing the question very carefully and no decisions have been made yet," Boyd said.

American Trrack Coach Graham Pleads Innocent In BALCO Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Elite track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty Thursday to accusations he hindered a continuing government steroids probe targeting high-profile athletes.

Graham, who has trained Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, is charged with three counts of making false statements to federal agents in an indictment issued Nov. 1 by the grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports.

Graham was freed on US$25,000 bond after appearing before U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen.

His attorney entered the plea on Graham's behalf.

Graham operates Raleigh, North Carolina-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes Gatlin, the 100-meter co-world record holder who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April.

Graham also coached Jones, a sprinter who won five medals at the 2000 Sydney Games, and her former boyfriend Montgomery, formerly the world's fastest man who was suspended from competition for two years for doping.

Track Coach Pleads Not Guilty To Hindering BALCO Probe (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty yesterday to federal charges of lying to investigators and hindering the very steroids probe he ignited three years ago when he turned in a syringe full of steroids to investigators.

Graham, who faces three counts of making false statements about his relationship with an admitted steroid dealer, appeared in front of U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen in San Francisco with his attorney, Gail Shifman, who entered the plea on his behalf. Graham was released on $25,000 unsecured bond.

Graham, who has coached track stars Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery and Justin Gatlin at his Raleigh, N.C.-based camp, faces as much as 15 years in prison and $750,000 in fines. He began the massive steroids probe now known as BALCO (Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative) , which has resulted in four criminal convictions but combined sentences of less than a year in prison.

Shifman said the lack of substantive results in the probe have led U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan to target Graham.

"It's an unfortunate manipulation of the criminal justice system that an embattled U.S. attorney would turn on the person who brought the whole Balco investigation to the forefront," Shifman said by phone from San Francisco. "Trevor Graham is looking forward to the trial in this case. When the full story comes out, he will be vindicated."

A trial date could be set today during Graham's first appearance before Susan Illston, the federal judge who has presided over the BALCO probe.

Track Coach Trevor Graham Pleads Innocent In Steroid Probe (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Track coach Trevor Graham, who helped spark a U.S. government inquiry into steroid use by athletes, pleaded innocent to charges he lied to federal agents in the probe.

DOJ_NMG_0095852

Graham, coach to Olympic sprinters Marion Jones and Justin Gatlin, was released today on a $25,000 bond by U.S. Magistrate Edward Chen in San Francisco. He was charged Nov. 2 with three counts of making false statements.

``He'll be vindicated," Gail Shifman, Graham's attorney, said after today's hearing.

Graham was a witness in a federal investigation into Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame, California, lab known as Balco, the U.S. Attorney said. The lab's founder and four others, including Greg Anderson, trainer to baseball player Barry Bonds, have pleaded guilty to distributing steroids. No athletes have been charged and Bonds has denied using steroids.

Graham obtained illegal performance-enhancing drugs from an unidentified source and lied about it to U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents who interviewed him in June 2004, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco. Graham also lied about his contacts with the supplier, the statement said.

The charges each carry a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Graham, who is based in North Carolina, wasn't charged with distributing steroids.

Olympic Ban

The U.S. Olympic Committee banned Graham from its training centers Aug. 3, the first time the organization has levied such a penalty, after Olympic 100-meters champion Gatlin tested positive for testosterone at a meet in April.

Gatlin faces an eight-year ban after failing a second drug test in August. Jones was cleared of using banned substances. Graham also is being investigated by the International Association of Athletics Federations. Graham is fighting the Olympic ban and Gatlin has denied wrongdoing.

Graham has also trained twins Alvin and Calvin Harrison, Jerome Young, Michelle Collins and Tim Montgomery, who all received doping suspensions.

The San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office launched an investigation three years ago into steroid use by athletes. The probe was sparked in part by Graham, who anonymously mailed a syringe containing a sample of tetrahydrogestrinone, known as THG or the Clear, a synthetic ``designer steroid" that was once undetectable and is banned in baseball.

``I was just a coach doing the right thing at the time," Graham said in a 2004 interview with the Associated Press.

Graham had been granted immunity from prosecution before his interviews with the IRS. The agreement didn't include immunity from prosecutor for making false statements, prosecutors said.

The case is U.S. v Trevor Graham, 06-0725, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Anderson Still Won't Discuss Bonds, Heads Back To Jail (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A federal appeals court in San Francisco ruled yesterday that Barry Bonds's personal trainer must return to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports.

Greg Anderson, 40, already has served two other brief prison stints for refusing to testify whether his boyhood friend lied when he said he never knowingly used steroids. Both times, Anderson, held in contempt of court, was released on procedural grounds.

Anderson could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroids use.

The Giants slugger told a 2003 grand jury that he believed Anderson had provided him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids.

Appeals Court Orders Bonds' Trainer To Jail (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

Anderson is told to return to prison in contempt case involving BALCO. Also, track coach Graham pleads not guilty to lying.

Barry Bonds' personal trainer was ordered Thursday to report back to federal prison by noon Monday, after a federal appeals court affirmed a prior federal court ruling that prosecutors did not taint a grand jury with information gathered from a disputed tape recording.

In another BALCO-related court event, track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty to charges he lied to federal investigators.

Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson, 40, has been imprisoned twice previously for contempt of court for refusing to fully testify about whether the free-agent San Francisco Giants slugger lied when he told a prior federal grand jury that he never knowingly used steroids.

"Greg is as strong and resolute as I've ever heard him," said Anderson's attorney, Mark Geragos, who said he would continue appealing for Anderson's release, possibly to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Anderson has served more than 50 days in prison in the contempt case. He served 15 days in July before an earlier grand jury's term expired. He was sent back to prison for 37 more days but ordered released in October by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Geragos argued that Anderson shouldn't testify because prosecutors are relying on information that they gained in an illegally obtained recording of Anderson discussing steroids in 2004.

Prosecutors counter that their questions to Anderson are based on a search they conducted of Anderson's home, along with other athletes' secret testimony.

The 9th Circuit ruled Thursday that "the government's questions were not tainted by the … recording. … The material was not provided to [the] grand jury, in either recorded or transcript form."

Anderson is subject to spending more than 13 months in prison as the current grand jury term continues, his attorney said.

"But we have many other options," Geragos said.

Meanwhile, track coach Graham pleaded not guilty to three counts of making false statements to federal agents. He was indicted Nov. 1.

Graham helped start the ongoing federal investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative in Burlingame, Calif., by anonymously mailing a vial of the then-undetectable steroid "the clear" to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency.

Graham, who has trained U.S. sprinters Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, allegedly lied to federal agents when he said he didn't supply athletes with performance-enhancing drugs or tell them where to purchase the drugs.

Graham would face a maximum 15 years in prison if he is convicted.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Track Coach Enters Plea; Trainer Sent To Prison (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, (AP) — Olympic track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty to hindering a grand jury's probe of performance-enhancing drugs in sports on Thursday, the same day Barry Bonds's personal trainer was ordered back to prison for refusing to cooperate with the investigation.

Graham remained free on a $25,000 bond, but a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ordered Bonds's trainer, Greg Anderson, back to federal prison. He was directed to report by noon Monday.

Anderson's lawyer, Mark Geragos, said he was considering asking a 15-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court, or even the Supreme Court, to consider Anderson's plight.

Outside his arraignment in federal district court, Graham, who trained the track stars Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, did not comment after his lawyer, Gail Shifman, entered the plea on his behalf.

"He'll be vindicated," Shifman said.

Anderson, 40, has already been behind bars twice after being held in contempt of court for his refusal to testify to a grand jury investigating Bonds on allegations of perjury and tax evasion. Both times, the prison stints were cut short because of legal technicalities.

Now, he could serve more than a year in prison unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about alleged steroids use by Bonds.

On Nov. 1, the same grand jury indicted Graham on three counts of making false statements to federal agents investigating the use of steroids in professional sports. If convicted, Graham faces a maximum 15 years in prison and $750,000 fine.

Graham's lawyer declined to answer a reporter's questions about whether Graham supplied athletes with performance-enhancing drugs or told athletes where to get them, as the indictment alleged.

Drug Dealer Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl Case (DN)

Detroit News, November 16, 2006

A Detroit drug dealer faces more than 24 years in prison after he admitted today to distributing heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl that killed two people.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff will sentence James Edgar Coleman, 36, on Feb. 6 on two counts of distributing a controlled substance causing death.

Coleman admitted to selling the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed Lauren Jolly, a 17-year-old Bloomfield Township high school student, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights, earlier this year.

Coleman told Zatkoff he sold about 50 small packets of heroin to a drug house on Keating Street in Detroit, some of which was later purchased by Jolly and McElmurry, killing them in separate incidents. He said he did not know the heroin contained fentanyl.

"If you're in the business, you don't want to kill your customers," Coleman's lawyer Warren Harris of Southfield said outside court.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn McCarthy told Zatkoff Coleman did not have to know exactly what was inside the fatal mixture for him to be guilty of the crimes, which each carry a minimum 20-year prison sentence.

Under a deal reached with prosecutors, Coleman is expected to be sentenced to between 24 and 30 years in prison and will lose his right to appeal.

Harris said outside court that because Coleman has previous drug offences on his record, he would have faced life in prison if found guilty of selling heroin. That's why the plea deal made sense, he said.

It's the first charge related to deaths caused by fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed an estimated 133 people in Metro Detroit in 2005-06.

Detroit Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl Deaths (FREEP)

By Jim Schaefer, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, November 16, 2006

A 36-year-old Detroit man pleaded guilty today to providing the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed Birmingham high school junior Lauren Jolly and another man last spring.

James Edgar Coleman told Judge Lawrence Zatkoff in U.S. District Court that he was unaware that the heroin he supplied to a drug house on Detroit's east side also contained fentanyl, a drug that is 50 to 100 times more powerful. Fentanyl was blamed for dozens of deaths in the tri-county area from late 2005 through May 2006.

Jolly, 17, a student at Birmingham Groves, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights, both purchased the drugs that killed them from a house on Keating that Coleman said he supplied with narcotics.

As part of a plea deal, Coleman would be sentenced to 24 1/3 years to nearly 30 ½ years. Coleman's lawyer, Warren Harris, said his client was sorry and took the deal because he could have gotten life in prison on other charges the government issued.

Zatkoff set a sentencing date of Feb. 6.

Detroit Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Deaths (DFP/AP)

Detroit Free Press/AP, November 16, 2006

A Detroit man has pleaded guilty in the deaths of two people for giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl.

That combination is blamed in the deaths of more than 100 drug users in southeast Michigan over the past year.

Thirty-six-year-old James E. Coleman entered the plea to two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death.

Sentencing was set for February.

Coleman was charged in the deaths of 17-year-old Lauren Jolly of Oakland County's Bloomfield Township and 30-year-old Daniel McElmurry of Madison Heights.

Judge Rejects County Challenge To Medical Marijuana Laws (SDUT)

By Jeff Mcdonald, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A Superior Court judge rejected an argument Thursday from San Diego County that the state medical marijuana laws are illegal because they conflict with federal drug prohibitions.

In a tentative ruling, Judge William R. Nevitt Jr., said California laws permitting chronically ill patients to grow and smoke marijuana are voluntary, and as such do not automatically conflict with federals laws banning pot.

Attorneys for both sides are scheduled to make oral arguments in the case later Thursday afternoon. It is unclear whether Nevitt will issue a formal ruling from the bench or take the case under submission.

San Diego County sued the state of California earlier this year to try to overturn Proposition 215, which allowed for the medical use of marijuana. The issue has been hotly debated in the ten years since voters approved that initiative.

Many California counties have been slow to implement the law. San Bernardino and Merced counties joined the San Diego case earlier this year.

North County Times, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095855

SAN DIEGO ---- A Superior Court judge issued a tentative ruling today rejecting the County of San Diego's argument that California's medical marijuana law should be overturned.

Judge William R. Nevitt, who is scheduled to hear arguments in the controversial case at 1:30 p.m. today, issued a tentative ruling at 11 a.m.

Nevitt's ruling rejected the county's argument that California's decade-old, voter-approved law should be overturned because it conflicted with federal law.

San Diego County supervisors filed a lawsuit in state court in December 2005 after refusing to comply with state orders to create an identification card and registration program for medical marijuana users.

California is one of 11 states where voters have said seriously-ill people should be allowed to legally use marijuana to ease their suffering if they have a doctor's recommendation.

Federal law says marijuana has no medicinal value and is illegal for anyone to use.

The county argued that the California law should be "pre-empted" by federal law, which says all marijuana use is illegal, under the U.S. Constitution's "Supremacy Clause," which says federal laws should be "supreme" over state laws.

Nevitt, however, said in his tentative ruling that the county's argument ignored the corollary to the Supremacy Clause that held in matters where states traditionally legislate, state law is considered pre-eminent.

Nevitt also ruled out the county's argument that the state's order for counties to issue identification cards for medical marijuana users should be overturned.

Counties Take On State On Medical Pot (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO - Attorneys for San Diego County argued Thursday before a state court judge that the federal ban on marijuana use precludes states from exempting people who use the drug for medical purposes.

San Diego County sued California and its health services director in February over the state's decade-old law permitting use of the drug with a physician's approval. The county says it should not be bound to act to uphold state laws that conflict with federal statutes.

"California has authorized the exact same conduct that federal law has prohibited," argued Thomas Bunton, a senior deputy county counsel. "That's clearly an obstacle to the objective of Congress to prevent drug abuse."

Two other California counties, San Bernardino and Merced, joined San Diego as plaintiffs. All three counties have refused to comply with a state requirement that counties issue identification cards for medical marijuana users and maintain a registry of people who apply for the cards.

Earlier Thursday, Superior Court Judge William R. Nevitt, Jr., issued a tentative ruling rejecting the county's suit.

Nevitt did not indicate when a final ruling would be issued but set a Dec. 1 deadline for additional briefs on issues related to the case.

In his tentative ruling, Nevitt agreed with attorneys for the state, who argued that California is entitled to pass its own drug laws and legislate programs that allow marijuana use for medical purposes.

"The counties are not being forced to do anything that would be in violation of federal law," said Leslie Lopez, a deputy state attorney general. "They're simply being asked to carry out state law."

Five California patients and caregivers, represented by the American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Safe Access and other advocacy groups, joined the case on the side of the state. A sixth patient, Pamela Sakuda, who suffered from rectal cancer, died last Friday, said William Dolphin, a spokesman for ASA.

About 30 medical marijuana users gathered in the courtroom to hear the arguments, many loudly tut-tutting as Bunton and other county attorneys argued that making marijuana available to the ill can enable recreational drug abuse.

County officials said they have not decided whether they will appeal if Nevitt stands by his initial ruling.

"All we wanted was guidance telling us where we're at so we don't break any rules and lose any funding," said San Diego County Supervisor Bill Horn.

Supporters of the law said they were prepared for a fight.

"It will go as far as the counties want to take it," said Adam Wolf, an attorney for the ACLU Drug Law Reform Project who argued part of the case.

California's law allows people suffering AIDS, cancer, anorexia, chronic pain, arthritis and migraine and "any other illness for which marijuana provides relief" to grow or possess small amounts of marijuana with a doctor's recommendation.

Judge Issues Ruling Upholding Medical Marijuana Law (KGTV)

KGTV-TV, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- A San Diego judge Thursday issued a tentative ruling upholding California's medical marijuana law, finding against San Diego and two other counties that challenged voter-passed Proposition 215.

However, after hearing oral arguments, Superior Court Judge William Nevitt declined to issue a final decision in the lawsuit brought by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties.

Passed by California voters in 1996, the so-called Compassionate Use Act allows the use of marijuana for pain treatment and other medical reasons.

The counties' lawsuit, filed in February, claims federal law banning marijuana use and possession supercedes state law that allows the medical use of marijuana.

The suit was filed against the local chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or NORML, after the San Diego County Board of Supervisors refused to implement part of the state law requiring officials to issue identification cards to medical marijuana users to protect them from prosecution.

The American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Safe Access and Drug Policy Alliance joined San Diego NORML in fighting the suit.

Thomas Bunton, the chief deputy counsel for San Diego County, told the judge that the federal Controlled Substances Act of 1970 contains a provision that overrides state drug laws.

"Authorizing anyone to use marijuana undercuts the objective of federal laws," Bunton said.

Federal law does not recognize the medical use of marijuana, the lawyer contended.

The ACLU's lawyer, Adam Wolf, said the medical marijuana law only bars state police from enforcing federal drug statutes.

"We're not saying federal law can't be enforced," Wolf said. "All we're saying is the state doesn't have to be an active partner with federal law enforcement."

Joseph Elford, an attorney for Americans for Safe Access, told the judge that there is no conflict between Proposition 215 and federal law.

Even with marijuana use allowed for medical purposes, California is "90 percent of the way" toward compliance with federal anti-drug statutes, Elford said.

The judge did not indicate when he would release his final ruling. He did ask lawyers to file briefs by Dec. 1.

Wolf said he would try to reach out-of-court agreements with the counties so that the judge would not have to issue an injunction.

Top Supplier Of West Pot Pleads Guilty; Terms Sealed (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 17, 2006

Arizona defendant gets cap placed on amount of drugs he will be responsible for

He's just pleaded guilty in open court to being the chief supplier in one of Knoxville's most high-profile drug conspiracy cases, but could you keep that under wraps?

Assistant U.S. Attorney Hugh Ward on Thursday laid bare in U.S. District Court the details of Arizona drug supplier Phillip Arthur Apodaca's role in the marijuana-peddling conspiracy case involving Market Square businessman Scott West and his brother.

Apodaca, 36, admitted those details as he pleaded guilty to charges of conspiring to push more than a ton of marijuana and plotting to launder at least $2.5 million in drug money.

Despite his very public confession, Apodaca's Arizona-based attorney, Rudy Valenzuela, asked U.S. District Judge Thomas Phillips to place under seal the terms of Apodaca's plea deal and a document that outlines his crimes.

It's still not clear why, but it's not an entirely uncommon move. Most defendants who take a plea deal in federal court will wind up working as snitches in hopes of earning sentencing breaks, and that's not exactly something one wants to advertise.

Since Apodaca's plea agreement is now shrouded in secrecy, whether he has garnered a promise of a break for telling tales on others is unknown. His opportunities would seem, at least on the surface, to be limited.

After all, the man Apodaca has been selling thousands of pounds of marijuana to since 2001 - Mike West - already has struck his own deal with prosecutors Ward and David Jennings. Scott West also has pleaded guilty.

Charges are still pending, however, against Mark Anthony Cort, who was the alleged go-between for Mike West and Apodaca as well as a father and son accused of serving as couriers for Mike West.

Ward told Phillips at Thursday's hearing that Apodaca was living in Arizona when he took over as Mike West's "primary source" of marijuana. Mike West, records show, has been dealing drugs for more than a decade.

Apodaca routinely lined up 1,000-pound shipments of marijuana for Mike West, who rented at least two houses in Arizona to serve as "stash houses" for drugs and money, Ward said.

Although court records suggest that the West pot pipeline has funneled tons upon tons of marijuana into states including Georgia, North Carolina and Tennessee, Apodaca has locked into place as part of his plea deal a cap on how much of those drugs he will be held responsible for when sentenced.

"The defendant will be responsible for at least 1,000 kilograms but less than 3,000 kilograms" of marijuana, Ward said.

Those figures are key, because penalty ranges in federal cases are determined, in part, by how much dope a dealer peddled. Apodaca already faces a boost in his basic penalty range because the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, which toppled the West conspiracy, found guns in the supplier's possession when he was nabbed, Ward said.

Phillips set a March 5 sentencing hearing for Apodaca. Scott West is expected to be the first of his conspirators to face sentencing, with a hearing currently scheduled for December. Hearings for his brother and sister-in-law were recently bumped to January.

Detroit Police Search For Suspects; 5 People Are Shot, 2 Fatally (AP)

By Ron Vample

AP, November 17, 2006

DETROIT - Police arrested a man suspected in a series of shootings Thursday that left two people dead and three others wounded within a span of 10 minutes.

The shootings took place shortly after 6 a.m. in a three- to four-block area on the city's west side, Detroit police spokesman James Tate said.

Killed were Arthur James Smith, 49, and Othelia Fry, 58, both of Detroit, said Yvette Walker, a Detroit police spokeswoman. The wounded men - Elton Ash, 51, Dennis Anderson, 49, and James L. Brown, 50 - were treated at Henry Ford Hospital and released, hospital spokeswoman Synthia Bryant said.

Police arrested the suspect Thursday afternoon at a house about a half-mile from where the shootings occurred, The Detroit News reported on its Web site.

Investigators received a tip from a woman who told them the suspect told her he had shot five people in the morning. The woman led police to the man, the newspaper said.

A search of the house did not find a weapon or the clothes the suspect was believed to have been wearing during the shootings. But the man fit the descriptions given by witnesses, police said.

Tate said earlier that investigators believed there were two gunmen, but police told the Detroit Free Press late Thursday that witness accounts may have been wrong and one man may have been responsible.

Messages left for police by The Associated Press on Thursday night were not immediately returned.

Police said the victims apparently were chosen at random.

One gunman said something to the victims, Tate told The News without giving details. "Right now we have not established a motive," he said.

Fry was shot inside a vehicle in front of the Angel Land Child & Parent Center, a day care facility on Linwood Street, Tate said. There were no children at the day care at the time, and the shooting didn't appear to be related to the facility, he said.

Smith and Ash were shot minutes later about a block away. Shortly afterward, Anderson was wounded in his backyard and Brown also was shot, the Free Press reported on its Web site.

Police recovered shell casings from a handgun.

Linwood is a busy, four-lane street that runs through blocks of old homes. The area around the shooting scene is lined with liquor stores, empty lots, a church, gas stations and abandoned buildings.

Fry had been a cook at the child care center for five years and "really loved that job," said her husband, Bauford Carmichael, 65. She also was president of her block club and active with her neighborhood watch, he told the Free Press.

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives was offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the shootings.

"The magnitude of the violence, coupled with a gunman - or gunmen - at large precipitated our offer of assistance to the Detroit Police Department and our involvement in the manhunt," said Valerie J. Goddard, the agent in charge of the ATF's Detroit office.

Associated Press Writer Jim Irwin contributed to this report.

IMMIGRATION:

Feds: Border Security Costs Could Soar (AP)

The AP, November 16, 2006

Electronic monitoring and other steps for enhancing surveillance along the southwestern border could cost 15 times the initial $2 billion estimate, the Homeland Security Department's inspector general says.

"Early forecasts and estimates of the program's value range from $8 billion to $30 billion," Richard L. Skinner said in an audit report.

The estimate raised new questions about the viability of efforts by President Bush and Congress to revamp immigration policies. The Republican-led Congress demanded that a first step include efforts to improve security along the U.S. borders.

The contract for a "virtual fence" of new cameras, surveillance technology and revamped procedures for border agents was awarded in September to the Boeing Co. The first phase of the program is planned for a 28-mile stretch along the Arizona border near Tucson and is due to be completed in June.

The figures exclude the costs of about 700 miles of additional physical border fencing that Bush signed into law in September.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said only the money for the Tucson-area phase of the project, $67 million, has been set aside from agency funds so far.

"I'm not sure where his numbers are coming from," Knocke said of Skinner's estimate. He said the agency was open to listening to Skinner's ideas on how to strengthen oversight of the program.

"We've been very clear from the very beginning," Knocke said. "We were going to build a little and prove it before we build more."

"The bottom line is there isn't a number," said Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind. He was critical of how the contract was awarded and the program is being managed. He noted that estimates can change, but that Boeing must have had a cost estimate when it bid on the contract.

Souder said the plan to go ahead with just the 28-mile stretch near Tucson without a clearer overall plan was like building a house without a plan or cost estimate while saying, "we're getting along really well with the downstairs bathroom."

A Boeing spokeswoman noted that the company is "on a contract for $67 million at this time," with three one-year options. She declined to answer other questions.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., in line to become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee next year, said he is "troubled that we have not seen a detailed rendering of the department's strategy."

Bush and Congress have approved $1.2 billion for the border security program, but $950 million of that cannot be tapped until the department provides Congress with a report on how it will spend the money, Knocke said.

On Wednesday, Skinner told the House Homeland Security Committee's management subcommittee that the type of contract awarded to Boeing for the border program creates additional risks that, "unless properly managed, threaten achievement of cost, schedule, performance, and, ultimately, mission objectives."

Minuteman Spending Outstrips Donations, Fees (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, under fire for a lack of financial accountability, spent nearly $450,000 last year for volunteers to patrol the U.S.-Mexico border -- about $31,000 more than it collected in donations and registration fees -- according to a report released yesterday.

The organization's first Internal Revenue Service Form 990 filing as a 501(c)4 tax-exempt charitable trust showed nearly $285,000 in MCDC contributions, or roughly 63 percent, were used to pay for program management and operating expenses, such as travel expenditures, salaries, educational materials and office expenses.

Another $145,000, about 32 percent, went for MCDC's fundraising programs.

According to the report, about $20,000, or 5 percent, was spent on field supplies, meals, fuel and background checks for the claimed 8,500 Minuteman volunteers, who last year staffed observation posts at selected points along the Mexican border from California to Texas in April and October.

While the IRS papers document MCDC collections and expenditures through Dec. 31, a reported donation total of $418,493 is significantly less than the $1.6 million MCDC President Chris Simcox told The Washington Times in July that the group had collected in donations since its April 2005 creation. That figure was said to include $1 million in direct MCDC contributions and $600,000 toward the construction of a $55 million border fence.

At the time, Mr. Simcox said MCDC had spent $160,000 for two border vigils in April 2005 and October 2005, supplying volunteers with equipment, including computers, satellite phones, food and trailers.

He also said the organization spent another $36,000 for monthly, three-day musters by MCDC in the four border states.

MCDC officials declined to discuss the Form 990 report with The Washington Times, but Mr. Simcox said in a statement posted on the organization's Web site, "We are releasing our organizational IRS Form 990 and the additional audited financial statements on deadline, as promised, when promised."

He also said that the group's board of directors, which he heads, had decided that "this year and this year only" it would make public the organization's financial statements -- citing what he called "outright malicious lies about the status of MCDC finances."

In July, several MCDC leaders and volunteers questioned the whereabouts of hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars in donations the organization had collected.

Several of the group's top lieutenants either quit or threatened to quit, saying requests to Mr. Simcox for a financial accounting have been ignored. Others said money promised for supplies never reached volunteers at the border.

Mr. Simcox, during the July interview, denied the accusations, describing his critics as "known racialists, anti-Semites and a small handful of disgruntled people who have been terminated from staff or from leadership involvement with the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps over a year ago because they could not meet MCDC standards or adhere to our strict field standard operational procedures."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Sends Congress A Partisan Agenda (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush made nice with the Democrats for the television cameras after they won control of Congress, complete with pictures filled with handshakes, smiles and vows of working together. He even tossed Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld over the side, making many people think that maybe he was going to move more toward the center and reach out for bipartisan openings.

But the agenda he's sent to Congress since then is full of Republican proposals that have no chance of winning bipartisan approval, enrage Democrats, rally his conservative base and appear to be intended to paint Democrats as obstructionist.

Bush has resubmitted several judicial nominations that had been blocked even before last week's elections. He's asked again that the Senate confirm John Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. And he's urged approval of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists without any accommodation to Democrats' demands that a court sign off on the spying.

None of these proposals is expected to win approval in the lame-duck session of the Republican Congress, and all are assured of defeat when the Democrats take over in January.

Bush's proposals could be simply his opening bid in what would be a tough round of negotiations with the Democrats. Or they could be a political gambit designed to frame the Democrats early on as obstructionists while rallying a conservative base dispirited by last week's election losses.

Either way, they contradict the initial post-election image that indicated that Bush was ready to reach out to Democrats.

"I intend to work with the new Congress in a bipartisan way," he said the day after the election. "The message yesterday was clear: The American people want their leaders in Washington to set aside partisan differences, conduct ourselves in an ethical manner and work together to address the challenges facing our nation."

Then this week Bush sent to the Senate four appellate-court nominations that waved a red flag before Democratic bulls. They included:

-U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina, who's been blocked for years by Democrats who accuse him of being hostile to civil rights and often overruled by higher courts.

-William G. Haynes, a former Pentagon general counsel to Rumsfeld, who's been assailed by Democrats for his role in crafting Bush administration policies on detentions and treatment of suspected enemy combatants.

-Michael B. Wallace, a private-practice attorney from Mississippi who was rated unqualified by the American Bar Association and who's been criticized by Democrats as being hostile to civil rights and to the poor.

-William G. Myers, a mining lobbyist from Idaho who's opposed by environmentalists.

"Barely a week after the president promised to change course by working in a bipartisan and cooperative way with Congress, it is disappointing that he has decided to stay the course on judicial nominees," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who'll chair the Senate Judiciary Committee when the Democrats take over in January.

If Democrats think Bush's in-your-face moves will anger voters, at least one Republican strategist countered that they'll be applauded as overdue by conservatives.

"To the party's detriment, we did not run on the issue of judges as much as we should have. It's a winning issue for us," said strategist Keith Appell, who added that Bolton also is popular with conservatives.

"There is a real question as to how enthusiastic the Republican leadership was last year on these nominations. Now there is an opportunity for the Republican leadership in the Senate to re-establish itself with the conservative grassroots by fighting for these nominees."

Even if Bush loses, he wouldn't only rally the party base, Appell said, but a loss would also allow him to argue that Democrats were obstructionists.

"It forces the Democrats to violate their promise of bipartisanship," he said.

Bush also is pushing Congress to ratify his warrantless eavesdropping without any hint of accommodation to Democrats, who want the spying to continue but with court oversight.

White House spokesman Tony Snow defined bipartisanship in that case as the Democrats supporting the president's plan because both parties now share power - and the responsibility to protect the country against terrorists. On Bush's terms.

Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas, said he doubts that either side would be successfully or permanently scarred as obstructionist or face a backlash from voters at this early stage, still two years from the next election. Thus, he said, "Bush probably thinks it's too soon to sing Kumbaya with the Democrats."

MORE ON THE JUDICIAL NOMINEES:

-William G. Haynes, nominated to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., was assailed by Democrats during his hearings for his role in crafting Bush administration policies on enemy detentions and treatment. He served as general counsel for Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

-Michael B. Wallace is an accomplished private-practice attorney from Mississippi and a nominee to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. He was rated unqualified, though, by the American Bar Association - in part because the organization found that he lacked a "commitment to equal justice." Democrats seized on the report as proof that Wallace would be hostile to civil rights and to the poor.

-Federal District Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina technically has been waiting more than 15 years to get a seat on the 4th Circuit bench in Richmond. He was nominated by the first President Bush, but never got a hearing. He was re-nominated by the current President Bush in 2001 but was initially blocked by North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who thought the bench needed more African-Americans.

Boyle has been accused of being hostile to civil rights, and Democrats have vowed to filibuster him. The closest he's come to confirmation was a committee vote a year ago. His nomination expired before a floor vote, so he'd need another nod from the committee before a confirmation vote could take place.

-William G. Myers is a mining lobbyist from Idaho, nominated to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. Democrats have portrayed him as hostile to environmental interests, a key issue in the Western states covered by the court to which he's nominated. He hasn't gotten a committee vote yet.

-Norman Randy Smith, nominated to the 9th Circuit, and Peter D. Keisler, nominated to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, have been opposed for less partisan reasons, but they'll still likely face opposition.

Smith, a federal district judge from Idaho, was nominated to a seat on the appeals court that Californians traditionally have held. Democrats have opposed him for that reason.

Keisler, a former clerk for Judge Robert Bork and Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy, is opposed by Democrats who complain that his resume offers few clues as to what kind of judge he'd be. Some activist groups also criticize his nomination to the D.C. Circuit because he'd occupy a controversial new seat - one that Senate Republicans denied to Harvard Law School Dean Elena Kagan during the Clinton years.

Bush Choice For Family-Planning Post Criticized (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The Bush administration has appointed a new chief of family-planning programs at the Department of Health and Human Services who worked at a Christian pregnancy-counseling organization that regards the distribution of contraceptives as "demeaning to women."

Eric Keroack, medical director for A Woman's Concern, a nonprofit group based in Dorchester, Mass., will become deputy assistant secretary for population affairs in the next two weeks, department spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday.

Keroack, an obstetrician-gynecologist, will advise Secretary Mike Leavitt on matters such as reproductive health and adolescent pregnancy. He will oversee $283 million in annual family-planning grants that, according to HHS, are "designed to provide access to contraceptive supplies and information to all who want and need them with priority given to low-income persons."

The appointment, which does not require Senate confirmation, was the latest provocative personnel move by the White House since Democrats won control of Congress in this month's midterm elections. President Bush last week pushed the Senate to confirm John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations and this week renominated six candidates for appellate court judgeships who have previously been blocked by lawmakers. Democrats said the moves belie Bush's post-election promises of bipartisanship.

The Keroack appointment angered many family-planning advocates, who noted that A Woman's Concern supports sexual abstinence until marriage, opposes contraception and does not distribute information promoting birth control at its six centers in eastern Massachusetts.

"A Woman's Concern is persuaded that the crass commercialization and distribution of birth control is demeaning to women, degrading of human sexuality and adverse to human health and happiness," the group's Web site says.

Keroack was traveling and could not be reached for comment. John O. Agwunobi, assistant secretary for health, said Keroack "is highly qualified and a well-respected physician . . . working primarily with women and girls in crisis."

Mark Conrad, president of A Woman's Concern, said Keroack would be able to make the transition to leading a federal program in which provision of birth control is an integral part. "I don't think it's going to be an issue for him," he said.

The group helps women in unplanned pregnancies but discourages abortions, Conrad said. He said the decision is the woman's but "we do want to give her the opportunity to have all the information and the support necessary to choose life."

Marilyn Keefe, interim president of the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association, which represents 4,000 family-planning clinics, said Keroack's work "seems to really be geared toward furthering anti-choice, anti-contraception policies." She added that despite the congressional election results, the appointment "goes to show you the importance of controlling the White House and how important federal agencies are in the delivery of health services."

The federal family-planning program, created in 1970, supports a network of 4,600 family-planning clinics that provide information and counseling to 5 million people each year. Services include patient education and counseling, breast and pelvic exams, pregnancy diagnosis and counseling, and screenings for cervical cancer, sexually transmitted diseases and HIV.

Cecile Richards, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, called Keroack's appointment "striking proof that the Bush administration remains dramatically out of step with the nation's priorities."

Taken together, Keroack's appointment, the Bolton push and the judicial renominations suggest that although Bush may work for consensus with Democrats on selected issues, he does not plan to avoid decisions simply because lawmakers will disagree, and he may in fact seek fights in some instances when he feels they may be useful politically.

Confirmation of Bolton and the judicial nominees are popular causes with Bush's conservative base, and a family-planning chief from an organization that opposes contraceptives may appeal to disaffected social conservatives.

White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino cautioned against reading a larger pattern into the recent moves, saying, "You have to look at these things in isolation."

She added: "The president has said we will look to reach common ground where we can find it. However, he's not going to compromise on his principles."

Family-planning Head Leads Anti-contraceptive Group (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has appointed a new chief of family-planning programs at the Department of Health and Human Services who helps lead a Christian pregnancy counseling organization that regards the distribution of contraceptives as "demeaning to women."

Dr. Eric Keroack, medical director for A Woman's Concern, a nonprofit group based in Dorchester, Mass., will become deputy assistant secretary for population affairs in the next two weeks, department spokeswoman Christina Pearson said Thursday.

Keroack could not be reached for comment.

John O. Agwunobi, assistant secretary for health, said Keroack was "highly qualified and a well-respected physician … working primarily with women and girls in crisis."

Still Waiting For Bipartisanship (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

The voters sent a clear message last week that they do not want the far right of the Republican Party calling the shots in Washington. But President Bush has ignored the message, resubmitting a group of archconservative, underqualified judicial nominees that Senate Democrats have already said are unacceptable. With the Democrats about to take control of the Senate, it is highly unlikely that these men will be confirmed. But the renominations suggest that when it comes to filling judgeships, Mr. Bush is still not looking for either excellence or common ground.

The four most controversial nominees that President Bush resubmitted are ideological in the extreme. William Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for mining and timber interests, would no doubt use his position on the San Francisco-based United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to gut environmental laws. William Haynes II, who helped develop the administration's torture and "enemy combatant" policies as the top lawyer for the Pentagon, could be counted on to undermine both civil liberties and reasonable limits on executive power.

Terrence Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina and a former aide to Senator Jesse Helms, has a long record of insensitivity to victims of race and disability discrimination. He would be able to pull the law in the wrong direction in these areas if he became an appeals court judge. Michael Wallace, a former lawyer for Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi, has a bad civil rights record, including arguing in favor of letting Bob Jones University, which discriminated on the basis of race, keep its tax-exempt status.

Beyond their ideology, these nominees embody values that the American people rejected in the midterm elections. The voters were angry about the influence of lobbyists and special interests. But Mr. Myers would bring that influence onto a powerful appeals court. The voters were upset about the incompetence this administration has shown on everything from Iraq to Hurricane Katrina. But Mr. Wallace is the very rare appeals court nominee to receive a unanimous “not qualified” rating from the American Bar Association.

A fifth appeals court nominee, Peter Keisler, is likely to face stiff opposition for well-founded procedural reasons. When President Clinton tried to fill this seat on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, Republican senators blocked him, saying the court needed only 10 judges. Since then, the court’s caseload has decreased. It is unlikely that Democratic senators will allow the Republicans to fill the seat now.

President Bush’s decision to resubmit these names could be a final sop to his far-right base. Perhaps, once this slate fails one more time, he will make more reasonable choices. Mr. Bush may have no other choice, if he wants to get any nominees confirmed in the next two years. Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, has said that “the days of hard-right judges” are over, and when Democrats take over in the Senate, he will be in a position to see that they are.

A Symbolic Step On Judges (WP)

GIVEN HIS PLEDGES of bipartisanship after this month's elections, President Bush's decision to resubmit a crop of his most controversial judicial nominations strikes a discordant note. Democrats have opposed most of these nominees for good reasons. Mr. Bush has next to no chance of getting them confirmed in the lame-duck session, still less of one when Democrats take over in January. Renominating them now, therefore, smacks of GOP chest-thumping and a gratuitous thumbing of the nose at bipartisanship. To be sure, Mr. Bush, like his predecessor, has a legitimate gripe about the manner in which the Senate has treated his judicial nominees, some of whom have had to wait unduly long periods without receiving the courtesy of a vote. Mr. Bush is clearly trying to emphasize that the Senate owes the presidency and its nominees timely and reasonable consideration. But insisting on nominations that the other side regards as unsuitable when they have no prospect of success is hardly the way to make this point.

The real test of Mr. Bush's commitment to a more bipartisan approach to nominations will come in January, when he confronts the new Congress and its Democratic-led Senate Judiciary Committee. At that point, he should decline to renominate four of the current group of nominees. Democrats have valid objections on the merits to William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, Terrence W. Boyle Jr. and Michael B. Wallace -- all nominees to federal appeals courts. Mr. Haynes, the Pentagon's general counsel, has been a key player in the military's policies on detentions and interrogations in the war on terrorism. Mr. Myers has a dreadful record of anti-environmental activism. Judge Boyle, who serves on the U.S. District Court in North Carolina, has a troubling history in civil rights cases. And the American Bar Association unanimously rated Mr. Wallace "unqualified" for service on the bench.

With these four nominees, Mr. Bush has a simple choice: He can subject them, and himself, to likely defeat by votes in the committee or on the Senate floor, or he can work to find nominees for these seats who satisfy his criteria and can win broad support on both sides of the aisle. Failure to do the latter will provoke needless confrontation even while perpetuating vacancies on the bench.

The harder question is what to do about Peter D. Keisler, Mr. Bush's highly qualified nominee to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. Mr. Keisler certainly warrants confirmation. Yet like a string of qualified nominees to the same court before him, he is caught up in a dispute over how many seats the court should have. It has 10 sitting judges; many people believe its two empty seats are unnecessary given its workload, and Republican senators blocked President Bill Clinton's nominees to the seats on that basis. More recently, Democrats have turned the tables. On the merits, the complaint may be right. But it has been grossly unfair to nominees of both parties to decide this policy dispute in the context of evaluating their confirmations. The number ought to be decided before Mr. Bush subjects Mr. Keisler or anyone else to a tempestuous fight having little to do with their qualifications.

Democrats Prepare To Raise Minimum Wage (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0095864

AP, November 17, 2006

It looks like full steam ahead for a significant boost to the federal minimum wage when Democrats assume control of Congress in January.

Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts said Thursday that increasing the federal minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 would be his top priority as chairman of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions.

On the House side, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., already has listed an increase in the minimum wage as one of the issues that would be taken up during the first 100 hours of the next Congress.

"Americans are working harder than ever, but millions of hardworking men and women across the country aren't getting their fair share," Kennedy said during a speech outlining his legislative agenda for next year. "We're not rewarding work fairly anymore, and working families are falling behind."

President Bush signaled readiness last week to consider some Democratic priorities such as a minimum-wage increase, overhauling immigration policy and finding compromise on renewing the No Child Left Behind education law.

Critics of boosting the minimum wage say it kills job creation as employers hire fewer entry-level workers to compensate for the higher wage expenses. Kennedy said the minimum wage has remained at $5.15 an hour for nearly 10 years.

Most states have their own minimum wages laws, with some states having rates the same as the federal minimum wage and some with rates higher than the federal minimum.

Kennedy noted that ballot initiatives establishing or raising the minimum wage in six states all passed in this month's election.

"If there is one message from this election that emerged loud and clear, it's that no one who works for a living should have to live in poverty," Kennedy said.

Kennedy also said he would seek to expand federal support for research on stem cells coming from embryos, which Congress approved last year, but Bush vetoed. The issue won't go away, he promised.

On education, Kennedy said he would seek to make college more affordable by increasing the size of Pell Grants from $4,050 to $5,100, and by cutting interest rates on student loans.

"It is more important than ever for our citizens to have a college education so they can compete in the global economy and have a fair chance at the American dream," he said.

On health care, Kennedy said the Senate's HELP committee would expand a health insurance program that now provides health coverage for about 4 million children. He also would look for ways to expand coverage to other populations too, he said, but he did not provide specifics, such as how to pay for that coverage.

Kennedy Sets Sights On Child Health Care (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The soon-to-be chairman of the Senate health panel said yesterday his ultimate goal is to have the government provide health care coverage for all Americans.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said he knows it will take awhile to gain support for the idea, so he will focus in the meantime on extending coverage to different groups, starting with covering more children under the existing Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP) -- something he thinks there is "a lot of sentiment for."

But Mr. Kennedy, who yesterday laid out his agenda for the Health Education Labor and Workforce Committee, said universal health care is the goal.

"We want to continue the progress in terms of coverage," he said. "We will have to take a longer period of time ... developing the support for that."

Mr. Kennedy argued that covering everyone is possible because his home state did it.

"We proved that people from all parts of the political spectrum can come together to provide health care for all," he said. "So this, too, is one of our top goals for the coming year."

Also, at the top of the "to-do" list provided by his staff is an initiative titled "Medicare for All," which would expand federal Medicare coverage to Americans younger than 65 years old. The expansion would be done in phases -- first to the 55- to 65-year-old age group and then to children younger than 20. The proposal is designed to be the starting point for discussions on universal coverage.

The rest of Mr. Kennedy's agenda for the committee includes increasing the minimum wage, allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower drug prices, expanding federal support for embryonic-stem-cell research, helping college students by increasing Pell Grants, capping college loan payments and cutting student-loan interest rates -- goals that

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, has said she, too, will tackle soon after she takes the reins as House speaker in January.

Mr. Kennedy's Medicare-for-all proposal is co-sponsored by Rep. John D. Dingell, Michigan Democrat, and would provide comprehensive coverage, including prescription drugs. According to a summary from Mr. Kennedy's office, initial estimates put the proposal in the neighborhood of $600 billion per year in terms of cost, but it would generate $380 billion a year in savings, and costs would be covered by payroll taxes and general revenues.

Mr. Kennedy and others say it's past time for such a change because skyrocketing health care costs burden society and business.

Democrats also will focus on improving CHIP, which covers 4 million low-income children and is administered by the states. Many states are facing steep funding shortfalls for the program, and incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said recently "the first thing we must do is address these shortfalls so these children do not lose their existing coverage, and work to improve this vitally successful program as we reauthorize it next year."

Ending Hunger (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

THE AGRICULTURE Department has taken what you might call the Scarlett O'Hara approach to Americans without enough to eat: It will never call them hungry again. Rumbling stomachs? Malnourishment? That's not hunger, the department says. It's experiencing "very low food security."

Maybe there's some scientific basis for this Orwellian recasting. The lead author of the annual report on Americans' access to food told The Post's Elizabeth Williamson that "hungry" is "not a scientifically accurate term for the specific phenomenon being measured." The bland phrase "food insecurity" has been used for years to describe households that have problems putting enough food on the table -- though until this year they were divided into two groups: "food insecurity without hunger" and, for those in the most desperate straits, "food insecurity with hunger." This latter group is being renamed "very low food security," meaning those in it show "multiple indications of disrupted eating patterns and reduced food intake." In other words, they're hungry.

Whatever the intention, this linguistic airbrushing diminishes the shame of the problem, its persistence and its scope. That 11 million Americans reported going hun -- sorry, reported disrupted eating patterns -- is a national embarrassment. In this group, 96 percent said they cut the size of meals or skipped meals because they didn't have enough money. The same percentage said their food did not last and they did not have enough money to get more.

At least the USDA doesn't have jurisdiction over national monuments. Otherwise, just imagine it going after the inscription on the Statue of Liberty next: "Give me your energy-deficient, your financially challenged, your space-impaired masses yearning to breathe free."

Pelosi Makes History As Female Speaker (AP-Y)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, November 17, 2006

Democrats embraced Rep. Nancy Pelosi as the first woman House speaker in history on Thursday, then quickly snubbed her, selecting Steny Hoyer of Maryland as majority leader against her wishes.

"Let the healing begin," Pelosi, D-Calif., said after Hoyer had eased past her preferred candidate, Rep. John Murtha, a prominent opponent of the war in Iraq. The secret-ballot vote for Hoyer was 149-86. She was chosen by acclamation.

Added Hoyer, a 25-year veteran of Congress: "The Republicans need to know, the president needs to know and the country needs to know our caucus is unified today."

Hoyer, Murtha and several other Democrats predicted there would be no lingering effects from the bruising leadership campaign as the party looks ahead to taking control of the House in January after a dozen years in the minority.

Not everyone sounded convinced, though. "It created these tensions that we now have to work on," said Rep. Jose Serrano of New York, a Hoyer supporter.

Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va., who backed Murtha, said some members of the rank-and-file had told both rival camps to count them as supporters. "We know who they are," he said, although he later added that many of them were lawmakers whose victories on Nov. 7 gave Democrats their majority.

"If they're freshmen, they get a pass on this one," he said.

Democrats chose their leaders for the next two years as lawmakers in both houses labored to wrap up work for the expiring 109th Congress and look ahead to the 110th, which convenes on Jan. 4.

House Republicans hold elections on Friday, with a two-way race for minority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0095866

Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the current majority leader, faces a challenge from Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana. A third contender, Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, dropped out of the race and endorsed Boehner.

Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, the incumbent GOP whip, also drew an opponent, Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona.

Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has decided to step down from leadership in the wake of his party's election defeat.

Pelosi, 66, faced neither challenger nor controversy in her own race to become the Democrats' choice for speaker — and the first woman in history — after four years as party leader.

Her ascension awaits a vote by the full House on Jan. 4, the opening day of the new Congress.

"We made history and now we will make progress for the American people," the Californian told fellow Democrats moments after her selection in the closed meeting, according to officials familiar with her remarks.

She pledged that after 12 years in the minority, "we will not be dazzled by money and special interests."

A veteran of nearly two decades in Congress, Pelosi raised more than $50 million for the party's candidates and committees over the past two years. In her time as minority leader, she was credited with molding an often-fractious rank-and-file into a unified force opposing the conservative agenda advanced by President Bush and congressional Republicans.

The race between Hoyer and Murtha was tinged with the residue of a leadership election five years ago. Pelosi defeated Hoyer then to become the party's whip, with Murtha as her campaign manager.

Hoyer, 67, was the front-runner from the start in the current race for majority leader after having served as second-ranking in the leadership for four years. Like Pelosi, he campaigned widely and raised millions for fellow Democrats in the run-up to the congressional elections.

On Sunday Pelosi stepped forcefully into the race — out of loyalty to Murtha, her allies said. She issued a letter of support for him, praising him for having called a year ago for an end to the U.S. military presence in Iraq.

"I salute your courageous leadership that changed the national debate and helped make Iraq the central issue of this historic election," she wrote.

Four days later, behind closed doors, she lauded Murtha for having altered the course of the campaign debate on the war and said it was in part responsible for the Democrats' electoral victories. She urged fellow Democrats to elect him majority leader to help her change the course of the war.

Hoyer countered with nominating speeches from three lawmakers from Pelosi's state of California, Reps. Henry Waxman, Lucille Roybal-Allard and Dennis Cardoza.

Cardoza, who earlier had made a nominating speech for Pelosi, then urged fellow Democrats to pick Hoyer despite her wishes to the contrary. He said the two had been a team and would continue to be a team, and he added, "Have the courage to do what you know is right."

Murtha is a former Marine, widely respected for his knowledge of defense issues and now in line to become chairman of the subcommittee with control over the Pentagon budget. His bid for the leadership led critics to recall the Abscam bribery scandal of 1980, an FBI sting operation that sent some lawmakers to jail. Murtha was never charged in the case, despite a videotape that showed him being offered $50,000. "I'm not interested ... at this point," he said.

On Thursday, Rep. Jerrold Nadler of New York said Hoyer's victory was due in part to gratitude lawmakers felt at his campaign efforts. "Along with Nancy and Rahm, Steny deserves a lot of credit for getting us here." Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois served as chairman of the party's House campaign committee and was rewarded Thursday with the caucus chair post, the No. 4 position.

The Democrats also selected James Clyburn of South Carolina as majority whip, their No. 3 post. He is the second black lawmaker in history to reach as high as a party whip. William Gray of Pennsylvania held the same title 1989-91.

Other Democrats evaluated Pelosi's decision to take sides.

"She's a very smart woman who made an error in judgment," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin added, "She's gutsy as hell and she's willing to take a chance."

Democrats Pick Hoyer Over Murtha (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

House Democrats elected Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.) the new majority leader yesterday over strong opposition from Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), exposing a deep political divide even before the party takes control.

The 149 to 86 vote for Hoyer over Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) was viewed by many in the party as a repudiation of Pelosi's strong-arm tactics and a recognition of Hoyer's tireless work to elect a Democratic majority for the first time in 12 years. If the Hoyer camp's head count was correct going into yesterday's secret balloting, Pelosi and her allies may not have swayed a single vote for Murtha, a close associate.

Pelosi, 66, was formally chosen by the Democratic caucus as the first female House speaker in history. In a show of unity after the closed-door meeting in a House office building, she and Hoyer smiled and embraced. But the two longtime rivals must now try to pick up the pieces after a bitter intraparty fight and prepare for a new Congress in January, when the Democrats must be ready to pass a new domestic agenda and challenge President Bush on the Iraq war and foreign policy.

A buoyant Hoyer vowed to work closely with Pelosi and Murtha to force Bush to change his Iraq policy and begin withdrawing troops. Pelosi had strongly backed Murtha, 74, for majority leader largely because of his early call for a troop withdrawal, which she said helped galvanize the party and win the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

The Murtha camp accused Hoyer, 67, a moderate, of a "stay the course" mentality on Iraq. Hoyer said that charge did not accurately reflect his call for a phased redeployment of U.S. troops. Yesterday, Hoyer pledged to work for the adoption of a new agenda that "is going to reach across to the president of the United States and say, 'Mr. President, we need to make a transition in Iraq; it is not working; we need to change the policy, not stay the course.' "

Both Hoyer and Murtha claimed to have a majority of votes going into yesterday's showdown, but even Pelosi had to concede that Hoyer's final margin was "a stunning victory."

Pelosi had made it clear for months that she favored Murtha over Hoyer. But on Sunday, she shocked even her staff by directly intervening in the contest by issuing a letter throwing her support to Murtha, a former Marine and the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense.

Pelosi's aggressive, last-minute campaign for Murtha in the face of overwhelming support for Hoyer left many Democrats worried that she has become too reliant on a tight inner circle, too reluctant to listen to the broader Democratic caucus and mistakenly convinced that she can dictate the direction the caucus must take.

"Basically, she got spanked," said a House Democrat close to both Pelosi and Hoyer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of repercussions. "She got taken to the woodshed. If she doesn't get it, this is going to be a big problem over the long run."

"Maybe it will help Nancy understand the use of power, the time and place for it," said a senior Democrat with close ties to Capitol Hill.

But others think the dust-up may have been useful in clearing the air between Pelosi and Hoyer. "Here's the deal -- she's apparently been irritated by a perception that Steny has been undermining her, and it's an incorrect perception," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.). "Look, someone told me she hasn't liked him since 1963, and it has had zero effect on how well they have worked together. We don't have to guess at this. We have seen it. They can and will work well together as we move forward."

After the party elections yesterday, Pelosi and Hoyer emerged from the caucus room beaming and grabbed each other's hands. Behind them was a grim-looking Murtha, with his hands in his pockets and his eyes cast down.

"We've had our debates. We've had our disagreements in that room, and now that is over. As I said to my colleagues . . . let there be peace on Earth, and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin," Pelosi said.

Later, Hoyer held private conversations with Murtha and Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a Pelosi confidant who led the charge for Murtha's election. All the players pledged to unify behind the new Democratic team, which will include House Majority Whip-elect James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and House Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman John B. Larson (D-Conn.).

"We may have . . . differences from time to time," Hoyer said. "But the Republicans need to know, the president needs to know and the country needs to know our caucus is unified today."

But the top of the ticket has considerable mending to do. Pelosi expressed no regrets for her efforts on Murtha's behalf. On the contrary, she stood by her choice for majority leader, despite the avalanche of negative reactions that raised questions about Murtha's ethics and commitment to changing the role of lobbying and money in the House.

"I stand very, very proudly behind my endorsement of Mr. Murtha," she told reporters after the vote.

Emanuel said the Democratic caucus will come together as members sit down to flesh out their legislative agenda. The outlines of that agenda were put together this year through painstaking consultation with the liberal, moderate and conservative wings of the party. That process will continue to unify Democrats as the details are worked out, Emanuel said.

But yesterday, Murtha's supporters were still smarting. Miller, who angered many Democrats with his aggressive tactics on Murtha's behalf, blamed "Swift-boating" for Murtha's defeat and the resurgence of stories questioning Murtha's ethics. He said Democrats missed an opportunity to elevate a stronger, unimpeachable voice on Iraq -- the issue that brought them to power.

Hoyer, like Murtha, has signed Democratic letters calling for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq. But last year, just after both Murtha and Pelosi said U.S. troops should be withdrawn in six months, Hoyer suggested that "a precipitous withdrawal of American forces in Iraq could lead to disaster."

Murtha allies conceded that he managed to undermine his own campaign, particularly when he told a gathering of conservative Democrats on Tuesday night that Pelosi's ethics package was "total crap."

The "Blue Dog" Democrats at that gathering said Murtha also made a critical mistake that night when he put himself forward as Pelosi's loyal lieutenant, ready to do whatever she asked of him even if he personally disagreed. Many of them had been savaged in their campaigns by Republicans who predicted that they would be rubber stamps for Pelosi, a "San Francisco liberal," and they had vowed to be independent voices in conservative-leaning districts.

Ultimately, it was Hoyer who secured his own victory, by working in the trenches for years to raise money for Democratic candidates, recruit reluctant combatants and offer advice to those just wading into the political arena.

"He had been doing the tough work," said Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.). "It's just mind-numbing -- all those fundraisers, the travel, sleeping in hotel rooms. It needs to be rewarded."

In contrast to Murtha, with his gruff demeanor and straight talk, Hoyer is a well-practiced politician with a breadth of policy knowledge who plays to the news media. Yesterday, after Pelosi gave reporters a cursory statement of support for D.C. voting rights, Hoyer jumped in with a more voluble response.

"We who live in the Washington metropolitan area believe that the country ought to take it as a moral cause to ensure the fact that every citizen of the District of Columbia has a vote in the Congress of the United States," Hoyer said. "It is the only capital in the free world that I know of whose citizens are disenfranchised."

Pelosi's Early Setback Has Her Party On Alert (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) was elevated to the pinnacle of congressional power Thursday as fellow Democrats formally made her their choice as the next House speaker. But the same colleagues gave Pelosi a brusque lesson in the limits of her power when they rejected her choice for second in command.

In a battle that many felt Pelosi made unnecessarily bitter, House Democrats turned aside her personal pleas and arm-twisting and elected a Pelosi rival, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), to be House majority leader over Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.).

Hoyer didn't merely defeat Murtha, Pelosi's strong preference, but trounced him in a 149-86 vote as House Democrats met to choose leaders in the wake of a midterm election that gave their party control of the House and Senate for the first time since 1994.

Democrats selected her as their choice for speaker, but she will not assume the post until the new Congress convenes in January and takes a formal vote.

Pelosi's failed effort to anoint her own chief lieutenant fueled doubts among critics about the political skills she brings to leading her fractious party. It also sent a clear signal of what kind of leader she is: an old-style politician who puts a premium on personal loyalty, even at the risk of high-profile defeat.

Still buoyed by their election day victories, some Democrats were left wondering why Pelosi had injected herself into a bitter leadership battle with her last-minute support of Murtha over Hoyer, who had long been on track to claim the No. 2 job.

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) said a lot of members are wondering, "How did someone as good and as smart as she make this one mistake?"

Though Frank said he thought the episode would blow over, others saw it as a blunder that called for some serious fence-mending.

"The caucus is fractured in a way because of her involvement" in the leadership race, said Rep. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.). "Her big challenge, starting from this moment, is to figure out how to wrap her arms around the caucus. It was a mistake for her to get involved."

A big factor in Murtha's loss was the concern about ethics problems in his past and his reputation as a backroom dealer who is cozy with lobbyists — a profile that critics said would undercut the anti-corruption message that Pelosi broadcast in the midterm campaign.

Some fear that Pelosi's handling of the situation is a warning sign that her reliance on a close-knit circle of advisors sometimes blinds her to potential problems, such as the backlash against Murtha for his perceived ethics problems. Murtha was named an unindicted co-conspirator in the 1980 Abscam bribery scandal.

"It raises questions about her judgment," said Thomas Mann, a Brookings Institution expert on Congress. "She did a good job helping Democrats back into the majority, then takes a stand that seems to weaken those very members who got elected by campaigning against corruption."

Another challenge faces Pelosi in the coming weeks, when she is to choose a new intelligence committee chair. Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.) is in line, but some Democrats fear that he, like Murtha, will come under fire for past ethics lapses. Hastings was impeached as a federal judge in the 1980s.

People close to Pelosi say there is a one-word explanation for why she took the unusual step of weighing in on Murtha's behalf: loyalty.

The daughter of a Baltimore mayor who practiced old-school machine politics, Pelosi is a strong believer in rewarding those who are loyal to her, through thick and thin. Five years ago, for example, she stood by then-Rep. Gary Condit (D-Ceres) when he was fighting for reelection amid allegations that he had had an affair with an intern who had mysteriously disappeared and was eventually found slain.

Though other Democratic leaders endorsed Condit's primary opponent, Pelosi endorsed Condit, who had backed her in a hard-fought 2001 campaign against Hoyer to become minority whip.

That bitter leadership battle was also the root of the tensions between Pelosi and Hoyer — and of her lasting alliance with Murtha, who managed her campaign for whip and helped her, a liberal, overcome the suspicions of more conservative Democrats.

When Murtha announced this year that he would challenge Hoyer for majority leader if Democrats won control of the House, Pelosi did not stop him.

Last November, Pelosi followed Murtha's lead after the longtime hawk dropped his support for the war in Iraq and called for a U.S. withdrawal, a position that put both of them at odds with Hoyer. Pelosi believed Murtha's leadership on Iraq helped change the national debate and contributed mightily to the Democrats' victory on election day.

As Murtha campaigned for the majority leader post, hardly anyone doubted that Pelosi would back him. But it was not clear how far she would go with her support, or how publicly. Hoyer had been gathering chits for years. When Murtha's vote count last week showed him far behind, he asked Pelosi to go public with her support, according to an aide close to the Murtha campaign.

Pelosi wrote a letter of support last weekend while she was in New York with her daughter, who was about to have a baby. Hoyer supporters were hoping the letter would just be a proforma endorsement for an old friend, but it turned out to be the beginning of much more.

Pelosi provided a powerful voice for Murtha in a group that was crucial to the outcome of the election: the 40-odd newly elected Democratic freshmen.

Hoyer was thought to have a leg up with that group, because he had been active in recruiting many as candidates. But Pelosi had another claim on their loyalty, as she had campaigned for many of them.

When those new members came to her to discuss their committee assignments, over which she will have control, she made a point of telling them she wanted Murtha to be majority leader. Some interpreted that as a threat of second-rate assignments if they voted for Hoyer. Pelosi aides said no threats were intended.

Pelosi understood that it was risky to stick her neck out, aides said: Win or lose, she would probably leave Hoyer and his allies embittered.

"She always says, 'I'm a risk taker. I'm loyal to my friends, and I stick with them in difficult times,' " said a Pelosi aide, who, like other staff members, asked to remain unnamed in order to discuss the internal workings of the Democratic caucus.

The incoming House speaker apparently did not anticipate that Murtha's past ethics problems would become an issue, assuming that it was ancient history.

But the past was resurrected by Murtha's critics, and cable networks began to play decades-old Abscam videotapes that showed Murtha rejecting a bribe in a way that seemed less than definite.

Pelosi said after the vote that she had no regrets.

"I stand very, very proudly behind my endorsement of Mr. Murtha," she said. "As I said in my letter to members on Sunday, I believe the biggest ethical challenge facing our country is the war in Iraq."

Some Democrats said that the setback could send a message to Pelosi that rank-and-file members want her to reach beyond her inner circle and not try to run the party with top-down leadership.

"Loyalty can be blinding," said a former House Democratic leader who did not want to be named for fear of offending Pelosi. "You can't force somebody on people if they don't want them."

Others said the episode showed a side of Pelosi's leadership that might be welcome when it came to battling the Bush administration.

"She's gutsy as hell, and she's willing to take chances," said Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.). "She will push the envelope."

Party Gets A Rocky Start (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON— The Democrats put on their best faces after Thursday's testy leadership fight.

"As we say in church, let there be peace on Earth, and let it begin with us," Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi said after her choice for the No. 2 job in the House was soundly defeated. "Let the healing begin."

But several admitted that the episode — which saw Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland defeat Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania for House majority leader — was a poor way to kick off their tenure as the party in control of the new Congress.

"These aren't the headlines we wanted to generate," said a Democratic lawmaker who spoke on condition that he not be named for fear of retribution from the leadership.

Pelosi's backing of Murtha rankled many of her colleagues. It also ensured that as the party takes control of the House in January for the first time in 12 years, all eyes will be on any sign of friction between her and Hoyer.

Their ability to work together is critical. As second in command to the speaker, the majority leader "keeps the legislative trains running on time and the workers toiling at their posts," as former Speaker Newt Gingrich put it.

The speaker — second in line to the presidency — is responsible for the workings of the entire chamber and plays the lead role in shaping the ruling party's legislative agenda and political strategy.

Pelosi was unchallenged for the job.

Also elected to the leadership team Thursday was Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), a former head of the Congressional Black Caucus, who will become majority whip.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), architect of the House Democratic election victory, will chair the Democratic caucus.

Hoyer, 67, whose first name was his parents' adaptation of the Danish name Steen, won his House seat in a special election in 1981. He worked his way up the Democratic leadership ranks, but lost the whip job in 2001 to Pelosi. Many Democrats believe Hoyer's decision to wage that race was the genesis of her opposition to him now.

Hoyer became minority whip in 2002, after Pelosi succeeded Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri as minority leader; the two have held those posts since then.

In Thursday's contest, Hoyer enjoyed the backing of a diverse group, from liberals to members of the Blue Dogs, a coalition of moderate and conservative Democrats.

Several Democrats said they voted for Hoyer because he already held the No. 2 job among them.

"I saw it as Steny's turn," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.).

House Republicans choose their leaders today. The key race pits Reps. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the current majority leader, against Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leader of House conservatives, for minority leader.

At least one Republican couldn't resist weighing in on the Democrats' selections.

"Hoyer winning is a slap in Pelosi's face — and I must confess, it makes me smile," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.).

House Democrats Choose Hoyer As Majority Leader (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - In an early check on the power of incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, her own Democratic caucus on Thursday rejected the anti-war leader she wanted as her top deputy and instead chose a Maryland moderate considered less polarizing.

Rep. Steny Hoyer defeated Rep. Jack Murtha of Pennsylvania in a lopsided 149-86 secret-ballot vote to become House majority leader. It was a show of loyalty to Hoyer, who's spent years recruiting Democratic candidates and building bridges across the ideological spectrum. Hoyer also has worked cooperatively with Pelosi as her second-in-command since he lost a leadership challenge to her five years ago, something she's never forgotten.

Thursday's vote also reflected a widespread concern among House Democrats that Murtha's ethical baggage and reputation for bullying outweighed his claim to a reward for helping Democrats win back Congress this year through his outspoken advocacy of withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq. Murtha, a Pennsylvania steel-country conservative and ex-Marine, is a longtime Pelosi loyalist, but that wasn't enough.

In the end, most political analysts said, the dust-up came early enough in Pelosi's leadership that she can afford to lose the battle, mend fences and secure her position.

But one moderate Democratic congressman, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of retribution, said Pelosi's backing of Murtha made her look petty and shook some members' faith in her leadership.

"She owes Murtha a lot; she owes the caucus more," he said. "A good leader knows when she has to tell a member no, even when it's your friend.

"She'll either get it and lead differently," the congressman said, "or she won't lead long."

Speaking after the vote, Pelosi, Hoyer and Murtha all pledged to drop their rivalries and unite to pass legislation and pressure President Bush to change course in Iraq.

Pelosi, smiling tensely, insisted that she had no regrets about intervening on Murtha's behalf. "I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq," she said.

She called Hoyer's victory "stunning" and said, "we've had our debates, we've had our disagreements in that room, and now that is over. . . let the healing begin."

Hoyer congratulated Pelosi on her pending January election as the first female Speaker of the House of Representatives. He called her "a person of deep values, keen intellect and extraordinary political ability." As for Murtha, Hoyer said: "In my opinion, it was not that somebody was rejected today. It was that a team that had been successful was asked to continue to do that job on behalf of the American people."

Murtha, fighting a grimace, congratulated Hoyer and said he'll return to the House subcommittee on defense appropriations, where he'll become chairman.

Pelosi has pledged to wipe out corruption and curb special-interest spending after a string of Republican scandals. But Murtha is a master of pork-barrel spending who was caught on video in the 1980 Abscam corruption probe rejecting a bribe but suggesting that he might consider a future deal if there was a benefit to his district.

"I don't know how we move forward on ethical reform in Congress, which is desperately needed, when you've got this cloud hanging over Jack," said Rep.-elect Baron Hill, D-Ind., before the secret-ballot voting.

Paul Herrnson, the director of the Center for American Politics and Citizenship at the University of Maryland, said that Pelosi would've faced criticism if she'd abandoned her longtime ally.

"Politicians take loyalty very seriously, and if she had not displayed it, people would have seen that as a sign as well," he said. "Now that it's done I think (Pelosi and Hoyer) will find a way to work together. If they don't, there will be hell to pay. The congressional Democrats will have a very hard time."

Pelosi Rebuffed Over Her Choice For House Post (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — House Democrats chose Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland as their new majority leader on Thursday, rejecting the choice of the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, and straining the unity of the new majority party.

In an indication that rank-and-file members would be willing to break from Ms. Pelosi, Democrats chose Mr. Hoyer over Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania by a decisive vote of 149 to 86. Mr. Hoyer overcame a concerted push by Ms. Pelosi on behalf of Mr. Murtha, a combat veteran who became an influential spokesman against the Iraq war.

Despite the internal acrimony that has clouded the Democratic victory celebration of last week, the leadership team that will take control of the House in January left their closed meeting in the Cannon House Office Building, joined hands and pledged to work together in the months ahead.

“Let the healing begin,” said Ms. Pelosi, whom Democrats chose unanimously to be their candidate for speaker and who would be the first woman to hold that office. The speaker is elected by the full House.

Crediting Mr. Murtha with changing the political dynamic on the war, Ms. Pelosi sought to oust Mr. Hoyer from his position as the No. 2 Democrat. Mr. Hoyer lost a 2001 leadership battle to Ms. Pelosi. Mr. Murtha managed that 2001 fight on Ms. Pelosi’s behalf, and in backing him for majority leader, Ms. Pelosi signaled that she put a premium on loyalty.

But Democrat after Democrat said the outcome of the leadership fight was a reflection that a clear majority of the party believed that Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer had been a winning combination, despite the strains between them, and that there was no reason to make an abrupt change. In the view of many Democrats, Ms. Pelosi’s liberal reputation is offset by Mr. Hoyer’s moderate image, and she is freed to concentrate on the party’s broader message because of his floor management and vote-counting abilities, which were sharply illustrated by his victory on Thursday. [Man in the News, Page A26.]

“It is a great leadership team,” Representative Henry A. Waxman of California said in nominating Mr. Hoyer, according to notes taken by aides. “Let’s keep it in place.”

Ms. Pelosi's push on behalf of Mr. Murtha was cheered by some liberal Democratic activists who saw it is a recognition of the war's importance in the past election. In that sense, her support of him, even if unsuccessful, could be seen as an effort on Ms. Pelosi's part to acknowledge the political clout of her party's antiwar wing.

Other Democrats portrayed her decision to inject herself into the race as a miscalculation that elevated the battle into an unnecessary early test of her power and ended up giving more influence to Mr. Hoyer. But they said they did not expect hard feelings to linger.

"She is a very smart woman who made a mistake in judgment," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts and the likely chairman of the Financial Services Committee. "I honestly don't believe you are going to see any problems."

Not everyone was willing to put aside the fight so quickly. Some supporters of Mr. Murtha, a longtime member of the Appropriations Committee whose candidacy was dogged by questions about his ethics record, were disgruntled and said they were trying to identify lawmakers who had broken pledges to support him.

"We won't trust them on issues like this the next time," said Representative James P. Moran, a Murtha ally from Virginia who said Mr. Murtha had been betrayed.

Mr. Hoyer, on the other hand, appeared to hold all the pledges he had from members, which is not always the case in volatile secret-ballot leadership elections, and he promised to work in concert with Ms. Pelosi.

"In my opinion, it was not that somebody was rejected today," he said after the vote. "It was that a team that had been successful was asked to continue to do that job on behalf of the American people."

The House majority leader typically sets the floor schedule and decides what legislation will be brought up for a vote while also overseeing the party's strategy in advancing its agenda. The speaker is the party's top figure in the House, but that position also carries a broader role as a constitutional officer charged with representing the interests of the full chamber.

Some Democrats said that the distracting turmoil and an uneven performance by Mr. Murtha in recent days had cemented support for Mr. Hoyer. They said many lawmakers had concluded that the best chance of limiting any bitterness was to install Mr. Hoyer and, in effect, save Ms. Pelosi from what they characterized as a flawed decision.

In addition to the top two leaders, Democrats selected Representative James E. Clyburn of South Carolina as the majority whip and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who directed the party's campaign operation, as chairman of the party caucus. A potentially wrenching fight between those two was averted when Mr. Emanuel took the chairman's post with the expectation that he would be given greater responsibilities in that role.

Until last June, Mr. Hoyer seemed to be on an easy path to majority leader if Democrats won control of the House. But Mr. Murtha, a longtime behind-the-scenes power, surprised his colleagues by announcing that he would seek the post as well. In seeking support, he emphasized his opposition to the war in Iraq and his military credentials.

Mr. Hoyer, a liberal to moderate lawmaker with close ties to the business community and a history of strong support for the federal installations in suburban Washington, had political credentials of his own. Since joining the leadership in 2002, he had been devoted to recapturing the majority, tirelessly raising money and traveling to assist fledgling Democratic candidates who were appreciative of any attention from Washington.

Mr. Murtha was also hampered by ethical questions that date back to the 1980 Abscam scandal. And he has resisted new ethics rules even though Democrats hammered Republicans on corruption in the midterms.

Mr. Murtha was visibly disappointed after the vote and said he intended to "go back to my small subcommittee that I have on appropriations," eliciting laughter since the panel handles billions of dollars in military spending.

And he once again pointed to his outspokenness on Iraq, saying, "Nancy asked me to set a policy for the Democratic Party, most of the Democrats signed on to it, and I think the Bush administration is beginning to get the word."

Allies of Ms. Pelosi said she had been drawn into the fight at Mr. Murtha's request and probably started her public campaign on his behalf too late. She began her effort with a letter on Sunday, with many members already committed to Mr. Hoyer and reluctant to reverse course. Ms. Pelosi's allies rejected the contention that she had been seriously weakened by the loss even before she took over the House.

"It does not diminish her as leader," said Representative Jan Schakowsky, Democrat of Illinois. "A vote for Steny Hoyer is not a vote against Nancy Pelosi."

Others agreed. "I thought what she did was pretty gutsy," said Representative James P. McGovern, Democrat of Massachusetts. "I think a lot of people in the room respect what she did."

Mr. Emanuel and others said the vote was also a vivid display of the independence of Democrats, which he contrasted with the tight control the Republican leadership has exerted over its membership for much of the past six years. "This is the strength of diversity and people speaking their minds," he said.

Ms. Pelosi's party problems are not all behind her, as she faces a tough decision on selecting a chairman of the Intelligence Committee.

On the one hand, she is under pressure from black lawmakers to promote a committee veteran, Alcee L. Hastings of Florida, a federal judge who was removed from the bench by Congress after a bribery charge in 1989, though he was acquitted in a criminal case.

At the same time, some more conservative Democrats who supported Mr. Hoyer have been stepping up their campaign for Representative Jane Harman of California, who is the senior Democrat on the panel but has clashed with Ms. Pelosi.

Crowning Majority Leader, Democrats Are All Smiles And Bile (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

At 10:30 yesterday morning, Nancy Pelosi was chosen by acclamation to become speaker of the House. Ninety minutes later, she experienced her first smackdown.

Pelosi had only herself to blame for this briefest of honeymoons. Just five days after the Democrats' election victory, she shattered party unity Sunday by urging House Democrats to reject her longtime deputy, Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), in favor of antiwar firebrand Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Abscam), who proceeded to brand House ethics reforms "total crap."

Yesterday, rank-and-file Democrats told Pelosi her endorsement was total crap: They overwhelmingly chose Hoyer to be majority leader.

"We've had our debates. We've had our disagreements in that room," Pelosi acknowledged as she left the Cannon caucus room to face more than 200 reporters and cameras. "And now," she added hopefully, "that is over. . . . Let there be peace on Earth, and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin."

But over Pelosi's shoulder stood the hulking Murtha, hands in pockets, his face in a perma-frown. He offered perfunctory applause for his colleagues. When they joined hands overhead in the unity photo op, he turned and lumbered away.

One of his chief supporters, James Moran (Va.), stayed behind to give voice to Murtha's frustrations. "There are a number of members who can't be trusted," Moran said of Murtha's 149 to 86 defeat, minutes after a Murtha aide claimed he had the votes to win. Moran threatened that Murtha foes "will be damaged by this."

But how, if it was a secret ballot? "Oh, we have a pretty good idea," Moran said.

Nearby, Hoyer supporter Maxine Waters (Calif.) was holding forth on the impact of Pelosi's letter Sunday endorsing Murtha. "People just said 'I wonder why' and kept on moving and voted for Mr. Hoyer." It's true: Hoyer wound up with about as many votes as he forecast before Pelosi's endorsement of Murtha.

Walking through the tunnel back to the Capitol, Hoyer savored the lopsided vote that made him majority leader. "We were pretty close to being on the nose," the majority leader said, already shifting to the first-person plural.

For Pelosi, who led Democrats back to a majority in the House after 12 years, yesterday should have been a coronation for the first woman to be speaker. Instead, her party had plunged into fratricide, and cable news was running nonstop clips of Murtha talking with FBI agents posing as sheiks in the Abscam sting.

Was this a great moment for Democrats, or "total crap"? "The latter," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider had to admit as she surveyed the melee outside the caucus room.

Before the vote, dueling staffers, wearing buttons proclaiming "Majority Leader Steny Hoyer" or "Jack," kept tabs on attendance. Capitol police struggled to keep a path clear through the media throng. Aides came out to calibrate expectations.

"We've got the votes, and we are going to win it," announced Andrew Koneschusky, a press guy Murtha borrowed for the occasion. Protesting that some outlets had reported that Murtha had conceded, he said, "Any reports of concession are false." Would he say the reports are total you-know-what?

"These rumors are total crap," Koneschusky affirmed.

Outside, a tornado watch was in effect, and reporters were plotting ways to work the cheap metaphor into their stories. Pelosi aides, seeking to reduce the vortex, decided to put out more flags. There were already seven outside the caucus room, but staffers brought in two more and arranged a star-spangled gantlet for the leaders.

Pelosi and Hoyer emerged together and clasped hands in an exaggerated show of camaraderie. Behind them, Murtha wore a miserable expression, even when Pelosi hailed his "magnificent contribution." She continued: "I was proud to support him for majority leader, because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq." Now it was Hoyer's turn for discomfort; he listened slightly agape.

The gracious Hoyer spoke fondly of Pelosi and the "good team" they make; they indulged in another showy handshake, albeit with minimal eye contact. Murtha, granted a turn at the microphone, offered a pithy postmortem: "I didn't have enough votes." Frowning, he returned to his place in the back and stuffed his hands back in his pockets.

The awkwardness continued. Pelosi described Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the incoming caucus chairman, as "coldblooded." Emanuel promised the "strongest ethical package," prompting Murtha to stare at his shoes. At another point, Pelosi appeared to undermine her rank and file, noting that she had promised to "do everything possible" to end the Iraq war. "The caucus thought differently," she added.

The first questioner, Fox News's Major Garrett, took the opportunity to remind Pelosi that "nearly 60 percent of House Democrats defied your call to vote for John Murtha" and asked: "In retrospect, what does that say about the wisdom of that endorsement and your clout within the Democratic Party?"

Actually, Garrett understated the rejection -- 63 percent of Democrats defied her. "I stand very, very proudly behind my endorsement of Mr. Murtha," she maintained, even if the caucus "thought otherwise."

"Any regrets?" Garrett pressed. "No," Pelosi answered. "I'm not a person that has regrets."

Hoyer's Selection To Lead Majority Will Test Pelosi (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer emerged as the new House Majority Leader but not before a Democratic fight that showed the political dangers of Rep. Nancy Pelosi's risk-taking leadership style as the incoming speaker.

Defying the odds, the California Democrat interceded personally on behalf of Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, Mr. Hoyer's challenger, who had helped galvanize public support for his party in the midterm elections by speaking out against the Iraq war.

Mr. Hoyer was always the safer choice for the caucus as the current No. 2 in the Democratic leadership. But the size of his 149-86 victory yesterday is a blow to Mrs. Pelosi, who must redouble her efforts to prepare the party to take over House control in January.

As speaker, Mrs. Pelosi will have enormous influence over the assignment of members to committees, what amendments are permitted and the timing of when bills are called to the floor. But as majority leader, Mr. Hoyer will be the party's public face and floor manager, and the two leaders must overcome their personal differences to succeed with the Democratic agenda after 12 years of Republican control. "We've got to put things together," said Michigan Rep. John Dingell, the House's senior Democrat.

"I think the caucus is fractured because of this majority-leader race and her involvement in the race," said Rep. Allen Boyd (D., Fla.), a Hoyer supporter. "And I believe her biggest challenge from this moment on is to figure out how to wrap her arms around all of the caucus, bring them in, make sure they feel included."

Mrs. Pelosi expressed no regrets for taking such an active role on behalf of Mr. Murtha. After Hoyer supporters had spent days questioning Mr. Murtha's ethics, she said pointedly that the "biggest ethical challenge facing our country is the war in Iraq...It must be stopped. And I thought that Mr. Murtha's elevation to a leadership position would serve that purpose."

The episode reflects the risk-taking approach of a politician who isn't only the first woman to rise so high in the House, but who joined the leadership only five years ago. By siding with Mr. Murtha, who is a veteran backroom deal maker but also outside the leadership, Mrs. Pelosi went against the natural inertia of her caucus.

"Incumbents don't like challengers to incumbents...Steny was the incumbent," said Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.).

Yesterday's caucus vote followed a pattern this week in Congress as both parties embraced familiar faces after an election in which voters called for change. In the Senate, Sen. Trent Lott (R., Miss.) returned to the No. 2 spot in the Republican leadership. Even after losing control, House Republicans are expected to re-elect Rep. John Boehner (R., Ohio) as their leader this morning.

"In January at her swearing in, what happened today will be a distant memory," predicted Rep. Ed Markey (D. Mass.). "Look up the word 'resilient' in the dictionary and her picture is next to it."

But Mrs. Pelosi is dogged by criticism that she is too sensitive to dissent, and at one level, the Murtha candidacy was seen as a power play to oust an old rival, Mr. Hoyer, and replace him with a strong ally and friend. Hoyer allies complained that Mrs. Pelosi was pressing freshmen to side with Mr. Murtha if they wanted to get good committee assignments.

Since the ballots were secret, Mr. Frank, a Pelosi ally who backed Mr. Hoyer, dismissed such suggestions as more a "videogame" than anything real. But he said Mrs. Pelosi's involvement was clearly "an exception" and an error for her as a leader. "The general sense is, how did someone as smart as she make this one mistake?" he said.

Mr. Hoyer was gracious in victory. He and Mrs. Pelosi embraced after the meeting, and she later attended his victory party. "The Republicans need to know, the president needs to know, our caucus is unified today," Mr. Hoyer said.

He signaled his commitment to pressing hard for a change in the Bush administration's war strategy in Iraq, an issue where Mr. Murtha, a Vietnam veteran with close ties to the Pentagon, and Mrs. Pelosi have been more aggressive than he in pressing for troop withdrawals. Even in defeat, Mr. Murtha will have a powerful post as chairman of the House defense-appropriations panel that oversees war spending.

"Everybody in this leadership is a pro," said Rep. George Miller (D., Calif.), who was part of a cadre of Pelosi lieutenants who sought to help Mr. Murtha.

Murtha Loses Bid For Majority Leader (USAT)

By Andrea Stone And Bill Nichols

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The next speaker of the House lost her first test Thursday even before she takes office.

The decision by House Democrats to choose Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer to be majority leader over Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, despite Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's decision to back Murtha, dampened what until now had been a jubilant time for their party.

Hoyer's victory, in a 149-86 secret vote, came moments after Pelosi was unanimously backed by her caucus to become the first female House speaker. The full House will formally vote on Pelosi in January.

“We've had our differences; … and now that is over,” said Pelosi, of California, after Hoyer's election. “As we say in church, let there be peace on Earth and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin.”

In their first news conference together, the new Democratic leaders vowed, as Pelosi said, to work together “in a very unified way.” But their body language was telling. Pelosi smiled awkwardly as Hoyer threw his arm around her shoulder while Murtha scowled behind them.

Many, though not all, observers viewed the defeat of Pelosi's handpicked candidate as a blow to her credibility.

“She's a very smart woman who made an error in judgment,” said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., a Hoyer supporter.

“This puts her on notice that she is not solely in charge, that there are different factions within her caucus that are willing to be independent of her,” said Mike Franc, a congressional expert at the Heritage Foundation, a Washington think tank.

University of South Florida political scientist Susan MacManus said Pelosi's support of Murtha, a leading critic of the Iraq war, demonstrated her loyalty to allies and was designed “to show she is responsive to the loud message that was sent on Iraq. She can't just ignore those people and be effective as a leader.”

Hoyer, 67, is a 25-year House veteran who had lined up support from most of the incoming committee chairmen as well as a majority of new members. One freshman, Nancy Boyda of Kansas, said she supported Hoyer out of “loyalty” after he stumped for her campaign.

Hoyer had been favored to win the leadership slot until Pelosi openly voiced her support for Murtha on Sunday, prompting days of intraparty tension. Pelosi and Hoyer ran against each other in 2001 in a battle to be House minority whip that Pelosi won. Despite reports of tension since then, Hoyer said Thursday the two have “worked hand in glove” to keep Democrats unified.

“My pledge to my caucus and my pledge to the country is that I will work as hard as I can,” Hoyer said.

Murtha, 74, was one of the first members of Congress to call for U.S. troops to begin leaving Iraq — a policy change that resonated with voters during the recent midterm elections. Pelosi said she supported Murtha “because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq.”

Yet Murtha's decision to run also revived questions about his ties to the 1980 Abscam bribery sting at a time of voter disgust over a recent spate of congressional scandals.

In Abscam, FBI agents pretending to represent an Arab sheik offered bribes to several lawmakers. When offered $50,000, Murtha was recorded as saying, “I'm not interested … at this point.” A grand jury declined to indict Murtha, and the House ethics committee issued no findings against him.

Murtha, who will chair the powerful panel that oversees defense spending, said of his defeat, “I didn't have enough votes so I'll go back to my small subcommittee.”

Hoyer is not free of ethics questions, either. The watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense has questioned his use of “earmarks” — language in a bill that directs funds or tax benefits to a business, project or institution — for contractors that have contributed to his political action committee.

In Rebuff To Pelosi, Democrats Elect Hoyer As Majority Leader (CQ)

By Susan Ferrechio

Congressional Quarterly, November 17, 2006

In a stunning push back against incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., House Democrats on Thursday elected Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland as majority leader for the 110th Congress.

By a vote of 149-86, Hoyer defeated John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, whom Pelosi had endorsed Nov. 12 and lobbied for vigorously.

That leaves Pelosi locked in an uneasy partnership with her leading rival, a man she considers disloyal. Hoyer, a 25-year House veteran, has served as minority whip for the past four years, and Pelosi has resented his occasional departures from the party line she was attempting to lay down.

The unexpectedly bruising contest could leave deep scars. It fractured the caucus just as Democrats prepare to take control of the House for the first time in a dozen years. Many members were unhappy at being strong-armed by Pelosi and her lieutenants, and she may find it harder to go to them for favors in the future.

Some Democrats sought to play down that possibility.

"This is not going to be a problem. We're going to pick a majority leader, and then it's going to melt away," said Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Murtha had startled his colleagues in June when he first announced he would seek the No. 2 leadership post if Democrats managed to capture control of the House Nov. 7. Pelosi did not endorse him at the time, but on Nov. 12 she publicly threw her support behind Murtha.

She and her supporters spent all week ferociously lobbying other Democrats to back the 74-year-old decorated Marine Corps veteran who transformed the political debate over Iraq last year when he called for a speedy withdrawal of U.S. troops.

But Hoyer had worked for months to solidify his support within the caucus. He also had campaigned tirelessly for Democratic candidates, contributing more than $1 million through his political action committee during the 2006 election cycle, according to CQ's Political MoneyLine. That was substantially more than Murtha distributed.

Both Murtha and Hoyer voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war in Iraq, while Pelosi voted against it. But Murtha's call for a troop withdrawal carried special weight because of his reputation as a defense hawk. He has served as his party's top-ranking member on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and will become its chairman in the 110th Congress.

Pelosi delivered the first nominating speech for Murtha, followed by Kendrick B. Meeks of Florida and Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio.

Henry A. Waxman of California spoke for Hoyer, along with fellow Democrats Lucille Roybal-Allard of California, Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland and Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth of Indiana . Other Leaders

Before Democrats voted on the hotly contested majority leader's race, they unanimously nominated Pelosi to serve as Speaker in the new Congress. Her selection will not become official until the full House votes Jan. 4, the opening day of the 110th Congress. With Democrats in firm control of the chamber, that vote is a formality.

The caucus also unanimously elected James E. Clyburn of South Carolina as majority whip and Rahm Emanuel of Illinois as chairman of the Democratic Caucus. John B. Larson of Connecticut was re-elected as caucus vice chairman.

Clyburn, currently chairman of the Democratic Caucus, has served as Pelosi's bridge to several party factions, among them evangelical Christians and the Congressional Black Caucus, which he once led. He will be the second African American to serve as Democratic whip, after William H. Gray III of Pennsylvania, who left Congress in 1991.

Emanuel, who succeeds Clyburn as caucus chairman, initially considered opposing him for the whip's job. But he pulled back after Pelosi promised to enlarge his role as caucus chairman. As chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee during the 2006 election cycle, Emanuel was given much of the credit for the party's House takeover.

Hoyer Elected Majority Leader (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

House Democrats yesterday overwhelmingly rejected Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's choice for majority leader.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and Pelosi ally, lost a lopsided 149-86 vote to Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who has been a longtime political rival of Mrs. Pelosi's.

Mrs. Pelosi, who campaigned openly and aggressively for Mr. Murtha, tried patching up differences immediately after the secret vote held behind closed doors.

"We've had our differences in our party," she said, with a grinning Mr. Hoyer beside her and a glum-looking Mr. Murtha behind her. "We have come together."

But before turning the microphone over to Mr. Hoyer, Mrs. Pelosi once again talked about why she strongly backed Mr. Murtha for the No. 2 post.

"I thank him for his courage in stepping forward one year ago to speak truth to power, to change the debate in this country in a way that I think gave us this majority in this November," she said in reference to Mr. Murtha's early calls for withdrawing the troops from Iraq.

"I was proud to support him for majority leader because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq," she said. "I know that he will continue to take the lead on that issue for our caucus, for this Congress, for our country."

Mr. Hoyer, who never went negative in the leadership race even as Mr. Murtha publicly accused him of supporting President Bush's war policy, was gracious in victory, saluting Mrs. Pelosi for being elected the first female House speaker in U.S. history.

"She is not the first speaker because she's a woman," he said. "She is the first woman speaker because she is a person of deep values, keen intellect and extraordinary political ability."

Despite the show of unity before the cameras, yesterday's vote showed that nearly two-thirds of the new Democratic majority in the House was willing to defy Mrs. Pelosi's demand that they vote for Mr. Murtha.

Since gaining 29 seats in the Nov. 7 election, House Democrats have privately expressed deep concern over Mr. Murtha and say Mrs. Pelosi blundered by backing him so forcefully.

Some Democrats said that an ally like Mr. Murtha in the No. 2 spot would give Mrs. Pelosi unchecked power.

But most Democrats said they opposed Mr. Murtha because they had run campaigns on a promise to clean up corruption in Washington, and Mr. Murtha is one of the most scandal-tainted members of Congress. He was implicated a quarter-century ago in the so-called Abscam bribery scandal.

Some wondered why Mrs. Pelosi stuck her neck out so far so early on Mr. Murtha's behalf.

But Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, said that in the aftermath, "No one would question her loyalty."

Others speculated that Mrs. Pelosi urged Mr. Murtha to run for Mr. Hoyer's No. 2 position in order to focus attention on a Hoyer-Murtha showdown -- thus preventing a possible challenge by Mr. Hoyer against Mrs. Pelosi for the speaker's job.

Mr. Murtha said yesterday he would return to the "small subcommittee that I have on Appropriations," a joking reference to the powerful Defense Appropriations subcommittee.

Mr. Murtha himself may not have been entirely surprised by the loss of his bid for a leadership spot. A video recording that showed him negotiating for 54 minutes with undercover FBI agents more than two decades ago included Mr. Murtha's explanation of why one of his fellow congressmen was accepting a $50,000 bribe but Mr. Murtha was declining it.

"He doesn't expect to be in leadership," Mr. Murtha told the disguised FBI agents. "I have to be more careful. That's what it amounts to. I expect to be in the ... leadership of the House, and you have anything said against you, then you've got a problem."

Democrats Split Over Pelosi's Deputy Pick (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Nancy Pelosi, incoming speaker of the House, suffered an early defeat on Thursday when Democrats rejected her candidate for the number two job in the party leadership.

The unexpectedly bruising battle just days after Democrats took control of the House raised questions about party unity and Mrs Pelosi's commitment to ethics re-form and dampened celebrations of their new majority.

After a three-hour closed-door meeting, Democrats voted 149-to-86 to name Steny Hoyer, a long-time rival of Mrs Pelosi, to be majority leader when the new Congress convenes in January. He defeated John Murtha, the outspoken critic of the war in Iraq, whom she had backed in the race.

Throughout the mid-term election campaign, Mrs Pelosi pledged that the first act of a Democratic-controlled Congress would be a tough package of rules and ethics reform, following a series of mostly Republican scandals. But she raised eyebrows this week with her endorsement of Mr Murtha, who has been called "ethically challenged" by government watchdogs.

Mr Murtha has faced allegations that he abused his position as a member of the defence appropriations sub-committee by favouring a lobbying company of a former long-term staffer and clients of Robert "Kit" Murtha, his brother.

He has also been criticised for taking advantage of earmarking, the practice of appropriating funds for specific government projects that benefit individual lawmakers' constituents. Mr Murtha was also named as a co-conspirator in the 1980 Abscam bribery probe but not indicted in the case.

But Mr Murtha and Mrs Pelosi have long been allies in the Capitol and veteran lawmakers said her support for him was a sign of her loyalty. Others saw a vote for him as a way to thank him for his leadership on the war, a stance that played a large part in their victory.

The result will force Mrs Pelosi and Mr Hoyer, her current deputy, to continue to work together. Both natives of Maryland, they have known each other for 40 years and have sparred frequently.

Republicans in the House are set to choose their new leadership team today. Dennis Hastert, the outgoing speaker, will not be a candidate for a top party post.

John Boehner, who became Republican majority leader after Tom DeLay resigned his leadership job amid allegations of campaign finance violations, is the front- running candidate to be minority leader.

Political Pragmatism Carried Hoyer To The Top (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Steny H. Hoyer is a practical moderate and Nancy Pelosi is a liberal idealist, and for more than 40 years they have competed like siblings, all the way to the pinnacle of politics.

Hoyer's rout yesterday of Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), Pelosi's handpicked candidate for majority leader, validated the methodical, no-frills approach that the congressman from Maryland has taken throughout his long career, from his rapid ascent in state politics to his somewhat bumpier climb through the House.

As a number of Hoyer supporters put it, there was simply no good reason to deny him the job. Even Pelosi had to concede that the result was convincing. "Steny came out a big winner today," she declared after the 149 to 86 vote. "It was a stunning victory for him."

Congenial and diligent, Hoyer scored big points with his colleagues by laboring in the trenches throughout the 2006 campaign season. He raised money, helped recruit candidates and appeared at events across the country. When Congress was in session, he was a fixture on the House floor as the Democratic whip, cajoling colleagues to stick together on tough votes. And when Democrats won a House majority last week, Hoyer received a large share of the credit.

"He's worked hard for a very long time," said Rep. Mike Ross (Ark.).

"He's very, very effective," said Rep. Jerrold Nadler (N.Y.).

"We've never had a whip operation like this one," said Rep. David E. Price (N.C.). "He's just been a model leader, and people appreciate that."

One of Hoyer's assets is that he has worked successfully alongside Pelosi. "There was a consensus in the caucus that the team is working, and they wanted to keep it, by a very large margin," Hoyer explained. Given the duo's strong record, many House Democrats questioned why Pelosi would turn to Murtha, a veteran Appropriations Committee member who had not shown much interest in House leadership before he emerged as a prominent Democratic war critic a year ago.

By rejecting Hoyer, Pelosi may unwittingly have elevated him, particularly among moderate members who are nervous about her liberal views, particularly on social issues. Now, even before the Democrats take over in January, they can claim to have bucked the boss, by voting against Pelosi's candidate for her second-in-command. That may prove particularly useful for freshman Democrats who won in conservative districts and will presumably have to fend off tough challenges in two short years.

"They campaigned on a theme of independence," said Rep. Allen Boyd Jr. (Fla.). A vote for Hoyer, he said, "will help them to demonstrate it."

Hoyer, 67, was elected to the Maryland Senate 40 years ago, becoming the youngest Senate president in state history during the mid-1970s. In 1981, when Rep. Gladys Noon Spellman (D), who represented Maryland's 5th District, fell into a coma, Hoyer battled through a primary against her husband and then beat a better-financed Republican opponent in the general election. He was called the "boy wonder" of Maryland politics.

The congressman won a coveted seat on the Appropriations Committee and became a champion purveyor of funding for his Prince George's County-based district.

Just this August, Hoyer appeared at a celebration marking the completion of a jetty project in Deale. "This is pork," Hoyer told the crowd. "But there is good pork and bad pork. Good investment and bad investment. This is a good investment."

Known as a business-friendly Democrat, Hoyer is a free-trader and a balanced-budget proponent, with strong ties to lobbyists. He champions many liberal causes and was a leading sponsor of the Americans With Disabilities Act. Hoyer is widely liked around Washington, regarded as funny and considerate.

For years he served as a senior member of the Administration Committee, a little-known favor bank that oversees the day-to-day operations of the House. Hoyer also has good relations with some senior Republicans. When Congress is in session, he has a monthly lunch with GOP Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.), another pragmatic insider.

Why exactly Pelosi sought to oust Hoyer remains something of a mystery, even to the congressman. The two Maryland natives first met in the 1960s, while serving as interns in the office of Sen. Daniel B. Brewster (D-Md.). Pelosi helped Hoyer in his race for majority whip against David E. Bonior (Mich.) in 1991. Ten years later, Bonior gave up his post, and Hoyer's competition was Pelosi.

The race was long and bitter. Hoyer ran as the more moderate and experienced candidate, while Pelosi portrayed herself as forward-thinking and progressive.

Hoyer saw the race as an election for a leadership job, not a blood feud. "I ran for whip, she ran for whip," as he describes it. He calls her support for Murtha a show of loyalty toward an old friend. "Mr. Murtha asked her to do this, and because she's loyal, she did," Hoyer said. "And we've got to move on."

Steny H. Hoyer, A Cultivator Of Loyalties (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — If you placed an order for a congressman, chances are you would get Steny Hoyer. There is the immovable silver hair and the gleaming smile, the assiduous courting of colleagues, supporters and lobbyists, even the requisite life-changing encounter with John F. Kennedy.

In his early political career in Maryland, Mr. Hoyer was known as a machine politician. Here, he is "the members' member." It is a label applied by his champions, who admire him as an institutionalist, as well as his detractors, who sneer at him as a pol. But both agreed Thursday that this quality allowed him to become majority leader of the new Democratic-led House of Representatives.

The biggest test of Mr. Hoyer's political skills comes now, as he tries to lead a caucus under a new speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, who has long been his rival in leadership and who strongly supported his opponent for the majority leader's job.

Mr. Hoyer, 67, has been running for some sort of political office since his 20's, when he worked alongside a young Nancy D'Alesandro — later Nancy Pelosi — for a Maryland senator, then entered the State Senate, becoming at 35 the youngest Senate president in Maryland history.

During the past several election cycles, he campaigned early for Democratic challengers, earning loyalty that ultimately paid off in the leadership election. Many freshman lawmakers said they respected the stand his rival, Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, had taken opposing the Iraq war, but that they had committed to Mr. Hoyer early, as he had to them.

"He was out for me before anyone thought I had a race," said Chris Murphy, a Democrat who won a tough campaign in Connecticut.

Asked about him, Mr. Hoyer's friends return repeatedly to the themes of hard work and a methodical nature.

"He looks the part, he speaks well, he's got good presence, and obviously all of that helps, but in the end, it's about whether people trust your judgment," said Leon Panetta, who became friends with Mr. Hoyer while both served in Congress. "It's not something you earn over a short period of time. He's been around, and he's earned a reputation."

Steny Hamilton Hoyer was born on June 14, 1939, in New York to a family of Danish origin — his name is the diminutive of his father's, Steen.

He once told a reporter that he and his wife, Judith, now deceased, became sweethearts when he asked her to join his slate of class officers in high school.

He became serious about politics at the University of Maryland after hearing Kennedy, a Massachusetts senator then campaigning for president, speak on campus. He went to Georgetown Law School and began working for Senator Daniel B. Brewster, alongside the future Ms. Pelosi, the daughter of a Baltimore congressman and mayor. He graduated from law school in 1966 and won his State Senate seat that same year, at age 27.

He gave up his seat to run for lieutenant governor, and after he lost, he worked as a lawyer while looking for ways to get back into politics. He found his race when Representative Gladys Spellman fell into a coma in 1980. With his ties to local politics, he won in a crowded field of candidates, beating even Ms. Spellman's husband for the nomination.

The race cemented one of his most important friendships, with Tony Coelho, then a California congressman and chairman of the Democrats' campaign efforts in the House. The special election was Mr. Coelho's first race, and one the Reagan White House hoped would go to a Republican. When Mr. Hoyer won, Mr. Coelho helped ensure that he was the only freshman included in the Democratic response to the State of the Union. Mr. Hoyer was given a seat on the Appropriations Committee, a rare plum for a young lawmaker.

By the early 1990s, Mr. Hoyer had become his party's caucus chairman. But when he ran for whip in 1991, he lost. Supporters of his opponent, David E. Bonior, said that Mr. Hoyer was too much an upstart.

Mr. Hoyer's wife died of cancer in 1997, which friends say was extremely difficult for him. He continued to press for a position in the leadership, competing against Ms. Pelosi for whip in 2001. He lost, again. Mr. Hoyer says that he has moved on, but the campaign has left lingering tensions in their relationship.

"I'm not sure Steny knew what to do when that happened," said Benjamin L. Cardin, the Maryland representative recently elected to the Senate, and a close friend who plays hearts with Mr. Hoyer. ("He's extremely competitive," Mr. Cardin says of their games.) "He didn't know whether he had a future in the Congress or not."

Mr. Coelho said that Mr. Hoyer had counted his votes too loosely in that contest. This time, he was more hard-nosed, pressing colleagues for commitments. He went in with 149 promises, Mr. Coelho said, and emerged with that many votes.

"He has been out there working these freshmen for the last three elections," he said. "Some of these people ran twice. He gave them money, he gave them advice. He became a loyal friend to these people. Nancy thought she could put these people away because of pressure. But these people that got elected understand relationships, and they're not going to flip away because of pressure. He has a tremendous capacity for friendship, and when you have that, people don't flake off on you."

Representative Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland, among those who nominated Mr. Hoyer on Thursday, said he got the most applause when he talked about what Mr. Hoyer had done for freshmen. "They believed he had been there over and over again," Mr. Cummings said.

Friends say he has been frustrated by his inability to get past the tension with Ms. Pelosi. Associates have tried to reach out and patch the relationship between the two.

On Thursday, even after Ms. Pelosi supported Mr. Murtha, Mr. Hoyer spoke of his three daughters, his granddaughters and a new great-granddaughter, and how proud they would be to have Ms. Pelosi as the first female speaker.

He and Ms. Pelosi smiled and grasped hands, then lifted their arms over their heads triumphantly.

Speaker Pelosi Tempts Disaster (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

Nancy Pelosi has managed to severely scar her leadership even before taking up the gavel as the new speaker of the House. First, she played politics with the leadership of the House Intelligence Committee to settle an old score and a new debt. And then she put herself in a lose-lose position by trying to force a badly tarnished ally, Representative John Murtha, on the incoming Democratic Congress as majority leader. The party caucus put a decisive end to that gambit yesterday, giving the No. 2 job to Steny Hoyer, a longtime Pelosi rival.

But Ms. Pelosi's damage to herself was already done. The well-known shortcomings of Mr. Murtha were broadcast for all to see — from his quid-pro-quo addiction to moneyed lobbyists to the grainy government tape of his involvement in the Abscam scandal a generation ago. The resurrected tape — feasted upon by Pelosi enemies — shows how Mr. Murtha narrowly survived as an unindicted co-conspirator, admittedly tempted but finally rebuffing a bribe offer: "I'm not interested — at this point."

Mr. Murtha would have been a farcical presence in a leadership promising the cleanest Congress in history. Ms. Pelosi should have been first to realize this, having made such a fiery campaign sword of her vows to end Capitol corruption. Instead, she acted like some old-time precinct boss and lost the first test before her peers.

As incoming speaker, Ms. Pelosi will be dogged by skepticism — from within the party and without — about her political smarts and her ability to deliver a galvanized agenda.

It was a no-brainer for the caucus to end the misguided fight for Mr. Murtha, who belittled the need for reform. Now the pressure is even greater for Speaker-elect Pelosi to recover by leading the House to something actually worth fighting for — starting with credible anticorruption strictures. For this she needs gaffe-wary advisers, among them Mr. Hoyer, who has his own questionable record of flourishing in big-money politics. The new majority — led by a presumably wiser speaker — must realize by now that intramural vendetta is hardly a substitute for productive government.

Remember Who Sent You (WP)

By E. J. Dionne

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Democrats might usefully take a break from their inane round of back-stabbing and score-settling to focus, for a few moments, on why voters gave them their congressional majorities. A lot of Americans are hurting in the pocketbook, and if Democrats don't use the next two years to help them, the party will squander the trust it has temporarily earned.

To prepare for next year, the Democrats (and those Republicans who want to revive their party) should read a truly remarkable speech that Janet Yellen, the president and chief executive of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, gave the day before voters went to the polls.

In plain language backed by sophisticated analysis, Yellen makes clear that voters who feel severe economic pressures are not deluded, despite the economy's strong performance in keeping down unemployment and inflation.

The reason: new forms of inequality that don't fit into our conventional understanding of how the economy works. She argues that "much of the gain from excellent macroeconomic performance has gone to just a small segment of the population -- those already in the upper part of the distribution."

Yellen tells unfashionable truths. She does not claim, as many conservatives and free traders do, that globalization and the decline in union membership are innocent in the inequality saga. "Globalization and skill-biased technological change may have been working in combination to particularly depress the wage gains of those in the middle of the U.S. wage distribution," she says.

Note the word middle. That's where the biggest negative impact of globalization is being felt. At the top, Yellen says, globalization has been helpful to "highly able workers performing non-routine work requiring problem-solving skills." In the middle, "technology and globalization had the opposite effect -- substituting for workers performing routine or repetitive tasks and depressing their wages."

By the time we reached this decade, "many low-wage jobs that could be eliminated by technology had already vanished." That means the remaining jobs "involve manual and service work that cannot easily be automated."

As a result, "wages in the middle not only rose far more slowly than those at the top, they also rose more slowly than those at the bottom of the distribution."

Yes, there is a middle-class squeeze.

People at the bottom of the economy need help, which could come from an increase in the minimum wage, guaranteed health insurance, expanded wage subsidies through the earned-income tax credit and unionization.

But for the left-out middle, which rebelled in large numbers last week, the answers are more complicated, though no less urgent.

Job training and education are always touted as the answer. Yellen is all for them. But they are no cure-all, because Yellen notices something else that many others have ignored: Even the better educated are now being hit by globalization and technological change.

She says that "the distribution of [job] displacement has shifted towards the highly educated: workers holding a college degree saw nearly a 50 percent increase in their displacement rates between the early 1980s recession and the most recent one in 2001."

Americans are also suffering from much larger fluctuations in their incomes than in the past. In the 1970s, she says, "a typical family might have seen its income vary from a high of $60,000 to a low of $30,000 over the decade." In the most recent decade, the same family might see its income drop to as low as $15,000. Is it any wonder so many working Americans are mad?

Yellen draws on the essential policy book of the year, Jacob S. Hacker's "The Great Risk Shift." Again, if Democrats get tired of recrimination over an election they won -- imagine if they had lost! -- they might spend time with Hacker, who shows how more and more risk is being offloaded from government and private corporations onto individuals. He makes a powerful case for remodeling our social insurance systems to provide genuine economic security for all working Americans.

Hacker makes the paradoxical and insightful point that "we are most capable of fully participating in our economy and our society, most capable of taking risks and looking toward our future, when we have a basic foundation of financial security." It's common sense: Secure people are more likely to be risk-takers.

The task of creating an economy that is more just and more dynamic will not be completed within the life of the new Congress. It will take a decade of reform, experimentation and innovation. Now that House Democrats have settled on a majority leader, you can only hope they move away from self-involvement and start thinking about the people who sent them to Washington.

Federal Diary: New Subcommittees To Focus On Workforce Management (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, November 17, 2006

In an effort to take a more strategic approach to federal workforce management, an interagency group has reorganized with an eye to how best to help Uncle Sam recruit and train a new generation of public servants.

The group, the Chief Human Capital Officers Council, was created in 2002 to advise agencies on how to improve federal personnel systems. Yesterday, Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management and the council's chair, announced the creation of six council subcommittees, replacing five panels, and their priorities for the next year.

Projections show that 40 percent of the federal workforce will retire by 2015, casting agencies into a war for talent with corporations, consulting firms and other employers. If the government falters in recruiting engineers, scientists, linguists and other specialized skills, the Government Accountability Office has warned, agencies might not be able to effectively deliver services to the public.

Some of the subcommittees will study workforce planning for the retirement wave, look at how to ramp up training for a possible "knowledge drain," and study how performance-based pay can help the government compete for critical skills.

The subcommittees also will work with agencies on improving marketing strategies and examining whether OPM-sponsored job fairs, which seek to find applicants for hard-to-fill jobs, are worthwhile efforts.

One of the subcommittees focuses on emergency preparedness and in its previous incarnation, helped lay plans for how the government will manage its workforce during a pandemic flu outbreak. The panel, for example, has urged agencies to adopt a Navy system designed to track the whereabouts of employees during emergencies.

Springer also has asked the subcommittee chairmen to work with Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), who will oversee federal workforce issues in the next Congress, on legislation that supports the goals of the interagency group, an OPM official said.

The subcommittees are Emergency Preparedness, chaired by David S.C. Chu of the Defense Department; Hiring and Succession Planning, also chaired by Chu; Human Capital Workforce, led by Jeff T. H. Pon of the Energy Department; Human Resources Line of Business, led by Gail T. Lovelace of the General Services Administration; Learning and Development, chaired by Keith A. Nelson of the Housing and Urban Development Department; and Performance Management, chaired by Ronald P. Sanders from the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.Elsewhere . . .

Federal employee groups yesterday welcomed the election of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) as the next House majority leader. Hoyer has championed federal pay raises and benefits for more than two decades. "We have never before had such a good friend so high in the congressional leadership," said Margaret Baptiste, president of the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association.

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said the union will file a grievance against the Energy Department for delaying employee bonuses and promotions until Congress resolves a fiscal 2007 budget shortfall. She called the decision to delay bonuses "an example of management incompetence."

Office of Management and Budget controller Linda Combs announced yesterday that 18 of 24 federal agencies have received clean financial audits, the same as last year. Agencies that fell short on their fiscal 2006 financial statements included the departments of Defense, Energy and Homeland Security.Talk Shows

Art Gordon, president of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association, and Jon Adler, the association's executive vice president, will be the guests on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Ellen P. Embrey, Defense Department deputy assistant secretary for force health protection and readiness, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Don't Snub Harman (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

NEWLY MINTED House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is off to a rocky start. On the same day she was formally elected to lead the new Democratic majority, party colleagues refused to endorse her bizarre choice of Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who was investigated but not charged in the Abscam scandal more than two decades ago, as her second-in-command.

That embarrassing experience should induce Pelosi (D-San Francisco) — who appeared chastened before reporters Thursday — to reconsider another ill-advised promotion: Her apparent intention to bestow the chairmanship of the House Intelligence Committee not on the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), but on Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.).

Hastings, like Murtha, seems an unlikely choice for a leadership role in what Pelosi has been advertising as "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history." Hastings was impeached as a federal judge and removed from office in the late 1980s (although he was acquitted of bribery in a criminal trial in 1983).

A litany of explanations have been adduced to explain why Pelosi would bypass Harman, an expert on intelligence matters who has won the respect of both parties while criticizing some of the Bush administration's excesses in the war on terror. None of them is persuasive. Harman has earned this chairmanship.

The argument most often cited for bypassing Harman is that under House rules, her rotating membership on the Intelligence Committee is about to expire. But Harman's supporters note that since 2003, term limits on the committee (which in any case can be waived) don't apply to the chairman and ranking member. They also point out that the independent 9/11 commission called in its recommendations for longer tenures on congressional intelligence panels as a way of fostering continuity and institutional memory.

Then there is the claim that awarding the chairmanship to Harman rather than Hastings would offend the sacred principle of seniority, as well as the sensibilities of the Congressional Black Caucus (Hastings is African American).

Seniority has never been the only criterion for the awarding of committee chairmanships in either party. As for black representation in the leadership, two other African Americans, Reps. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) are slated to head the Ways and Means and Judiciary committees, respectively.

The most substantial — and alarming — speculation regarding the Harman-Pelosi rift is that the speaker may consider Harman too moderate. If one of the reasons Pelosi backed Murtha was because he took it to Republicans on the war in Iraq, Harman — who initially supported the war — may be insufficiently partisan in Pelosi's eyes.

Pelosi, who has vowed to lead the House from the center, should think twice before indulging in a witch hunt of colleagues who can work well with Republicans.

And it isn't as if Harman is an administration lackey. She has called for the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program to be subject to the safeguards contained in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and she voted against a bill to legalize the program without such safeguards. She also opposed legislation to create military commissions to try suspected foreign terrorists that did not afford detainees access to the writ of habeas corpus.

Especially at this juncture, the Intelligence Committee deserves a chairman who is respected by Democrats and Republicans in Congress and by the White House, and who is free of distracting questions about past personal conduct. Harman fits that description far more than Hastings.

Bush Nominee Gates To Court Lawmakers (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 16, 2006

Robert Gates is making his first round of visits on Capitol Hill since being named by President Bush to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The one-on-one meetings Friday with lawmakers are in anticipation of Gates' confirmation hearing next month. The Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hold the hearing the week of Dec. 4.

The war in Iraq is expected to be a dominant issue for lawmakers in their discussions with Gates. One day after the Nov. 7 elections, Bush said he acknowledged the lack of progress in Iraq cost Republicans votes and handed majority control to Democrats. In a bid to salvage U.S. support, Bush said he would consider a change in course and asked Rumsfeld to step down.

Gates planned to meet with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.; Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.; Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.; Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee; and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., in line to takeover Warner's position as chairman next year, is expected to meet with Gates on Monday.

Members of Congress often meet privately with high-profile nominees before confirmation hearings so they can speak more candidly and get a sense of where the nominee stands on critical issues.

Gates's Opportunity At Defense (WP)

By Gregory F. Treverton

WashingtonPost.com, November 17, 2006

Robert Gates, nominated by President Bush to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, will not have much time in office but he will have opportunity.

Gates comes to the job without much baggage, either of ideology or policy. He didn't campaign for the job -- indeed, he turned down the position of director of national intelligence when it was offered -- so he has some independence. And he comes to office when desperation might make for a serious debate about policy toward Iraq.

Gates was the committed Cold Warrior who also helped manage the end of the Cold War (disclosure: We have been colleagues and friends since working together on the Carter White House staff). His approach to the world is more the practical realpolitik of the first President Bush than the neo-conservatism that has held sway under the current president.

In a 26-year career as an intelligence professional, Gates spent almost nine years on the National Security Council, serving four presidents of both major political parties. He has not managed anything on the scale of the Pentagon, but then neither has anyone else.

As deputy CIA director for intelligence, Gates engineered what still is sometimes called the "Gatesian revolution,"drawing on his White House experience to induce intelligence analysts to be more aggressive in marketing their wares to policy officials. This earned him criticism, unfair in my view, for "politicizing" intelligence. As deputy and as director of central intelligence, he was the professional's professional, strategic in view and careful in detail.

Iraq will surely define Gates's tenure. There, the tempting analogy is to Clark Clifford's role as secretary of defense in persuading another Texan, Lyndon Johnson, that winding down the war in Vietnam was not a breach of Texas honor. Clifford described his task as that of the Scarlet Pimpernel, organizing a quiet conspiracy in the national interest.

This time around, the choices are at least as unappealing as they were during the war in Vietnam, but Gates will not lack for co-conspirators. James Baker and the Iraq Study Group provide one kind of cover for a change in policy. And while many prominent Democrats have argued for a timetable for Americas withdrawal, they will not want to look soft on national security.

In these circumstances, there ought to be room for a package -- a timetable but perhaps one with some flexibility -- and perhaps one more push for more stability, including even some short-term increase in U.S. forces.

Beyond Iraq, Gates's time will be short. Rumsfeld should be remembered, but will not be, for aiming at a real transformation of U.S. military capability, against the opposition of almost all of the Pentagon (and much of Capitol Hill to boot). His vision -- a smaller, quicker and more lethal military -- produced quick victory in the conventional phase of the Iraq war but left the United States with too few troops poorly suited to the task of occupation, let alone nation-building.

GatesÂ¿ opportunity will be to redirect the transformation, not for major conventional conflicts but for the shadow wars America is likely to face. He could build on the words of recent Pentagon statements to strengthen AmericaÂ¿s counterinsurgency forces, its special operators, its advisors and policing capacity. All those capacities that have been in short supply in Iraq. A first test will come as the Army brass argues for a larger Army.

With a civilian, Gates, running the Pentagon and a military man, Gen. Michael Hayden, running the CIA, there ought to be an opportunity to bring together the parallel universes of civilian and defense intelligence.

As the capabilities of "national" intelligence collection systems, like the National Security Agency, have improved they have become increasingly important to warfighters for tactical purposes, and thus the distinction between "strategic"and "tactical" intelligence has blurred. Consequently, intelligence agencies and the Pentagon share assets and compete over whose needs are more important.

The competition risks duplication, as the military seeks intelligence systems it can count on that are integral to operational units. Here, too, Gates will not have much time, but he will have the opportunity to lay the cornerstone for the major element of reshaping American intelligence.

Senators Urged To Add Teeth To FDA Bill (AP-Y)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

A bipartisan bill represents the best shot in years to improve the safety of drugs the Food and Drug Administration regulates, but needs bolstering to heal the ailing regulatory agency, witnesses told lawmakers Thursday.

The bill, introduced in August by Sens. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., and Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., comes on the heels of a string of high-profile drug recalls and safety warnings. Among them was the 2004 withdrawal of the popular painkiller Vioxx after long-term use was linked to an increased risk of heart attack and stroke.

"Millions of Americans rely on the drugs that FDA approves. They take them for sickness. And now the FDA urgently needs treatment," Kennedy said.

Two panels of witnesses, including representatives from industry, consumer and patient groups, praised the bill's timeliness, saying it would improve safety — and the public's confidence.

"The initiative now before you represents the best opportunity in many years to fix these chronic problems," said Dr. Steve Nissen, a Cleveland Clinic cardiologist who served on an FDA advisory panel that in 2001 recommended new warnings on Vioxx.

Some of the bill's provisions, including a temporary ban on consumer advertising of newly approved drugs, echo proposals made in a September report on drug safety commissioned by the FDA. The report found that the FDA cannot track the safety of new drugs, nor respond quickly to problems, for want of money, people and power.

"If there ever was a time that it was critical to address these issues, it is now," said Sheila Burke, chairwoman of the Institute of Medicine panel that produced the report.

Jim Guest, president and chief executive of Consumers Union, called the bill "a good first step," but said its provisions, including the power to assess civil penalties, should be strengthened. Nissen, too, said there was a need for further legislative action, including increased taxpayer funding of an agency that relies heavily on user fees paid by industry.

The Kennedy-Enzi bill calls for increasing those industry fees. Because of that, many FDA watchers believe next year the bill will be folded into legislation to reauthorize the fees.

Dr. Adrian Thomas, of Johnson & Johnson, said increased public funding of the FDA would address the perception that the agency is overly reliant on industry fees in a way that compromises its integrity.

The bill would require pharmaceutical companies to devise safety plans for new drugs. It calls for more disclosure of the results of drug trials in human subjects. It also would give the FDA the authority to require companies to carry out safety studies of drugs once they are on the market.

Senate Weighs Bill To Improve Drug Safety (USAT)

Representatives from the pharmaceutical industry and consumer and patient groups agreed Thursday that a bipartisan bill working its way through the Senate would improve drug safety and public confidence. The bill by Sens. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., would temporarily ban consumer advertising of newly approved drugs, require more disclosure of drug trials in humans and give the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) the authority to require companies to conduct safety studies once drugs are on the market.

Cleveland cardiologist Steven Nissen told the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions that the bill "represents the best opportunity in many years" to fix chronic problems in the way drugs are approved and marketed. Jim Guest of Consumers Union called the bill "a good first step," but said it needs to be stronger. Witnesses also called for a boost to the FDA budget.

Meanwhile, the breast cancer drug Herceptin, made by Genentech, received expanded FDA approval to include treatment of women with early-stage cancer who have undergone surgery. Herceptin has been on the market since 1998.

Senate OKs sending nuclear fuel to India

The Senate overwhelmingly endorsed a plan allowing the United States to ship civilian nuclear fuel and technology to India, handing President Bush a victory on one of his top foreign policy initiatives. Senior lawmakers from both political parties championed the proposal, which reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy, saying it strengthens a key relationship with a friendly Asian power that has long maintained what the United States considers a responsible nuclear program. The vote was 85-12. Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., called the plan "a lasting incentive" for India to shun future nuclear weapons tests. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said the endorsement pushes America "a giant step closer" to a "major shift in U.S.-Indian relations."

Panel: China not responsible global player

A congressional advisory panel questioned China's willingness to be a more responsible international player and said the world's most populous nation must abandon a single-minded pursuit of its "own narrow national interests." Among the 44 recommendations the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission made to Congress are "a more effective program" for gathering information about China's military buildup and the need to combat Chinese attempts to isolate Taiwan by supporting the island's membership in world bodies.

"While China is a global actor, its sense of responsibility has not kept up with its expanding power," said Larry Wortzel, chairman of the commission that Congress created in 2000 to investigate U.S.-China issues.

In Beijing, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu said she had not seen the report, but "we are against the attempt by any country or any organization to interfere with China's internal affairs."

Criminal investigation opens against Foley

Florida authorities have opened a criminal investigation into the sexually explicit computer messages that former representative Mark Foley sent to former male congressional pages. "We found the basis to open up a criminal investigation," said Kristen Perezluha, a spokeswoman for the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. She would not elaborate. Foley resigned Sept. 29 after being confronted with the lurid communications. His attorney, David Roth, declined to comment on the criminal investigation.

Cheney Is Toast, So New Veep In Works? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Now it's all about the White House in 2008. With midterm ballots barely counted, they started lining up on both sides of the aisle this week. Before it's over, expect 10 or 12 Democrats and four or five Republicans to make a serious run for the Oval Office.

In modern politics, the party in power with a two-term president has had a vice president waiting to move up. Those nominations have been almost automatic. History over the past half century:

Bill Clinton's VP Al Gore in 2000. Ronald Reagan's George H.W. Bush 18 years ago. Lyndon Johnson's Hubert Humphrey in 1968. Dwight Eisenhower's Richard Nixon 46 years ago.

Dick Cheney unequivocally has taken himself out of the running. So he's toast.

It's hard to think of a good reason he should remain in office and logical to assume that some Republicans are pushing him to leave. It could be on "doctor's orders." He's 65 with serious heart problems.

Bush then could name a vice presidential successor who they hope might be nominated and win in '08. But the appointment would need approval of both houses of Congress. With control shifting to the Democrats in January, time may be of the essence.

Likely on the short might-be list (alphabetically):

·Rudy Giuliani, 62, former mayor of New York City.

·John McCain, 70, U.S. senator from Arizona.

·Condoleezza Rice, 52, secretary of State.

If Cheney goes, Bush could make political history by naming the first woman and first black as veep. When presidents are lame ducks, they sometimes think more about what historians will say than about current events.

25 Years Later Reagan's Tax Cuts Are A Global Tide (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

It was entirely appropriate that as its keynote speaker to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the 1981 Reagan tax cut, the Heritage Foundation in Washington this week should assign the job to Art Laffer. Mr. Laffer is surely the most irrepressibly ebullient practitioner of the dismal science of economics alive today, maybe ever. It is no surprise that more than a quarter century ago, then California Gov. Ronald Reagan, another genuinely cheerful soul in a dismal profession, would have found common cause with the young economist's view that cutting taxes would produce a wealth of benefits for the American people.

Now, 25 years later and with the post-Reagan Republican Party in tatters over a confused political agenda, Mr. Laffer stood beaming at the Heritage podium to inform its audience that "illegal immigrants are the lifeblood of our society." This produced a boo-burst from a distant corner, which Mr. Laffer seemed not to notice. When so informed over a nightcap at the Willard Hotel, he said with the famous smile, "What do I care? I've been booed at all my life."

As, indeed, has Reaganomics over its 25-year life. On this night Mr. Laffer, famous in part for cutting down economists' pretenses to ideas anyone can understand, had an answer for the boo-birds of Reaganomics: Almost alone, the United States since those tax cuts has managed to remain both a growth country and a developed nation.

Economic growth was always the sine qua non of supply-side tax theory, the belief that lower marginal rates would incentivize people to work, save and invest. Bob Bartley, the late editor of The Wall Street Journal editorial page, wanted nothing more than to focus this debate back then on the particulars of achieving growth in the economy. But for many garden-variety politicians and professional economists, the economy is an abstraction. Yes, they know something is going on out there in the workaday world, but it's all a second-order effect of their policies and theories. So at its creation the supply-side idea instantly bogged down into an argument, alive to this day, over whether the tax cuts would "pay for themselves." You know, the deficit, the budget, the "nonpartisan" economic models at the Congressional Budget Office, blah, blah, blah.

It was back about the time these arguments over fiscal policy were erupting in the late 1970s that this page began to propagate the phrase, "inside the Beltway." This of course refers to Interstate 495, which rings Washington like the bright outline that surrounds protoplasm under a microscope. The unicellular protozoa inside the Beltway live life swimming from this side to that, bumping each other. They enjoy it. And so even today the debate over tax cuts "paying for themselves" lives on, reincarnated as a proposal called "paygo" which decrees that no tax cut may pass into law unless an "offset" is laid upon the altar of the budget gods.

But let's return to the real world, where the object is growing an economy, not fertilizing Uncle Sam's giant budget beanstalk. In the final months of Ronald Reagan's presidency, something else happened that forced even Beltway accountants to look up from their ledgers: The Berlin Wall fell in 1989. Five years later this brought forth the second great wave of supply-side tax policy.

Communism had been running what might be called a 40-year demonstration study in life at one end of the Laffer Curve -- what happens to economies when you tax away pretty much everything. Freed of this utopia, the peoples of Eastern Europe now had to devise new tax regimes appropriate to nations eager -- for want of a better phase -- to work, save and invest.

The first former Iron Curtain country to cut its taxes was Estonia in 1994, led by Prime Minister Mart Laar, who claimed then the only economics book he'd ever read was Milton Friedman's "Free to Choose." Estonia established a flat rate on personal incomes of 26%; two years earlier it had abolished all import tariffs. Estonia grew.

After Estonia, flat-tax regimes coursed across Eastern Europe, as listed below (bear in mind that the top rate in the U.S. is 35%): Lithuania, 33%; Latvia, 25%; Slovakia, 19% (the former sad sack of the region, Slovakia's growing economy has become its envy); Romania, 16%; Ukraine, 13%; Russia, 13%; and Georgia, 12%.

Yes, payroll taxes are often high, but unlike here, the political impulse is to reduce the tax burden; Estonia hopes to get its flat rate down to 20% by decade's end. Even the World Bank has noticed. In a September report on business reforms, it noted that the second most popular global reform the past few years, after easing regulations on new businesses, was "reducing tax rates and the administrative hassle of paying taxes." Bosnia-Herzegovina, emerging from the Balkan wars, has cut property taxes.

The accounting firm KPMG's annual corporate-tax survey, released this month, took special note of the history of corporate tax rates. The downward trend here was begun in 1985 with a corporate-rate cut in the U.K. by Reagan admirer Margaret Thatcher. "In the past 14 years," the report says, "the average corporate tax rate of countries surveyed by KPMG declined nearly 29%, dropping from an average of 38% to 27.1%." When Austria cuts its corporate rate to 25% from 34% and German companies started rolling across the border, German Finance Minister Peer Steinbruck accused the Austrians -- I love this phrase -- of "fiscal dumping."

During Ronald Reagan's presidency, the top marginal rate on personal incomes dropped to 28% from 70%. In 1993 Bill Clinton raised the top tax rate to 39.6%. In 2001 George Bush pushed the top rate back down to 35% and cut the rate on capital gains and dividends to 15%. Last week former Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin exhorted the Democrats to raise taxes "to solve the nation's fiscal problems."

The Rubin Solution may not be easy. Even a Democratic Congress might realize that raising taxes today is swimming against the global tides. In reversing the Clinton tax increases, passed in another age 13 years ago, and spreading tax cuts to the financial sector, George Bush has driven the roots of the Reagan tax philosophy deeper. If he resists a grand compromise on entitlements that raises taxes, it may prove to be his most enduring legacy.

Issues Front And Center (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The Democrats now have the opportunity the Republicans spurned, which is to build a broad coalition in the center and become once again the nation's governing party. But to achieve that, the Democrats must stand for values that connect with those of most Americans. The center is meaningless, after all, except as a platform for enacting legislation the public wants.

Some Democratic initiatives are obvious after the November election: The public wants changes in Iraq policy that reduce the costs and dangers for America; reform of an arrogant and corrupt congressional leadership; and an end to partisan political bickering. The new House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, had a disastrous post-election week in which her first priority seemed to be settling scores rather than solving these big problems. Shame on her! But let's assume for the moment that the new Democratic majority won't commit instant suicide with a continuation of Pelosi's payback politics, and that it will get serious about governing.

What are the issues where the Democrats should plant their flag and try to create a new majority? Two are no-brainers that should have broad bipartisan support next year: reviving the Clinton administration's push for national health-care policies that can save costs and improve care, and getting serious about alternative energy policies that can reduce demand for foreign oil. Sen. Hillary Clinton has already staked out these issues, which will enhance her stature as a 2008 presidential candidate.

A third big Democratic idea was advanced this week by Jim Webb, the senator-elect from Virginia, who promises to be one of the most interesting voices in the new Congress. He argued in the Wall Street Journal that the Democrats should focus on economic justice. "America's top tier has grown infinitely richer and more removed over the past 25 years," he wrote. "It should be the first order of business for the new Congress to begin addressing these divisions, and to work to bring true fairness back to economic life." Former senator John Edwards, another leading Democratic contender for 2008, has put his stamp on this same issue through his new Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina.

Webb and Edwards are right about the dangers of rising inequality in America. Studies by the Census Bureau, the National Bureau of Economic Research and other organizations all report growing inequality in income distribution over the past 35 years.

According to a June 2000 study by the Census Bureau, the gap between rich and poor began widening sharply in the early 1980s. From 1980 to 1992, the share of national income going to the top fifth rose by nearly 18 percent.

The income gap continued during the technology boom and the stock-option frenzy of the Clinton years, according to studies by a leading analyst of inequality, James K. Galbraith of the University of Texas. He notes that the collapse of the tech bubble and the surge of military spending under President Bush shifted the pattern of winners -- but from blue-state counties to other blue-state counties. In a recent paper, Galbraith found that the big gainers of the 1990s -- Santa Clara, San Mateo and San Francisco counties in California and New York City -- were the top four losers from 2000 to 2004, while the four big winners after 2000 were the District of Columbia and Fairfax, Los Angeles and San Diego counties.

The Democrats' challenge is to fuse populist anger with the party's other dynamic movement -- the call for fiscal reforms made by former Treasury secretary Robert Rubin and other members of the Hamilton Project, which seeks budget-balancing changes in entitlement spending. The goal should be to articulate policies that are at once pro-equality and pro-growth. That's a tall order, especially at a time when the U.S. economy appears to be slowing.

Lawrence Summers, a former Treasury secretary and Harvard economist, suggested the right balance in a column in the Financial Times last month: "The best parts of the progressive tradition do not oppose the market system; they improve on the outcomes it naturally produces. That is what we need today."

If the Democrats hope to re-create the "big tent" of a true governing coalition, they have to find policies that bring together the wings of their own party. Successful economic policies will be those that advance the interests of Main Street without destroying those of Wall Street, and vice versa. Solving that puzzle is a big intellectual challenge. It should motivate and unite the Democrats -- from Webb and Edwards to Clinton and Rubin -- as they move toward 2008.

The Big Three's Diminished Pull (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

ONCE UPON A TIME, if the chief executives of the Big Three U.S. automakers wanted a meeting with the president, he would rearrange a few summits or travel to Detroit to accommodate their schedules. Not anymore.

After months of lobbying for some face time with President Bush, the heads of General Motors, Ford and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group finally got their wish Tuesday — after the election, at a time when the president's political power is at a low point. Bush met with the CEOs for about an hour in the Oval Office. The president smiled, said a few nice things to the cameras about the importance of the U.S. auto industry and sent them on their way. Very little, if anything, is expected to come of the meeting.

It was a reflection not only of the newfound weakness of the industry but of a change in global circumstances. The lines separating U.S. from foreign automakers are a lot blurrier than they used to be. DaimlerChrysler, still considered one of the giants of Detroit, is headquartered in Germany. Toyota and Honda might be based in Japan, but they own numerous U.S. factories and employ thousands of American workers.

The executives weren't looking for a bailout, but they were hoping for some assistance from Washington. At the top of their agenda was healthcare. If they want help on that, they'll have to get in line. It is inarguable that the automakers face crushing healthcare costs, but it is the entire U.S. healthcare system that is in desperate need of an overhaul. The auto industry's problems differ only in scale.

Also up for discussion Tuesday was the Japanese yen, which Detroit has long complained is undervalued, and alternative fuels — the CEOs were apparently seeking more subsidies to build flex-fuel cars that can burn either gasoline or an ethanol blend. Bush wisely failed to take the bait on the yen, whose value is determined by market forces and not by the machinations of the Japanese government or its automakers. And although Washington should be encouraging more flex-fuel cars, Detroit could also focus on improving the gas mileage of conventional vehicles.

The U.S. auto industry is an important part of the nation's economy. But this is one road the Big Three are going to have to steer on their own. The days of massive federal bailouts for the likes of Chrysler are over — and would be even if it were still an American company.

Low Oil Prices, Modest Inflation Fuel Dow Record (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

DOJ_NMG_0095889

Moderate inflation and a plunge in oil prices to a one-year low pushed the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record.

The blue-chip average climbed 54.11 points, or 0.4%, to 12305.82, up 15% year to date. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.2%, or 3.19 points, to 1399.76, shy of its first close above 1400 since November 2000. The broad-based index is up 12% this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.3%, or 6.31 points, to 2449.06, up 11% year to date.

In the session's most anticipated piece of economic news, the Labor Department reported that its consumer-price index, excluding volatile food and energy prices, rose 0.1% in October, shy of Wall Street's consensus expectation for an increase of 0.2%.

Compared with the year-earlier period, the so-called core inflation rate is 2.7%, above the 2% level that the Federal Reserve considers the upper limit of acceptable annual growth in prices throughout the economy. October's reading was shy of the 3% level some analysts believe would trigger widespread worries that an interest-rate increase by the Fed is imminent.

"The readings are still too high for the Fed to ease rates, but at least for the day, the market is less worried about the worst-case scenario," said Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. He cautioned that he still believes economic growth will push inflation readings higher in the months ahead, eventually prompting the Fed to tighten.

Energy traders bid the expiring December futures contracts for crude oil sharply lower, off $2.50, or 4.3%, to $56.26 a barrel, down 7.8% year to date at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Warmer weather and mixed reports about the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' output helped to nudge prices lower. To avoid taking delivery of actual oil, many traders had to sell December futures to move their purely financial bets into January futures, said Alaron Trading analyst Phil Flynn.

He said such selloffs have become more common in the past 18 months or so -- a period in which contracts for long-term crude delivery have usually traded at a premium to contracts for immediate delivery. "This is getting to be a common theme in the oil market," said Mr. Flynn. "I call it expiration ugly, or expiration madness."

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.02%, or 0.05 point, to 231.54.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose, and bond prices fell. The 10-year note fell 10/32 point, or $3.125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.659%. The 30-year bond fell 20/32 to yield 4.737%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.22 yen, compared with 118.04. The euro fell to $1.2796, compared with $1.2826.

Inflation Drops Again As Gasoline Prices Fall (WP)

By Howard Schneider And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Inflation continued to moderate in October as falling oil prices, a slack housing market and a decline in clothing costs reinforced the sense of a gradually slowing economy.

Labor Department statistics released yesterday indicated that overall prices declined 0.5 percent in October on a seasonally adjusted basis, following a similar decline in the previous month.

Excluding volatile fuel and food costs, prices rose 0.1 percent, the smallest increase since December and a sign that core inflation is declining.

Overall, prices rose at a 2.4 percent annual rate for the first 10 months of the year, the Labor Department reported, much less than the 3.4 percent price increase recorded for all of 2005, when fuel prices spiked.

Wall Street greeted the data with restrained enthusiasm yesterday, concluding the Federal Reserve probably will not need to raise interest rates any time soon to battle inflation. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 54.11, or 0.4 percent, to close at 12,305.82, the latest in a string of all-time highs for the Dow. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 3.19, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1399.76.

The data released yesterday added to evidence that economic growth has slowed under the influence of recent Fed rate increases. The most recent report of the value of all goods and services produced, known as gross domestic product, indicated the economy was expanding at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate, down sharply from earlier in the year.

Federal Reserve policymakers agreed at their meeting last month that "inflation risks remained the dominant concern" and that more interest rate increases were possible if price pressures did not ebb, according to minutes of the session released on Wednesday.

The central bank has left its benchmark rate unchanged since June, after increasing it 17 times over two years to restrain inflation. Some analysts warned that it may be too soon to conclude the rate increases are over, with unemployment at a low 4.4 percent, wages rising and consumers spending the extra cash they've gained from lower gasoline prices.

"There might be a little more work to do," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers Inc., which predicts the Fed will raise its benchmark rate to 5.5 percent from 5.25 percent early next year. "We don't think the inflation problem has gone away."

The milder inflation report will allow the Fed more time to watch how the slumping housing market affects the economy in coming months, he said. "This gives the Fed more breathing room, but it doesn't mean we're out of the woods" on inflation, Matus said.

For now, the news is positive, particularly last month's mild 0.1 percent increase in the core CPI. The core index rose 2.7 percent in the 12 months that ended in October, after rising 2.9 percent in the year ended in September, the highest 12-month figure reported this year.

"One soft core is not a trend, but it still looks great," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist for the High Frequency Economics consulting firm.

Fuel prices figured significantly in the October price decline, as they did in September, falling 7.2 percent last month on top of a 7 percent decline the month before.

Gasoline fell 11.1 percent in October. The national average was $2.23 per gallon, down from more than $3 a gallon for much of the summer, according to the AAA automobile club. Oil is trading at about $59 a barrel, down from a peak of more than $78 a barrel in July.

Inflationary Signs Weaken Broadly (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Inflationary pressures eased broadly last month, reinforcing the Federal Reserve's view that consumer-price increases will subside as the U.S. economy cools.

The Labor Department reported that consumer prices nationwide fell a seasonally adjusted 0.5% last month -- matching September's decline -- and were up 1.3% from a year earlier, the smallest year-to-year increase since June 2002.

Core consumer prices, which exclude food and energy, rose a less-than-expected 0.1% in October, compared with a 0.2% increase in each of the three preceding months. Core prices were up 2.7% from a year earlier, short of the 2.9% year-to-year rise in September.

The inflation reading "is unmitigated good news," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight. "It will provide great comfort to the Fed because they've been saying that inflation is going to come down -- and it has. People who were worried about [high] core inflation can breathe a little easier."

The favorable inflation data, along with a plunge in oil prices to a one-year low, sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average climbing 54.11 points to a record close of 12305.82. (See related article1.)

Energy prices recorded some of the steepest of October's price declines. Gasoline prices fell 11.1% from September and were down 18.3% from a year earlier. Natural-gas prices declined 7.7% and were 24% below a year ago.

Prices for many other products and services also declined last month. Prices fell 3.3% on information-technology hardware and services, 1.2% on both used cars and trucks and women's apparel and 1% on personal computers and peripheral equipment.

Meanwhile, some housing-related costs, which pushed core inflation higher this summer, continued climbing. Rents paid by tenants, as well as owner's equivalent rent -- what a homeowner would have to pay to rent comparable living space -- each rose 0.4% from September.

Even so, the broad-based price declines suggest that "the inflation scare is over," said Mark Vitner, a senior economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C. If current trends continue, Mr. Vitner believes that the Fed's next move will likely be to cut interest rates in the first half of 2007. Immediately after the report, futures markets raised the odds of a quarter-point rate cut by April to about one in four, from about one in seven.

Other economists were more cautious. They noted that while inflation is easing, the core level remains above the Fed's perceived "comfort zone" of 1% to 2%, and that the nation's tight labor market, which is helping to lift wages and other business costs, could stoke inflation next year. Average hourly earnings in October were up 3.9% from a year earlier. That compares with an average increase of 2.8% in 2005.

"It's not fair to say that the inflation genie is in the bottle," said Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. "There is still work to do on inflation."

The Fed has kept its target for short-term interest rates at 5.25% since late June as the economy has slowed and appears to be heading toward moderate growth. The economy expanded by 1.6% in the third quarter, compared with an average of 4.1% in the first half of 2006.

The consensus among 56 economists surveyed last month by WSJ.com was that the economy would expand by an average of 2.5% in the fourth quarter, which would be below its long-term trend growth rate of about 3%.

A separate economic report released yesterday by the Federal Reserve seemed to confirm that some sectors of the economy are continuing to cool. The Fed reported that production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities increased a seasonally adjusted 0.2% in October, boosted by a 4.1% increase in utilities' output amid "colder-than-normal" weather in the Midwestern and Rocky Mountain states. The nation's capacity utilization rate, a measure of how fast the industry is running, rose slightly to 82.2% in October.

Manufacturing output, however, fell 0.2% for the second straight month, dragged down by production cuts in the auto and housing-related sectors.

"Manufacturing will not have a merry holiday season this year," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington, Va. Mr. Meckstroth projects that manufacturing output will remain flat in the fourth quarter, down from 4.5% growth in the third quarter.

The housing market did offer one bright spot yesterday: The National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo Housing Market Index, which tracks builder sentiment about homes sales, for November rose slightly from the previous month, gaining two points to 33.

NAHB chief economist David Seiders said the increase was a sign that the leveling off of home prices has improved housing affordability. Several large home builders, however, have said recently that they expect slow sales to continue into next year and that they haven't seen many signs of improvement.

Also yesterday, the Labor Department said that initial claims for unemployment benefits fell 2,000 to a seasonally adjusted 308,000 in the week ended Nov. 11, suggesting that the labor market remains healthy.

Inflation Slowdown Raises Rate Cut Hope (FT)

By Eoin Callan And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Inflation slowed sharply in the US last month, new figures showed on Thursday, easing the pressure on the Federal Reserve and raising expectations of an interest rate cut next year.

The core consumer price index rose 0.1 per cent in October, its lowest monthly increase since inflation began to accelerate in the spring.

The October report is a clear break with a run of stubbornly high inflation figures. Core inflation rose 0.2 per cent in each of the three preceding months, and faster in the previous quarter.

The three-month annualised rate of core inflation often cited by Ben Bernanke, the Fed chairman – which peaked at 3.8 per cent in May – fell for the fifth consecutive month to 2.3 per cent from 2.7 per cent.

“I view this as the first sign, the first proof, that the outlook for inflation is improving,” said Bob DiClemente, chief US economist at Citigroup.

However, Michael Moskow, president of the Chicago Fed, warned investors against assuming that the Fed would think the fight against inflation is now over. “It’s one month, and I think it’s a bit premature for anyone to say that we have broken the back of inflation,” he said.

“It is moving in the right direction; the key is whether that can be sustained and how quickly we can move to rates that are in a range that is commensurate with price stability. We’re certainly not there now.”

He added: “My current assessment is that the risk of inflation remaining too high is greater than the risk of growth being too low.”

Lower energy prices have given central banks around the world greater flexibility in tackling inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0095892

The Bank of Japan also kept its options open on Thursday, keeping interest rates at 0.25 per cent, after a low headline inflation rate of 0.2 per cent in September. But the central bank has made it clear that it is prepared to move pre-emptively against inflation.

Equity markets were buoyant in the wake of the US inflation report, while futures markets priced in about a 50 per cent chance of a US rate cut early next year. The dollar held its ground, while US Treasuries reversed early modest gains.

Meanwhile, figures on Thursday showed inflation pressures remain moderate in the eurozone, with headline and core both at 1.6 per cent.

The softer inflation figures in the US will reduce the pressure on the Fed to consider raising rates and will be viewed by Mr Bernanke as helping support the decision to keep rates on hold at the past three policy meetings.

Prices Fall, US Inflation Worries Ease (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

The price of a ton of steel is falling - something that helps to ease prices on everything from automobiles to rebar used to buttress concrete. Dresses and trousers are already on sale in department stores. And gasoline prices, after their recent spike, are back down to where they were about a year ago.

Falling prices on many goods are reining in the nation's inflation rate. Thursday, in an economic report that cheered just about everyone, the government reported that the Consumer Price Index (CPI) in October fell 0.5 percent. Even taking out volatile energy and food prices, inflation barely registered, rising only 0.1 percent.

The improving inflation news should help relieve the concerns of the Federal Reserve, the nation's central bank, that inflationary expectations are rising. The Fed meets in the middle of next month to set interest-rate policy. Economists expect the latest report to be one of the factors that keep the bank from taking any action on interest rates.

"I don't think we're going to see a change," says Ann Owen, a former Fed economist now at Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y. "In the past couple of meetings, even though the Fed has not made any changes, we've seen a dissenting vote in favor of raising interest rates and what we might see now is no dissenting vote."

The inflation numbers are also improving on a year-over-year basis. Compared with last October, prices are up 2.7 percent, a rate that is still higher than the Fed would like to see but a decline from prior months. "The numbers are [going] in the right direction," says Professor Owen.

The improvement in the CPI follows a similar report on Tuesday for the Producer Price Index, a measure of inflation for businesses, which fell 1.6 percent. Taking out food and energy, prices dropped 0.9 percent.

The falling prices reflect the competitive business environment, says Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington, Va. "Business just can't raise prices."

In an important trend, some commodity prices other than energy are also starting to retreat, he says. Copper, aluminum, and steel are all selling for less than they were this summer. "We're getting a pause in demand, which is giving supply a chance to catch up," says Mr. Meckstroth.

An easing of the inflation rate might also start to relieve what the Fed calls "inflationary expectations" - the public's anticipation that prices will keep going up. However, prices will have to remain down for a longer time to change perceptions, says Dennis Jacobe, chief economist at the Gallup Organization in Washington.

"A considerable number of Americans think the drop in gasoline prices is temporary and prices will go back up, if not this year than next year," he says.

It's not just gasoline prices, Mr. Jacobe adds. Over the last several years, prices have risen for healthcare and education. In Thursday's report, healthcare rose 0.3 percent in October and education 0.2 percent. "People perceive a sizable increase in these areas," he says.

The Fed is also watching the housing sector carefully for signs that the slowdown there will have an adverse impact on future CPI numbers. Housing is weighted to represent 25 percent of the index. To calculate housing costs, the government looks at rents.

"When there is a big drop in housing, everyone who was going to buy stops and starts renting because they think they should wait to see how low prices drop," says Owen. "This increases the demand for rental housing, which is ironic for the Fed because it could raise the CPI, causing them to raise rates. And housing will decline more, so the CPI gets worse, not better. So, the Fed is watching the housing market carefully because they don't want to accelerate the decline in prices."

This week, DataQuick reported that the number of new and existing homes sold in southern California last month was the lowest in 10 years. And prices have leveled off. The median price was $484,000, the same as September, but up 2.3 percent from October a year ago. DataQuick reports that year-over-year increases have been in the single-digit range for the past seven months and are expected to be slightly negative by the end of this year or early next year.

One of the largest factors in the falling CPI last month was the drop in gasoline prices. Energy prices in October were down 7.0 percent from September, which was down 7.2 percent from August.

The falling prices at the pump could augur well for upcoming holiday sales, says Scott Brown, chief economist at Raymond James & Associates in St. Petersburg, Fla. When gasoline prices move up or down, "there is a lag effect ... on consumer spending," he explains. "People are still working off the $3 a gallon they paid this summer, but once they work through those credit-card bills, they will feel better about the outlook."

As a result, Mr. Brown, says he is "cautiously optimistic" about the prospects for the holiday retail sales.

Halliburton Begins A New Era (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Halliburton Co. has shed a big part of its business, for better or worse. KBR, the engineering and construction unit with a huge presence in Iraq, was successfully offered to the public Thursday after a slight delay1. Halliburton's stock, which has rallied in anticipation of the spinoff, has done well since the Iraq war began, rising from around $10 to an all-time high of $42 earlier this year. Shares closed Thursday at $32.51, down $1.04 on the New York Stock Exchange. And while its third-quarter performance and plans for more capital spending have drawn approval from some analysts, suspicions surrounding its dealings in Iraq and worries about a slowdown in its oilfield-services business have others concerned. (Ratings and disclosures follow) The Bull Case

Active Oilfields: Halliburton posted strong third-quarter earnings as demand for oilfield services surged. The second-largest industry player behind Schlumberger Ltd. saw its oilfield division hit record revenue of $3.4 billion in the quarter, and it beat analysts' average earnings estimates by twice as much as its larger rival did. The success came across a wide geographic swath, with international growth equaling growth in North America year over year. "This has not been the case in past quarters and bodes well for Halliburton's ability to grow," wrote UBS analyst James Stone, who said the results prove the company is "much more than a one trick pony." Mr. Stone raised his fourth-quarter earnings-per-share estimate to 63 cents from 58 cents. Halliburton "remains one of the most undervalued stocks in the oilfield service sector…despite consistently strong performance," he wrote.

Dollar Signs: Halliburton plans to increase capital spending to $1.2 billion in 2007, up 40% from this year, something analysts see as a good sign for business. Most of the new spending will be used to grow markets in the Eastern Hemisphere, where Halliburton has won several big contracts recently in such countries as Australia, Indonesia and Russia. In June, the company was awarded a three-year contract for the oilfield-services component of a large oil development project in the Arabian Gulf -- the Saudi Aramco Khurais project. Citigroup's Geoff Kieburtz calls the East the "future growth engine" for Halliburton. The company also plans to boost research-and-development spending by as much as 30% next year, which Mr. Kieburtz said shows its "conviction about the positive long-term outlook" in the oilfield business.

Public Appearance: Halliburton took 17% of its KBR unit public yesterday in a move welcomed by analysts. The initial public offering of 27.8 million shares priced at $17, the upper end of its range, and is expected to bring Halliburton $441 million after fees. KBR popped in its debut Thursday, rising 22% to $20.75 a share. "We believe the KBR IPO process should be a catalyst to Halliburton shares…and broaden the company's investor base," Bear Stearns' Robin Shoemaker wrote. Halliburton plans to shed the remainder of the firm by April 2007. While some uncertainty will likely remain until it is fully separated from Halliburton, "the IPO is a critical first step to unlocking the value we see in Halliburton's oilfield business," wrote Mike Urban at Deutsche Bank. "A new era begins for Halliburton," wrote Daniel Henriques at Goldman Sachs in a note after the KBR IPO, which he says will "bridge the valuation gap between Halliburton and its peers," namely Schlumberger and Baker Hughes Inc. The Bear Case

Oilfield Aches: Falling commodity prices could spell trouble for Halliburton's North American business, which accounts for more than 60% of the operating income in its energy-services division. The unit's operating margin -- a measure of revenue left after paying for production costs -- could be pinched, notes J.P. Morgan's Michael LaMotte, who said "the potential threat … is significant." He predicts the margin could fall more than four percentage points next year, shaving 43 cents a share from annual earnings. Also, much of Halliburton's business depends on how many oil and gas pumping rigs come to market, and the overall rate of rig growth is expected to decline, analysts predict. What's more, James Wicklund at Banc of America Securities sees a "great deal of difficulty" in Halliburton signing contracts at higher prices. "Every exploration and production company we talk to is trying to reduce oilfield-services pricing…so any weakness in the market is seen and spreads quickly."

Close Scrutiny: Halliburton could come under more fire amid a new political landscape -- a risk even more bullish analysts acknowledge. "With a Democratic led House and Senate, there is a more than reasonable chance that the company may come under more scrutiny," wrote Conley Turner at Wall Street Strategies. Since the war started in Iraq, Halliburton's KBR unit has received more than $16 billion for projects there. Rep. Henry Waxman, a California Democrat and vocal Halliburton critic, is set to become chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, where he will have subpoena power and could hold hearings examining Halliburton, a prospect that could prove distracting2 for both the company and its shareholders.

Artificial Prop: Anticipation of the KBR spinoff has been the primary force driving up the price Halliburton shares in recent weeks, some analysts say, but the move also has the potential to cut annual revenue by nearly half as it loses business in Iraq and other parts of the world. And some analysts say the KBR spinoff news has made Halliburton seem overpriced. "At this point, we would not recommend chasing the stock," wrote Mr. LaMotte at J.P. Morgan, who thinks the rally in Halliburton shares "probably has more to do with the potential acceleration of the KBR IPO than anything else." In other words, he said, "We do not believe that the rally in the stock indicates that investors believe the North American…business has dodged a bullet and will be fine next year." Mr. LaMotte favors Baker Hughes over Halliburton, saying it has more earnings potential and less exposure to the uncertain North American market.

KBR Shares Up 22% On 1st Day Of Trading (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

KBR Inc., the Halliburton Co. subsidiary that made its parent company famous -- and infamous -- with its huge contracts in Iraq, took a major step toward independence yesterday with an initial public offering in which share prices rose 22 percent on their first day of trading.

Newly issued KBR stock had been priced at $17 a share Wednesday night, but was trading for $21 by the time the New York Stock Exchange opened yesterday. It closed at $20.75. The IPO was projected to net KBR about $441 million, which will be used to pay off debt.

For oil-field-services company Halliburton, the IPO was a milestone in its more than two-year-old effort to spin off KBR. While Halliburton still owns a little more than 80 percent of the subsidiary once known as Kellogg Brown & Root, Halliburton executives have said they plan to sell the rest of the company to shareholders by April. That means Halliburton, where Vice President Cheney once was chief executive, will be separate from the company that has done billions of dollars worth of work in Iraq for the Defense Department over the past 3 1/2 years.

Analysts said Halliburton's main reason for making the move was that KBR had become a drain on the company's share price. While KBR takes in huge revenues through its government contracting and engineering work, its profit margins are considerably thinner than those of the rest of Halliburton, which focuses on exploration and drilling for energy supplies.

"KBR didn't fit with what the rest of the business was," said Poe Fratt, oil sector analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc.

But Fratt and other analysts said another factor was likely at work. Halliburton may be trying to insulate itself from the bad publicity it received because of allegations that KBR has overcharged the government and shortchanged soldiers.

"The levels of scrutiny have been high for a while, but you're likely to see them escalate now that you have Democrats taking over committee chairmanships," Fratt said. "Halliburton is closely associated with Dick Cheney. But beyond the Beltway, KBR is not."

KBR, which like Halliburton has its headquarters in Houston, has about 400 employees in the Washington area. The company is split between its energy and chemicals division and its government and infrastructure division. Its work includes building offshore oil platforms, converting natural gas to liquid fuels and constructing military bases. KBR recorded $10 billion in revenue last year, about half of which came from Iraq.

KBR has defended its Iraq work and resolved many of the claims about overcharges. But questions linger. The Justice Department and a U.S. attorney in Illinois have open investigations into KBR's Iraq work, and the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction has been looking into whether the government is getting its money's worth on a KBR contract to provide meals, laundry service and other logistical support to soldiers.

The Army announced over the summer that it would put that contract back out for bid. KBR is trying to keep the contract and is considered a favorite to win the bidding, but it will probably have to share the deal with other companies if it does.

KBR, with a corporate history that goes back more than a hundred years, has been the Pentagon's single largest contractor in Iraq. But as the U.S.-led portion of the reconstruction winds down, the company will face pressure to find business elsewhere. "KBR has been tied to a lot of activity in Iraq, and they have benefited from that. But Wall Street is always looking down the road," said Peter Arment, vice president of JSA Research Inc., which focuses on the defense industry.

Arment said, however, that the quick rise in KBR's share price yesterday was "a very positive sign" that the company will be well received by investors.

KBR's IPO is the latest in a string of successful public offerings by government contractors this fall. Science Applications International Corp. of San Diego raised more than $1 billion with an IPO last month. Shares were initially priced at $15 and closed at $20.08 yesterday. Also in October, Stanley Inc. of Arlington raised $81.9 million in an IPO that was initially priced at $13. Stanley closed at $16.58 yesterday.

KBR Shares Soar After UK Plea Rebuffed (FT)

By Anuj Gangahar

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Shares of KBR, the engineering and military services unit of Halliburton that ignored calls from the UK's Ministry of Defence to postpone its float, soared as much as 25 per cent on their debut on the New York Stock Exchange on Thursday after pricing at the top of their forecast range.

The MoD wanted the float delayed to give it time to determine the financial viability of KBR, which owns 51 per cent of the Devonport naval shipyard in Plymouth, western Europe's largest naval dockyard.

In the first nine months of the year, KBR made almost half of its operating profits from Devonport, where Britain's nuclear submarine fleet is refitted and refuelled.

Halliburton was eager to launch its offering at an advantageous moment in the market, but the MoD said it needed until the end of the month before it would conclude its assessment of KBR.

Shares in the company, formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root, closed at $20.75, up 22 per cent to $3.75 on Wednesday's offering price of $17. They reached $21.31 earlier in the day.

The company raised $473m by selling 27.8m shares at $17 compared with a forecast range of $15 to $17, giving an initial market capitalisation of about $2.8bn.

Halliburton has been trying to split off the KBR unit, which has faced investigations into alleged overbilling concerning its contracts in Iraq, for some years to concentrate on its more lucrative oil services business.

KBR has often been viewed as a political liability for Halliburton, which was led from 1995 to 2000 by Dick Cheney, US vice-president.

In an emergency filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission, Halliburton said the MoD had asked on November 13 for the KBR offering to be withdrawn.

KBR's NYSE Debut (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 17, 2006

Investors on Thursday looked past the controversy that has dogged KBR, lifting Halliburton Co.'s engineering and government-contracting arm to a strong start in its first day of trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

But KBR's decision to proceed with an initial public stock offering over the objections of the British government might still come back to bite it.

A top official with the United Kingdom's Ministry of Defense is scheduled to meet Monday with William Utt, KBR's chief executive, to discuss the impact of the move on a strategically important naval dockyard, which is majority-owned by KBR.

The British government has threatened to reject the lucrative contract if both sides cannot come to terms and was "concerned" about KBR's decision to proceed with the IPO this week before allowing the ministry office to perform a financial review of KBR, said Mitch Jeffrey, spokesman for the British consul general in Houston.

The British government office said it needs until the end of November to complete the review.

Even with that unresolved issue, KBR's stock price shot up to close at $20.75 per share Thursday. When trading opened it quickly zoomed past the $17 per share price that was set in an initial public stock offering Wednesday night. The largest military contractor in Iraq has faced investigations into overbilling there.

But Thursday's returns suggest investors are looking past negative headlines about KBR and seeing promise in its experience in building refineries, chemical plants and other large-scale energy projects, demand for which is expected to grow to meet rising global energy demands.

Halliburton, which sold 27.8 million shares, or 17 percent of KBR's stock, to underwriters Wednesday, plans to spin off the entire unit by April 2007. The $17 per share price was at the upper end of the estimated price range previously forecast by Halliburton.

The Houston-based oil-field-services giant is cutting ties with KBR, which it acknow- ledged has been a drag on earnings. Officials with Halliburton did not respond to requests for comment.

Jim Wicklund, industry analyst with Bank of America, said based on KBR's first day of trading, Halliburton's decision to part ways was a good one.

"We believe the separation of the two businesses will unlock the value of both, and they will begin trading more in line with their respective peer groups," he wrote in a note to investors.

KBR raised $445 million in the offering — a bit higher that its original estimate — after underwriting fees and other expenses, the company said Thursday in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Committee. It will use the proceeds to pay debts to Halliburton subsidiaries that in October were roughly $450 million.

The underwriters, led by Credit Suisse, Goldman Sachs and UBS Investment Bank, have the option to buy an additional 4.18 million shares of KBR stock, which could add to KBR's take.

Candidates, Voters Still Await Results In Some Races (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Recounts, runoffs and Saturday's Ohio State-Michigan football game stand in the way of deciding House races that remain too close to call 10 days after the election.

Nearly a dozen races were unsettled at the start of the week.

Four races have been called since Tuesday, all but one in favor of the incumbent. Connecticut Republican Rep. Rob Simmons lost to Democrat Joe Courtney by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast.

However the remaining contests are decided, they won't prevent Democratic control of the incoming Congress.

Republicans lead in all five races in which absentee and provisional ballots are still being counted.

One of the closest contests is being waged in North Carolina, where GOP Rep. Robin Hayes leads Democrat Larry Kissell by about 450 votes. Poll workers are hand-tallying nearly 1,500 provisional ballots.

In Ohio, two races remain:

·Rep. Deborah Pryce, who has said she'll step down from her GOP leadership position, leads Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy by 3,536 votes. Election officials won't count provisional ballots until Sunday, so workers can watch the Ohio State-Michigan game Saturday.

·Freshman Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt leads Democrat Victoria Wulsin by about 2,800 votes. Provisional and absentee ballots could be counted by Tuesday.

The most contentious standoff is in Florida in the district that Republican Katherine Harris — a central figure in the disputed 2000 presidential election recount — gave up for her failed run for senator.

Just 401 votes separate the leader, Republican Vern Buchanan, from Democrat Christine Jennings. Both showed up in Washington this week for new member orientation.

Jennings has refused to concede, even though the Associated Press has declared Buchanan the winner.

A recount is underway, but that's not likely to explain why more than 18,000 voters in heavily Democratic Sarasota County left the House race blank on their electronic touch-screen ballots.

“Many voters have said they did not see the congressional race option on the ballot they were given,” said Sarah Feinberg of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. “This is likely to be in court for some time.”

Ed Patru of the National Republican Congressional Committee, who is in Florida monitoring the recount, said Buchanan will keep his lead.

“It's only a matter of time before Jennings concedes. Short of calling for and being granted a new election, nothing will change here,” he said.

Susan MacManus, a political scientist at the University of South Florida, disagrees.

“I don't see either side backing down,” she said.

Though it's unclear whether state officials will heed Democratic calls for a new election, MacManus said that “at least in Florida,” efforts to require paper trails for electronic voting machines “have been fast-forwarded.”

Two other races will be decided in runoffs next month.

In Louisiana, state Rep. Karen Carter is challenging fellow Democrat Rep. William Jefferson, who is under investigation for alleged bribery.

In Texas, GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla faces Democratic former congressman Ciro Rodriguez.

Democrat Won't Seek Recount In Wyoming (AP-Y)

By Bob Moen, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

A Democratic challenger said Thursday he would not seek a recount in his narrow loss to Republican Rep. Barbara Cubin in Wyoming's closest House race in 36 years.

"It is time to put this election to rest and look to the future," Gary Trauner said in a statement. "Wyoming is counting on Mrs. Cubin to provide first-rate representation for all the people of the state, and I trust she will do so."

Cubin beat Trauner by 1,012 votes out of 193,369 cast. The State Canvassing Board certified the election results Wednesday.

The margin was too great to mandate an automatic recount. Trauner had until Friday to request a recount, but he would have had to pay for it.

Because state law does not allow for hand counting of ballots, Trauner said he didn't think a recount would change the result.

The election was Wyoming's closest U.S. House election since 1970, when Democrat Teno Roncalio beat Republican Harry Roberts by 608 votes.

100 Block Of D Street SE Embodies The Story Of The GOP's Undoing (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - A requiem for the nearly departed Republican Congress: A stroll down the 100 block of D Street, Southeast in the nation's capital.

Inside the elegant painted-brick rowhouses that line the quiet street within sight of the U.S. Capitol are the stories of a revolution gone wildly wrong.

Overlooked oversight, tawdry tales of money and sex, increasingly strident conservatism that left moderates feeling isolated and disaffected: It's all here, a one-block catalogue of self-inflicted wounds.

With many of the block's congressional homeowners now facing either lucrative lobbying jobs or unemployment, maybe they could make it a show; open their doors and sell tickets: How We Lost Congress Without Really Trying. A bit of high drama, a dollop of tragedy, a lot of low comedy.

It's not so far-fetched.

For the last couple of years, several of the neighbors hosted a progressive cocktail party/fundraiser, according to the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call. Admission: $1,000 per house.

Those were the days, my friend. Who thought they'd ever end? As one homeowner, Mark Foley of Florida - yep, that Mark Foley - might muse in a late-night instant message: LOL!

The neighbors, the drinks, the problems, the consequences:

No. 129 D St., SE: Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, elected 1982. She served martinis - so moderate, so Connecticut, like a John Cheever story - at the progressive cocktail party.

Speaking of moderate: Last summer, the lead picture on Johnson's Web site was one of her with Bill Clinton. A good sign that being a Republican in an increasingly Democratic region was a not-so-good career move. Sure enough, Johnson lost her seat on Nov. 7 to Democrat Chris Murphy.

Northeast Republicans aren't just endangered. They're virtually extinct: The new House will have one Republican from New England. Lamented Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, the executive director of the moderate Republican Main Street Partnership: "If you drive all the moderates out, you're left with a Southern, minority party."

131 D St., SE: Clay Shaw of Florida, elected 1980. Served bourbon. A good Southern drink. He still lost.

Shaw came to Congress with the first Republican revolution, the one that put Ronald Reagan in the White House. He expected to chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee after this election. But Shaw got caught in the anti-Republican, anti-Bush, anti-Iraq war riptide. He later said that if Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had been fired before the election, he could have beat Democrat Ron Klein. But Shaw himself spoke of "progress being made in Iraq" in the weeks before the election.

132 D St., SE: Jim Ryun of Kansas, elected 1996. Served dessert and coffee at the progressive. Not the usual diet of Olympic runners.

Like Shaw, GOP loyalist Ryun tripped up unexpectedly and lost to Democrat Nancy Boyda in a heavily Republican district.

Ryun's house was linked to the scandal that brought down former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas. Ryun bought the place for $410,000 in 2000 from the U.S. Family Network, a group associated with DeLay (whose political action committee had its office in the house) and lobbyist-felon-inmate Jack Abramoff.

The liberal Web site TPMmuckraker.com reported last spring that Ryun paid below market value; in fact, the seller lost money on the deal, an unheard-of occurrence in Capitol Hill real estate. Ryun said the low price was because of structural deficiencies he had to fix. Bright side: Those repairs should help the resale value.

Chocola won office four years ago in a close race, taking an open seat long held by a Democrat in a year the president's party confounded history by winning seats in a midterm. Biggest help: President Bush visited twice to sprinkle Chocola with his post-Sept. 11 political magic dust, as Bush did for many others that year.

George Bush giveth and George Bush taketh away: Chocola was loyal to the administration for four years. And like many other loyal Republicans, he paid the price, losing his seat to Democrat Joe Donnelly in a race that turned on Bush's unpopularity and the war in Iraq.

137 D St., SE: Mark Foley, elected 1994. Served wine.

You know the story: Sexually-charged instant messages to underage male congressional pages. Resignation and rehab. A scandal that reached the highest levels of Congress. An ethics committee investigation into whether Republican leaders had covered up Foley's behavior.

All one month before an already tough election for Republicans. Foley's name appeared on the ballot, with another Republican tapped to fill the seat should Foley win.

He didn't. Democrat Tim Mahoney did.

Good news for the D Street denizens: Washington's sizzling real estate market has cooled, but most of them bought at low enough prices - cough, Jim Ryun, cough - that they'll still do quite well when they sell. The houses likely will fetch north of $850,000. Chocola, the newest homeowner, paid $640,000 in 2002.

Even in Washington, a house with the cachet of a former member of Congress or a scandal - or both - has little impact on price. It's mostly good for cocktail party chatter, said Phil Guire, a Capitol Hill real estate agent.

But "good houses are good houses," Guire said. "That's a block people will want to live on because of its proximity."

One house on the block already is on the market. No. 123, which belongs to Porter Goss. Sound familiar?

Goss, from Florida, chaired the House Intelligence Committee before he was named CIA director in 2004. In about 18 months at the CIA, Goss and his aides (Gosslings, they were called) alienated much of the career staff. Goss quit the CIA a week before federal agents searched the home and office of his confidante, the agency's No. 3 man, Kyle Foggo, as part of the corruption probe that sent former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California to prison.

Goss's house - two bedrooms, two-and-a-half baths - is on the market, too. $985,000.

McCain Calls For Common Sense In GOP (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

On the heels of devastating GOP losses, Sen. John McCain called on the Republican Party to return to its common-sense conservatism — and implicitly cast himself as the one who can lead the party's rebirth.

"We lost our principles and our majority. And there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first," the Arizona Republican said Thursday in the first of two speeches that could set the tone for a potential presidential campaign.

On the same day he launched a presidential exploratory committee, McCain said voters felt that Republicans valued their incumbency over their beliefs on such conservative standards as limited and efficient government — and he urged a return to those tenets.

"Americans had elected us to change government, and they rejected us because they believed government had changed us," the four-term senator said. "We must spend the next two years reacquainting the public and ourselves with the reason we came to office in the first place: to serve a cause greater than our self-interest."

He spoke before members of the Federalist Society, the organization of more than 25,000 conservatives and libertarians including high-profile members of the Bush administration, the federal judiciary and Congress. Later Thursday, he was delivering a broader speech about the future of the Republican Party to another conservative pillar, GOPAC.

"Hypocrisy, my friends, is the most obvious of political sins. And the people will punish it," McCain said, explaining that while Republicans were elected to reduce the size of government, they ended up increasing it "in the false hope that we could bribe the public into keeping us in office."

Fifteen months before the first 2008 presidential nominating contests, McCain is positioning himself as the Republican standard-bearer while President Bush takes on lame-duck status and dispirited party faithful search for a road to recovery. The election cycle was sobering, with GOP candidates losing at all levels of government.

McCain is taking advantage of the postelection period to outline a vision for the party much like Ronald Reagan did after the Republican defeat in the 1976 presidential election.

"Republicans got their teeth kicked in all over the country," said Katon Dawson, South Carolina's party chairman. "Now, there's a window for all people with presidential aspirations to, in political terms, catch the high ground."

As expected, McCain also filed paperwork with the Federal Election Commission that will allow him to raise money and travel the country while weighing a bid. The committee's Web site — http://www.exploremccain.com — went online a day earlier, and McCain's GOPAC speech will be broadcast on the site.

Despite all the action, McCain says he will wait until after the Christmas holiday to decide whether to make a second bid for the White House. He lost to Bush in a contentious race in 2000, when the senator was the underdog and bypassed the revered Iowa caucuses to focus on independent-friendly New Hampshire.

Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has filed paperwork to test the waters for the GOP nomination, and Rep. Duncan Hunter of California also has announced his intention to run. On Wednesday, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson said he intends to explore a possible candidacy.

McCain's other would-be 2008 Republican rivals include Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Sens. Sam Brownback of Kansas and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Over the past year, McCain has repeatedly demurred on questions about his political future and said he was focused entirely on helping Republicans get elected across the country.

He spent 2006 sowing goodwill within the GOP ranks, making 346 campaign appearances, raising $10.5 million for candidates and donating another nearly $1.5 million to their races. He directed most of his donations in the final month of the campaign to races in Iowa and New Hampshire.

McCain Tells Conservatives G.O.P.'s Defeat Was Payback For Losing 'Our Principles' (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17 — Senator John McCain said Thursday that Republicans had lost the midterm elections because "we abandoned our principles" on fiscal policy and government restraint, inviting a backlash from Americans over what they saw as widespread hypocrisy.

Mr. McCain — in back-to-back speeches delivered on the day he formally created his presidential exploratory committee — portrayed the election result as deserved punishment of Republicans for their performance in office, rather than an affirmation of the Democratic Party. Speaking to two conservative audiences still reeling from the Republicans' losses of the House and Senate, he said Republicans could recover from the election but only if they took lessons from the results.

"Hypocrisy, my friends, is the most obvious of political sins — and the people will punish it," said Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona. "We were elected to reduce the size of government and enlarge the sphere of free and private initiative. We increased the size of government in the false hope that we could bribe the public into keeping us in office.

"We lost our principles and our majority," he said. "And there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first."

The speeches were what aides described as the start of a new phase in Mr. McCain's likely try for the presidency, though he will make a formal decision on whether to run next year. The addresses, amounting to a sharp repudiation of his own party as well as an unambiguous embrace of conservative ideology, come as Republicans debate what lessons should be drawn from the defeat.

Mr. McCain, speaking here to the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group, said the outcome did not represent a rejection of "our values and governing philosophy."

"On the contrary, I think they rejected us because they felt we had come to value our incumbency over our principle," he said. "And partisanship, from both parties, was no longer a contest of ideas, but an ever cruder and uncivil brawl over the spoils of power.

"Americans had elected us to change government, and they rejected us because they believed government had changed us," he said. "We must spend the next two years reacquainting the public and ourselves with the reason we came to office in the first place: to serve a cause greater than our self-interest."

One of Mr. McCain's political tasks as he considers a presidential campaign has been to reinforce his standing with conservatives. Mr. McCain has found himself at odds with conservative leaders in opposing the call for immigration measures to prevent illegal immigrants from attaining citizenship.

In his talks, to the Federalist Society and to Gopac, a conservative political action committee, Mr. McCain addressed a subject that has distressed many conservatives about Republicans — the galloping deficit and increases in spending.

"Last year, a Republican Congress passed a highway bill with 6,371 special projects costing the taxpayers 24 billion dollars," he said at Gopac, drawing light applause. "Those and other earmarks passed by a Republican Congress included $50 million for an indoor rainforest, $500,000 for a teapot museum; $350,000 for an Inner Harmony Foundation and Wellness Center; and of course, as you all know, $223 million for a bridge to nowhere. I didn't see these projects in the fine print of the Contract with America, and neither did the voters."

But Mr. McCain also used the talks to reiterate his position on Iraq, urging Washington not to take the wrong lesson from the election, and arguing that the way to success was through increased troop strength.

"In no other time are we more morally obliged to speak the truth to our country, as we best see it, than in a time of war," he said. "So let me say this, without additional combat forces we will not win this war."

"As troubling as it is, I can ask a young marine to go back to Iraq," he said. "What I cannot do is ask him to return to Iraq, to risk life and limb, so that we might delay our defeat for a few months or a year. That is more to ask than patriotism requires."

Mr. McCain was not without humor on Thursday. "In the words of Chairman Mao," he said, "it's always darkest before it's totally black." His audience laughed.

McCain Prepares For '08 Bid With Appeal To Right (WP)

By Dan Balz

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) took the first formal steps toward a 2008 presidential campaign yesterday and used a pair of speeches before Republican audiences to argue that his brand of conservative, reform-minded politics and hawkish foreign policy can restore the GOP to power.

On the day when he filed papers to set up a 2008 presidential exploratory committee, McCain served notice to rivals for the GOP nomination that he intends to move aggressively to put his stamp on a party that is rebuilding after losing the House and the Senate in last week's midterm elections.

The former Vietnam prisoner of war, 70, said voters punished Republicans last week for having become intoxicated with power. He urged a return to what he called the common-sense conservative principles espoused by President Ronald Reagan. "Americans had elected us to change government, and they rejected us because they believed government had changed us," he said.

McCain also defended his call for sending more troops to Iraq, a position that puts him at odds with the public and, so far, with President Bush and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the U.S. Central Command and the overall commander of U.S. forces in Iraq. "Without additional combat forces, we will not win this war," McCain said.

McCain cited Reagan frequently as the guidepost for the future of the party. In contrast, he never mentioned Bush by name, although he was implicitly critical of the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. By choosing two conservative audiences for his first major post-election speeches, McCain demonstrated his desire to mend relations with the right, which helped deny him the nomination in 2000.

McCain's moves yesterday were the latest evidence suggesting that the 2008 presidential campaign will accelerate to warp speed earlier than in any other period in recent history. Last week, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani formed a presidential exploratory committee, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) filed a statement of candidacy. Vilsack said he will formally launch his campaign later this month.

Other prospective candidates are moving quickly. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), identified by polls as the early leader for the Democratic nomination, said publicly this week she will begin to weigh a run for the White House. Last month, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said for the first time that he will consider running, and has been calling into New Hampshire and casting about for possible staff members in the event that he decides to run.

Many other Democrats are close to a decision, among them the party's 2004 presidential and vice presidential nominees, Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.). The others include Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), as well as New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

On the Republican side, outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney has been nearly as systematic as McCain in beginning to organize support in states -- such as Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Michigan -- that will hold early primaries or caucuses in 2008. The McCain and Romney camps have been watching one another's moves closely, but the decision by Giuliani to set up an exploratory committee has complicated the strategies of both.

Other Republicans, including former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), outgoing Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, outgoing New York Gov. George E. Pataki and retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) have signaled that they, too, are weighing candidacies.

All are driven to move quickly in part by the formidable fundraising requirements of the coming campaign, which advisers to several prospective candidates said will mean raising $1 million a week during the next year for the most ambitious.

The demands of the primary and caucus calendar and the relatively crowded fields in both parties have also forced nearly all prospective candidates to start building staffs and engaging in the debate over the future of their party. Many spent much of the past year laying their campaigns' foundation.

McCain advisers likened yesterday's speeches -- to the GOPAC political action committee and the Federalist Society -- to an address Reagan delivered in 1977 after the Democrats won the White House and GOP fortunes appeared to ebb.

Asked why McCain has joined the debate now, one of his top advisers, Rick Davis, said: "It didn't take a rocket scientist a month ago to say there's going to be a problem on Election Day, and we need to act quickly on that. Politics abhors a vacuum, and so do we. . . . Why not try to focus the party back on its core principles?"

McCain asserted before both conservative audiences that last week's elections were neither a setback for conservatism nor an affirmation of the Democratic Party's philosophy.

"I think they rejected us because they felt we had come to value our incumbency over our principles, and partisanship, from both parties, was no longer a contest of ideas but an even cruder and uncivil brawl over the spoils of power," he said. "I am convinced that a majority of Americans still consider themselves conservatives or right of center. They still prefer common-sense conservatism to the alternative."

McCain invoked President Theodore Roosevelt in calling on Republicans to take the lead in reforming the capital's spending and lobbying practices.

On lobbying, he said: "Let's ban all gifts from lobbyists to lawmakers and keep lobbyists off the floors of the House and Senate."

McCain said public frustration with the war contributed to the GOP's losses. "We're in one heck of a mess in Iraq," he said, "and the American people told us loud and clear last week that they are not happy with the course of this war. Neither am I. But let's be clear: That's the limit of what they told us about Iraq and the war on terrorism."

He said the United States has made "a great many mistakes in this war, and history will hold us to account for them just as the voters did last week." Defeat would be "a catastrophe," he said.

McCain has spent much of the year courting many of Bush's fundraisers and supporters and trying to reassure conservatives he is one of them, even if he has been at odds with them on some issues. He defended his participation in the bipartisan "Gang of 14" compromise in the Senate, saying that compromise helped ensure the confirmation of many of Bush's judicial nominees.

McCain Says GOP Needs To Recover 'Lost' Principles (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Sen. John McCain yesterday said a majority of voters are still conservative and added the Republican Party must return to basic principles of limited government in order to recapture their support.

"We increased the size of government in the false hope that we could bribe the public into keeping us in office. And the people punished us," the Arizona Republican said. "We lost our principles and our majority, and there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first."

He also said last week's elections, in which Republicans lost control of the House and Senate, were not an endorsement of Democratic ideas, nor of an isolationist approach to foreign policy.

He called the war in Iraq "one heck of a mess," and said voters showed they were unhappy with the way it was being fought, "but let's be clear. That's the limit of what they told us about Iraq and the war on terrorism."

"They didn't tell us to forget the sacrifices of our soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan or to choose a course that would imperil their mission," he said.

Mr. McCain took the first step this week toward a 2008 presidential run by establishing an exploratory committee, and delivered two major speeches yesterday -- one to GOPAC, a Republican political action committee, and the other to the Federalist Society, a group of conservative lawyers.

Speaking to the Federalist Society, which has been active in the battles over President Bush's judicial nominees, Mr. McCain praised Mr. Bush's picks for federal judgeships.

He also said the standard for evaluating judges is that their decisions "must rest on more than his subjective conviction that he is right or his eagerness to address a perceived social ill."

He praised former Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and both of Mr. Bush's picks for the Supreme Court: Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Associate Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The senator said he was "proud of my role" in the "Gang of 14," the group of seven Republican senators and seven Democrats that banded together to head off a final showdown over judges on the Senate floor.

The seven Republicans agreed to oppose the "nuclear option" on judges, which Republican leaders had sought as a way to end filibusters on judicial nominees, in exchange for the seven Democrats pledging to forgo filibusters on all but the most extreme judges.

Mr. McCain said he wanted to preserve the filibuster option for future times, but also said the deal struck by the 14 senators has helped to push through some of Mr. Bush's more contentious nominees.

"President Bush now has a higher percentage of his nominations confirmed to both the district courts and the circuit courts than did President Clinton during his presidency," the senator said.

Mr. McCain was introduced at the Federalist Society by Theodore B. Olson, the former solicitor general and a leading conservative lawyer, who gave a seven-minute testimonial to Mr. McCain's "patriotism, character and integrity."

The senator drew a standing ovation at the beginning and at the end of his remarks.

RNC Denies Offering Chairmanship To Steele (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The Republican National Committee this week said it never offered Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "a specific role" at the committee after his unsuccessful campaign for the U.S. Senate.

Many conservatives were surprised this week when, after reports that some leading Republicans favored Mr. Steele to succeed Ken Mehlman as chairman of the RNC, the White House leaked word to news agencies that President Bush would back Florida Sen. Mel Martinez for the top post at the committee.

The Washington Times reported Nov. 10 that Mr. Mehlman would not seek a second two-year term as RNC chairman in January and that Mr. Steele had been offered a Cabinet or top RNC post in recognition of his hard-fought Senate campaign that ended in defeat on Nov. 7.

The Times on Wednesday asked the White House, the RNC and Mr. Steele whether, as the paper also had reported, anyone from the administration or RNC had told Mr. Steele or any of his aides that he was not a "team player" because he had talked to The Times about the jobs in question and that those jobs could be withheld in retaliation.

RNC spokeswoman Tracy Schmidt on Wednesday declined to respond to the questions.

But an RNC official who insisted on anonymity said, "Ken Mehlman is a big fan and believer in Michael Steele, but at no point did he approach him about the specific role of RNC chairman."

Mr. Steele told The Times on Wednesday that neither White House adviser Karl Rove nor Mr. Mehlman "offered me formally" any job.

"I got calls from various state party chairmen and national committee members to take the chairman's post on Thursday and Friday of last week," Mr. Steele said. "I told them, 'This is clearly a White House decision. We'll just have to wait to see what the White House decides.' This isn't something I actively pursued. It grew up out of the grass roots."

Mr. Steele said he was "surprised after the election when I ... saw this blog about me succeeding Ken Mehlman, that I was being considered for the job."

"I said, 'Wow, I didn't know that,' " Mr. Steele said.

In any case, he said, "all this is moot now. The president has made his decision, and I am a team player."

The Times reported Tuesday that four potential 2008 Republican presidential contenders -- including Arizona Sen. John McCain and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- had called Mr. Steele to urge him to take the RNC post, but only if he won an ironclad agreement to be free to run the RNC so as to further the party's interests rather than take orders from Mr. Rove.

Former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III thought he had such an agreement with the White House but was ousted as Republican national chairman after a short time in office during Mr. Bush's first term because Mr. Gilmore had failed to staff the RNC with operatives from the Bush-Cheney 2000 presidential campaign.

The RNC, which meets in January, is expected to rubber-stamp the White House's choice of Mr. Martinez to become general chairman of the RNC while retaining his Senate seat. The RNC's general counsel, Mike Duncan, would handle day-to-day operations.

"I support the president's decision, and in January the party will vote on it," Mr. Steele told The Times on Wednesday. "I'm fine with Mel Martinez. I called him ... and congratulated him and offered to help in any way I can."

The choice of Mr. Martinez was widely interpreted as a signal of a renewed White House push to promote passage of its plan to offer amnesty to illegal aliens, which Mr. Martinez sponsored in the Senate, but which was blocked by conservative Republicans in the House. During his Senate race, Mr. Steele had campaigned against such an amnesty.

Mr. Steele, who would have become the first black RNC chairman, denied that he or anyone on his campaign or lieutenant governor's staff had been scolded by anyone from the White House or the committee as "not being a team player" because he had allowed himself to be interviewed by The Times. However, a senior Steele aide had confided the contrary to The Times.

Mr. Rove did not respond on the record to questions from The Times about Mr. Steele or about any discussions with him about posts at the RNC or in the Cabinet or whether he thought Mr. Steele was competent to run an agency or department in the federal government.

"We never speculate about personnel matters," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino told The Times.

Aides To DeLay Replacement Clean Files And Quit (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 16 (AP) — Representative Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, who was elected to finish the term of Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, has asked Congress to investigate the destruction of files in her office by former staff members of Mr. DeLay.

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, a Republican like Mr. DeLay, said the employees walked out on Tuesday, resigning en masse. The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported that they did not like the way she was treating them.

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs said Thursday, just three days after being sworn in, that seven employees in her Washington office and the district office in Stafford, Tex., outside Houston, “deleted records and files without my knowledge or permission” before quitting.

A spokeswoman, Lisa Dimond, told The Associated Press that the congresswoman had not yet gotten a response to her request for an investigation.

David James, former deputy chief of staff for Mr. DeLay, released a statement Thursday saying that the computers in the office were “scrubbed and reconfigured” according to House rules on transition between members.

“The staff members have a combined thirty-plus years of experience working on the Hill,” Mr. James wrote. “Never has any member of Congress treated us with as much disrespect and unprofessionalism as we witnessed during those five days.”

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs has raised eyebrows on Capitol Hill, largely because of the resignations. Earlier, she told reporters she planned to resolve such thorny issues as tax cuts, immigration reform and the Iraq war — all in less than two weeks of a lame-duck Congress.

DeLay Successor Seeks Inquiry Into Missing Computer Files (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Just when it seemed things could get no stranger regarding the House seat once held by Texas Republican Tom DeLay, his successor called for an investigation into missing computer records last night, and an aide accused her of "disrespect and unprofessionalism."

Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R-Tex.), who is warming the 22nd District seat for only a few weeks, said that former DeLay employees apparently deleted the office's computer files shortly before they walked out, en masse, on Tuesday.

The records dated from her assumption of the office Nov. 8 and did not involve matters related to the former majority leader, Sekula-Gibbs said in an interview in her unadorned office in the Cannon Building. Those who erased the records, she said in a statement, "have harmed the 22nd congressional district" and "brought shame to this office." She has asked for an investigation.

David James, DeLay's former chief of staff, who stayed to work for Sekula-Gibbs -- until Tuesday's walkout -- said last night that the office computers "were scrubbed and reconfigured by an outside vendor in the days immediately prior to her assuming office," as House policies require. The new congresswoman was given a copy of everything "electronically or in hard copy, or both," James said in a statement.

DeLay, facing indictment in Texas, resigned from his House seat in June, triggering two elections on Nov. 7 in his Houston area district. The first, won by Sekula-Gibbs, was a special election to complete his term in the 109th Congress, which will adjourn next month. The other, won by Democrat Nick Lampson, is for the full two-year term of the 110th Congress, which convenes in January.

Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist, arrived for Congress's lame-duck session with ambitions for funding a fence along the Mexican border, making a number of tax cuts permanent and achieving other goals that may or may not be possible in the handful of appropriations bills on Congress's plate.

She also invited President Bush and Vice President Cheney to her swearing-in, prompting titters among some GOP staffers. Yesterday she said the invitations were a courtesy and "it's absurd to think that I thought they would come."

James and half a dozen other former DeLay staffers were on board to help Sekula-Gibbs finish the 109th Congress's business. But they abruptly left their posts Tuesday, during her open house celebration. Sekula-Gibbs said she has no idea why they left. But James said in his statement: "Never has any member of Congress treated us with as much disrespect and unprofessionalism as we witnessed during those five days."

Earlier in the day, James had briefly returned to the office to turn in his House identification badge, a key and his laptop computer, along with a sergeant-at-arms receipt acknowledging their return. Sekula-Gibbs was out of the office, and James quickly left.

GOP Can't Lose Latinos (LAT)

By Tamar Jacoby

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

ACROSS THE NATION, Republicans are asking what they did wrong in the 2006 midterms. This is a question with many answers. But few missteps were more foolish — and few will be harder to correct — than those made with Latino voters. The appointment this week of Cuban-born Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida to chair the Republican National Committee is a good way to make a new start. But the damage done in the last year goes deeper than symbolism, and it will take more than one appointment to undo it.

Republicans have, of course, long been divided about Latinos — split between those who "get it" and those who don't. President Bush was the most prominent Republican who got it, though he was hardly alone. Arnold Schwarzenegger, Rudy Giuliani, George Pataki and others have long understood the GOP's inherent appeal for the fastest-growing voting bloc in the country. In a national poll last month, 34% of Latinos called themselves conservative, 29% moderate and only 24% liberal.

Diverse as they can be in origin and outlook, on many issues — abortion, homosexuality, education, homeownership, small-business concerns and Iraq — Latinos tend to line up with Republicans. And though Democrats have been wooing these voters longer and have won the lifetime loyalties of many in the second and third generations, immigrants have been up for grabs — and for more than 10 years now Republicans have been making a hard run at them.

That effort was working pretty well. Between 1996 and 2004, Bush and Karl Rove managed to double the percentage of Latinos voting Republican in presidential elections: up from 21% for Bob Dole to a whopping 44% for Bush two years ago. Other Republicans across the country were making similar inroads. In 2004, Bush advisor Matthew Dowd said that in the years ahead, the GOP would have to keep its share above 40% if it wanted to remain the majority party.

But that scenario failed to account for the Republicans who didn't get it — and in the last year or so these naysayers have destroyed everything Bush built. Republican hard-liners in the House refused to enact the president's immigration reform. They passed a bill making felons of illegal immigrants, not because it was good law but merely to make a political point. They spent recent months demagoguing the immigration issue, first at a series of "field hearings" in their districts and then on the campaign trail, casting newcomers as terrorists and criminals and anyone who seemed to side with them as un-American.

The problem was as much about tone as substance — many Latinos are also worried about illegal immigration. But the hard-liners' grandstanding added up, and there was no mistaking the message: Not only illegal immigrants but 30 million Latino voters heard Republicans saying, "We don't like you." The results were hardly surprising. Last week, Latinos voted 70% to 29% in favor of Democrats. And it could be argued that this shift is what decided the election. According to exit polls, white voters were split more or less evenly between the two parties, with Latinos, Asians and blacks making the difference on election night.

The question is what happens now. Does the wing of the GOP that made the mistake see it? Conservative bloggers are urging Republicans in exactly the wrong direction, arguing against all evidence that the midterms were a vote against immigration and that any compromise with Democrats on this issue would be a betrayal of the party. But even if the GOP ignores this bad advice, the party has plenty of damage to repair.

The issue isn't just immigration but the way the hard-liners' stance has been so offensive, even to Latinos who agree with them about the need for a secure border. It's about whether you see Latinos as "us" or "them." It's about what kinds of innuendo you use in making your case. It's about whether or not you're imagining a shared future, and how constructively you're planning for it. Republican naysayers fail on all counts. Latinos sense it. And as a consequence, most can no longer hear the GOP even on issues on which they agree with the party.

Even without further immigration, Latino political muscle is expected to explode in coming years as newcomers become citizens and their children come of age. Already in 2008, four of the most heavily Latino states — Florida, New Mexico, Arizona and Nevada — are expected to be critical battlegrounds. And what Latino voters ultimately need — what would serve them and serve the nation — is competition between the two parties to make policy that helps them succeed as Americans: economic policy, education policy, assimilation policy and policy to ensure opportunity. But that competition can't even take place — Latinos can't be expected to give the Republican case a hearing — until the party digs itself out of the hole it has dug itself into.

Immigration is the place to start undoing the damage. But it's going to be a long, uphill walk.

Michael Moore's Pledge (LAT)

By Michael Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

I WOULD LIKE TO extend an olive branch. Those of you who consider yourselves conservative and usually vote Republican have not had a very good couple of weeks. Trust me, I know how this feels.

In fact, those of us on the other side of the fence don't really know what it's like to win, so if we seem a bit awkward right now (were we supposed to vote for the majority leader the speaker said to vote for, or stick to our promise to the other guy?), forgive us.

I know you are dismayed at the results of last week's election. You've got to be freaking out about what this bunch of tree-hugging, latte-sipping, men-kissing-men advocates will do now that the country is in our hands. I don't blame you. We'd never admit it, but we secretly admire you because you know how to chop down a tree, take your coffee black and enjoy watching women kissing women. Good on you!

What I don't want is for you to drop into the deep funk we liberals have been in for two-plus decades. Yes, your Republican revolution is over, but hang in there. And do not despair. I, and the millions who voted for Democrats, have no interest in revenge for the last 12 years. In fact, let me make 12 promises as to how we will treat you, the minority, in the coming years.

Thus, here is "A Liberal's Pledge to Disheartened Conservatives":

1) We will always respect you. We will never, ever, call you "unpatriotic" simply because you disagree with us. In fact, we encourage you to dissent and disagree with us.

2) We will let you marry whomever you want (even though some among us consider your Republican behavior to be "different" or "immoral"). Who you marry is none of our business. Love, and be in love — it's a wonderful gift.

3) We will not spend your grandchildren's money on our personal whims or to enrich our friends. It's your checkbook too, and we will balance it for you.

4) When we soon bring our sons and daughters home from Iraq, we will bring your sons and daughters home too. We promise never to send your kids off to war based on some amateur Power Point presentation cooked up by men who have never been to war.

5) When we make America the last Western democracy to have universal health coverage, and all Americans are able to get help when they fall ill, we promise that you too will be able to see a doctor, regardless of your ability to pay. And when stem cell research delivers treatments and cures for diseases that afflict you and your loved ones, we'll make sure those advances are available to you and your family too.

6) When we clean up our air and water, you too will be able to breathe the cleaner air and drink the purer water. When we put an end to global warming, you will no longer have to think about buying oceanfront property in Yuma.

7) Should a mass murderer ever kill 3,000 people on our soil, we will devote every single resource to tracking him down and bringing him to justice. Immediately. We will protect you.

8) We will never stick our nose in your bedroom or your womb. What you do there as consenting adults is your business. We will continue to count your age from the moment you were born, not the moment you were conceived.

9) We will not take away your hunting guns. If you need an automatic weapon or a handgun to kill a bird or a deer, then you really aren't much of a hunter and you should, perhaps, take up another sport. In the meantime, we will arm the deer to make it a fairer fight.

10) When we raise the minimum wage, we will raise it for your employees too. They will use that money to buy more things, which means you will get the money back! And when women are finally paid what men make, we will pay conservative women that wage too.

11) We will respect your religious beliefs, even when you don't practice those beliefs. In fact, we will actively seek to promote your most radical religious beliefs ("Blessed are the peacemakers," "Love your enemies," "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" and "Whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me"). We will let people in other countries know that God doesn't just bless America, he blesses everyone. We will discourage religious intolerance and fanaticism — starting here at home.

12) We will not tolerate politicians who are corrupt and break the law. And we promise you we will go after the corrupt politicians on our side first. If we fail to do this, we need you to call us on it. Simply because we are in power does not give us the right to turn our heads the other way when our party goes astray. Please perform this important duty as the loyal opposition.

I promise all of the above to you because this is your country too. You are every bit as American as we are. We are all in this together. We sink or swim as one. Thank you for your years of service to this country and for giving us the opportunity to see if we can make things a bit better for our 300 million fellow Americans — and for the rest of the world.

Now pull yourself together and let's go have a Frappuccino.

Justice Recalls Treats Laced With Poison (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — A discussion of recent threats to judges' safety, at a bar association conference in suburban Dallas last week, became startlingly specific when Sandra Day O'Connor, the retired Supreme Court justice, recounted that each justice had received in the mail "a wonderful package of home-baked cookies" that contained "enough poison to kill the entire membership of the court."

Justice O'Connor's remarks were reported on Thursday in The Star-Telegram in Fort Worth.

Although the episode was not publicly disclosed when it occurred in April 2005, it had a public, although little-noticed, denouement last month when the sender of the poisoned cookies was sentenced in federal court here to 15 years in prison.

The sender, Barbara Joan March of Bridgeport, Conn., pleaded guilty to 14 counts of "mailing injurious articles." The 14 recipients included the nine justices; the chiefs of staff of the Army, Navy, and Air Force; and the director and deputy director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The packages, containing either candy or baked goods, were laced with rat poison.

All mail received at the Supreme Court is screened, and the tainted packages never reached the justices, said Kathleen Arberg, the court's public information officer. The danger posed by the packages was immediately apparent. Each contained a typewritten letter stating either, "I am going to kill you," or, "We are going to kill you," and adding, "This is poisoned."

The letters carried various return addresses of people who had earlier connections with Ms. March, including seven who attended college with her. The F.B.I. determined that Ms. March wrote and sent the letters, typing a number of them on a typewriter at a public library near her home.

Preaching The Gospel Of Small Government (NYT)

By Jason Deparle

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. — Lawrence W. Reed is one of those people with so much passion for an unusual line of work that he invented a new occupation, and it has helped shape the conservative movement from here to the Himalayas.

Mr. Reed runs a conservative think tank school. Twice a year, ideological allies from across the globe travel to his program at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy in Midland, Mich., to study the tricks of the idea-peddling trade. Policy institutes have been central to a national organizing strategy that has long won the right a reputation for savvy, and state-level versions are growing in number and clout.

Pushing causes like lower taxes, less spending and school choice plans, they have offered conservatives a base of influence independent of electoral politics. Indeed, after the Republican losses in the midterm elections, many conservatives said this carefully tended world — of research organizations, single-interest groups, foundations and publications — was vital to the movement's revival.

Mr. Reed has nurtured so many state policy groups that he has been called the movement's Johnny Appleseed. But a competing metaphor is sometimes invoked, that of a restaurant chain. His school is part of an extensive system of support, a national back office of sorts, that allows even policy novices to produce abundant, salable fare.

Consider the experience here in Kentucky, where the Bluegrass Institute for Public Policy Solutions has made enough noise for the state's largest newspaper to call it a "conservative propaganda mill." Its founder, Christopher J. Derry, was a sales executive with no public-policy background when he attended Mr. Reed's school three years ago. He left with access to everything from off-the-shelf speeches and papers to management software.

"This is like a franchise," Mr. Derry said. "I saw that I could recreate what the other state groups are doing."

No one is more central to this replicating effort than Mr. Reed, who combines libertarian ardor with a demeanor so earnest it approaches guilelessness. He said he first felt called to "the liberty movement" as a 12-year-old watching the "The Sound of Music," and was a high school sophomore when he burned his first Soviet flag.

He attributes the Republican losses in last week's election to party's failure to cling to its small-government philosophy and argues the drift shows the need for groups like his. "This underscores the importance of investing in ideas first and foremost, because politicians will almost always disappoint," Mr. Reed said.

From Michigan to Mongolia

As a full-throated advocate of capitalism — the jagged, creative-destructive kind — Mr. Reed says he is used to being called a corporate apologist who would despoil the environment and afflict the poor. But he sees himself as a defender of free markets and free men, claiming among his major role models Thomas Clarkson, a 19th-century British abolitionist whom Mr. Reed regards as the world's first think-tank entrepreneur. "Clarkson championed our movement's overarching principle: If there's anything certain in human affairs, it's that liberty will prevail," he said.

From Midland, Mr. Reed runs Mackinac (pronounced MAK-in-aw), the largest of the right's state-level policy institutes. The center started its training program eight years ago, and it has alumni in nearly every state and 37 countries, from Uruguay to Nepal. Among them was a Mongolian who went on to become prime minister, putting his free-market training to work by privatizing the national herd of yaks.

When the Mackinac Center was founded in 1987, there were just three other conservative state-level policy institutes. Now there are 48, in 42 states, joined in an association called the State Policy Network. At least three former Mackinac presidents are now in the House, Representatives Mike Pence of Indiana, Jeff Flake of Arizona, and Tom Tancredo of Colorado, all Republicans.

Collectively, the groups have pushed for cuts in health and welfare programs, constitutional limits on state spending, and expanded school choice programs. They have opposed what they call burdensome health, safety, and environmental regulations and increases in the minimum wage.

In labeling the institutes (and himself), Mr. Reed prefers the term "free market" over "conservative," since most of the groups stress economics over social issues.

In Colorado, the Independence Institute has been a leading force behind a constitutional spending cap called the Taxpayer Bill of Rights. In Arizona, the Goldwater Institute has championed a school-choice law that sends 22,500 children a year to private schools. The Texas Public Policy Foundation helped pass a law to end what the group said were excessive lawsuits.

"In terms of generating and popularizing ideas, I think they've been very effective," said Carl Helstrom, executive director of the JM Foundation, one of the movement's major donors.

Some critics say the groups' support for unfettered markets promotes a form of social Darwinism.

"Their philosophy encourages selfishness and greed," said Iris J. Lav, who runs the State Fiscal Analysis Initiative, a network of 29 liberal state-level groups organized in part as a countervailing force. "If you have problems, they don't care — just too bad."

Greed is the rare accusation that rankles Mr. Reed.

"They think if you're pushing free markets there must be something in it for you," he said. "It speaks to their ignorance."

Mr. Reed was raised in western Pennsylvania, where his father ran a plumbing-supply store and both parents ignored politics. The persecution of the von Trapp family in "The Sound of Music" grabbed his attention; the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, in 1968, sent him running to his first protest. He was 14.

Academia to Politics

After earning a master's degree at Slippery Rock University of Pennsylvania, he taught economics at Northwood University in Midland, but academia left him restless. In 1982, Mr. Reed, then 29, unsuccessfully ran for Congress and got to know an ambitious state senator named John Engler.

Both were Republicans who thought Michigan needed its own version of the Heritage Foundation, a Washington policy institute that was influencing the Reagan presidency. A few years later, when such a group formed, Mr. Engler helped recruit Mr. Reed to run it.

With $20,000 in seed money, the Mackinac Center was started in 1987 as a bare-bones affair, but quickly proved troublesome to Gov. James J. Blanchard, a Democrat. The Mackinac Center warned that one of Mr. Blanchard's signature programs, the nation's first prepaid college tuition plan, would need a state bailout. Amid fears about its financial health, the program soon suspended enrollment.

After Mr. Engler unseated Mr. Blanchard in 1990, Mackinac had a friend at the top. Acting on the center's advice, Mr. Engler sold a state-owned insurance company for $250 million. But when Mr. Engler created tax breaks to lure businesses to Michigan, Mr. Reed, clinging to his free-market views, attacked them as "corporate welfare."

The Mackinac Center has often battled the Michigan Education Association, a teachers' union. When the union opposed privatizing support services, like school meals and security, a Mackinac employee monitored the union parking lot and discovered that it used private contractors like the ones it was opposing.

"We don't just write papers, we do stakeouts," Mr. Reed said.

Many of the state-level groups were inspired by larger Washington counterparts, like the Cato Institute and the Heritage Foundation. While there are no formal ties, many informal bonds have been formed through overlapping donors, revolving employees and occasional joint projects.

A key supporter of the state-level movement was Thomas A. Roe, a South Carolina industrialist and Heritage Foundation donor who founded the South Carolina Policy Council, and helped finance the other state-level groups. Mr. Roe died in 2000, but the Roe Foundation gives each of the 48 groups annual grants of $15,000 to $30,000.

With a budget of more than $4 million and a staff of 32, the Mackinac Center is more than five times larger than the average state-level institute, some of which consist of little more than a person and a fax machine. Most groups do not disclose donations they receive.

A Culture of Mutual Aid

To maximize the groups' clout, Mr. Roe encouraged them to share their work, and a culture of mutual aid has taken hold. "There's a joke that you don't have to reinvent the wheel, you can steal somebody else's wheel and use it," said Mr. Helstrom, the JM Foundation executive.

Mr. Derry of the Bluegrass Institute has taken that advice to heart. He was working at an asset management firm in 2003 when a Bowling Green tax increase got under his skin. A few months later, he was sitting in Mr. Reed's school, wondering whether to quit his $400,000 job to start a shoestring policy group.

"You're going to have to decide what's more important," Mr. Reed said as the course wound down. "Making a lot of money or championing liberty."

"I was hooked," Mr. Derry said.

He said part of the appeal was the network of groups ready to help. Three conservative foundations offered grants totaling $80,000, but most of what Mr. Derry calls "franchise" help came in other ways.

Mr. Reed has a standard speech he calls the "Seven Principles of Sound Public Policy." Mr. Derry added the words "for Kentucky" and took it on the fund-raising trail. The Evergreen Freedom Foundation, in Olympia, Wash., is known for its guide to paring state budgets. Mr. Derry distributed it under the Bluegrass name. A Maryland paper on excessive lawsuits, republished in North Carolina, gained a third life as "Preparing for Tort Reform in Kentucky."

"People were so helpful, I couldn't believe it," Mr. Derry said. "It jump-started me by a couple of years."

The Bluegrass Institute quickly made a mark by fighting with the state's governor, Ernie Fletcher, a Republican, over a tax plan he called revenue-neutral and Mr. Derry called a tax increase. To make a point about pork-barrel spending, his group sent an intern into the Capitol dressed like a pig.

Depending on one's perspective, the Bluegrass Institute view of liberty can seem either steadfast or extreme. Walking to his car after a recent event, Jim Waters, the policy director at the institute, mentioned how he had recently survived a head-on collision thanks to his car's airbags. A few moments later, describing the institute's priorities, he said the Bluegrass Institute was fighting tougher seat-belt laws, which he called an intrusion on liberty. Car safety laws "did save my life," he conceded when asked about the apparent contradiction.

At an institute event in Bowling Green, an audience member chided the group for opposing efforts to ban smoking in restaurants. "I watched my mother die of cancer," the person said.

"We hate smoking as much as you do," Mr. Derry replied. "But we hate government even more."

The Bluegrass Institute has a budget of about $400,000, but recently laid off a policy analyst, leaving a staff of five. Still, even critics say the group has leveraged modest resources into a growing presence.

"They get airplay," said Susan Weston, a longtime advocate for Kentucky public schools. "They get their op-eds published. They've built an e-mail list."

True to his promise of continuing help, Mr. Reed made a two-day visit to Kentucky last year. Speaking to potential donors in Louisville, he likened Mr. Derry to Benjamin Franklin.

After the event, Mr. Derry marveled once more at all the support he had received.

Mr. Reed said, "You're our comrade in arms."

Mr. Derry, replied, "It's about liberty."

Mr. Reed said, "This is a missionary movement."

How Milton Friedman Changed Economics, Policy And Markets (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

A half century ago, Milton Friedman's advocacy of free markets over government intervention and his prescription for inflation-fighting by central banks were treated as fringe notions by many economists. By the time the Nobel Prize-winning economist died yesterday at the age of 94, his views had helped to reshape modern capitalism.

A diminutive man known for his strong-willed and combative style, Mr. Friedman provided the intellectual foundations for the anti-inflation, tax-cutting and antigovernment policies of President Ronald Reagan and British Prime Minister Margaret

Thatcher and an era of more-disciplined central banking. His ideas helped to end the military draft in the 1970s, gave birth to staple conservative causes such as school vouchers and created the groundwork for new economic views about the Great Depression, unemployment, inflation and exchange rates.

Many of his ideas remain controversial to this day, or carry less weight. Central bankers don't follow his prescriptions for how to implement monetary policy, considering them impractical. And despite his strong advocacy, publicly funded vouchers for students to attend private schools are still rare and researchers struggle to prove their effectiveness. His advocacy of the decriminalization of drugs hasn't been heeded.

But few would argue against the notion that Mr. Friedman -- with highly technical academic papers, popular books and columns, and the ear of powerful politicians -- helped to shift the center of debate in the U.S. and abroad about the proper role of government in managing a nation's economy. His influence spread far afield, from Hong Kong to Chile to Russia and Eastern Europe, and his ideas took root with reformers pushing for privatization and open markets.

"Among economic scholars, Milton Friedman had no peer," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said yesterday. "The direct and indirect influences of his thinking on contemporary monetary economics would be difficult to overstate. Just as important, in his humane and engaging way, Milton conveyed to millions an understanding of the economic benefits of free, competitive markets, as well as the close connection that economic freedoms bear to other types of liberty."

President Bush said, "His work demonstrated that free markets are the great engines of economic development."

Critics said he inspired policies that put millions of people out of work in pursuit of low inflation and demonized almost everything the government did, no matter how beneficial or democratically chosen. "Milton Friedman didn't make a distinction between the big government of the People's Republic of China and the big government of the United States," said James Galbraith, professor of government at the University of Texas and son of the late, liberal economist John Kenneth Galbraith, who often sparred with Mr. Friedman.

"Most Americans have no idea what the science of economics is about. Milton Friedman made economic thought more accessible to more people, and he did it in a simple, straight-forward way that avoided politics and cut to the heart of free market capitalism."

Share your thoughts2 about Mr. Friedman's contributions to American society.

Mr. Friedman, who died of heart failure at home, is survived by his wife, Rose -- whom he met in graduate school and who co-authored many of his books -- his son and daughter.

Mr. Friedman exercised extraordinary influence through his academic work, which is viewed as among the most authoritative in the economics field in the 20th century. He went beyond the role of academic by advising politicians such as Mr. Reagan and Ms. Thatcher and by writing popular books, such as "Capitalism and Freedom" in 1962 and, with his wife, "Free to Choose" in 1979. The latter book was adapted as a television series.

Mr. Friedman was awarded the Nobel Prize for Economic Science in 1976. He was best known for explaining the role of money supply in economic and inflation fluctuations. By managing the amount of money sloshing through a financial system, Mr. Friedman theorized, central banks could control inflation without making costly mistakes.

As with many of his ideas, his prescriptions weren't immediately accepted by central bankers when he advanced them in the 1950s and 1960s. Many economists believed inflation could arise from other factors, such as the influence of unions, corporations or oil-producing countries.

These views were advanced by Mr. Friedman's early mentor and friend, Arthur Burns, Federal Reserve chairman from 1970 to 1978. Mr. Friedman was harshly critical of Mr. Burns's monetary policy, and as inflation rose and unemployment took hold, his own views grew in prominence. By the time he won his Nobel, the unemployment rate had climbed to more than 7% and was on its way to surpassing 10%. The inflation rate, too, had flirted with double-digit levels.

Along with economist Edmund Phelps, this year's Nobel Prize winner, Mr. Friedman in the 1960s also developed the theory that policy makers couldn't maintain low unemployment by permitting higher inflation. The view holds sway at major central banks today, including the Fed, and helped to defeat the inflation of the 1970s and set the stage for the low inflation and low unemployment of the 1990s and today.

It took Paul Volcker, who became Fed chairman in 1979, to put the monetarist theory into practice, adopting money-supply targets that drove interest rates to double digit levels, sent the economy into a deep recession, and ultimately brought inflation down drastically. But unemployment eventually fell as well, proving that Mr. Friedman and Mr. Phelps were right about the absence of a rigid tradeoff between unemployment and inflation.

"That was a victory among many victories," Mr. Phelps said.

While central bankers still accept that inflation is largely a result of money-supply growth, few target the money supply in practice because it is difficult to measure and its relationship to overall spending often shifts.

The Fed stopped setting target ranges for monetary-supply growth in 2000 and has stopped publishing some long-followed data series on money growth. Still, Mr. Bernanke noted in 2003 at a conference on the legacy of Milton and Rose Friedman that the professor's ideas held enormous sway in the field.

"Friedman's monetary framework has been so influential that, in its broad outlines at least, it has nearly become identical with modern monetary theory and practice," Mr. Bernanke said.

His intellectual rigor was matched by a demanding persona. When Mr. Friedman returned reporters' calls, for example, he often called collect. He was also tough on students. Gary Becker, one former student, remembers Mr. Friedman ripped into his dissertation proposal in the early 1950s. Mr. Becker, a University of Chicago professor, went on to win the Nobel himself.

Ultimately, even ideological opponents changed their views about him. "He was the devil figure in my youth," Lawrence Summers, the former Treasury Secretary and nephew of two left-leaning Nobel winners, is quoted saying about Mr. Friedman in the book "Commanding Heights." "Only with time have I come to have large amounts of grudging respect. And with time, increasingly ungrudging respect."

Mr. Friedman was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1912, the fourth child of European immigrants. His mother ran a small retail store and his father "engaged in a succession of mostly unsuccessful 'jobbing' ventures," he wrote in an autobiography on the Web site for the Nobel Prize. "The family income was small and highly uncertain; financial crisis was a constant companion."

Early in his life, he planned to become an actuary. But he emerged after World War II as a strong-viewed young professor at the University of Chicago. At the time, economic thought was dominated by the theories of John Maynard Keynes, who advocated activist government spending to stimulate demand and fix the economy during troubled times, such as the Great Depression of the 1930s. (When asked in 2004 by The Wall Street Journal to name the most important economist of the 20th century besides himself, Mr. Friedman named Mr. Keynes. Read the full Q&A3.)

Mr. Friedman, who had started his studies at Chicago during the Depression, challenged the Keynesian approach, espousing the idea that the government should stay out of individuals' affairs whenever possible, and that markets can solve economic problems much more efficiently than government officials can. His ideas formed the basis for what become known as the "Chicago School" of economics, a concept of free-market capitalism.

Influenced by such earlier free-market thinkers as Friedrich von Hayek, Mr. Friedman -- some of whose relatives died during the Nazi occupation of Eastern Europe -- saw economic and political freedom as inextricably linked. As he wrote in the 1962 text "Capitalism and Freedom," "a society which is socialist cannot be democratic, in the sense of guaranteeing individual freedom."

"No one in the 20th century has had the ideological influence that Milton Friedman has had in moving the economic profession from Great Depression-era do-goodism towards a friendliness toward, and appreciation of, the free market," said Paul Samuelson, a fellow Nobel laureate and frequent ideological opponent of Mr. Friedman. "We've lost a giant in economics."

Mr. Friedman's ideas weren't all laissez-faire. His concept of a "negative income tax" to eliminate poverty, for example, laid the foundation for today's Earned Income Tax Credit.

Mr. Friedman considered his best purely scientific contribution to economics to be his work on how people make spending decisions -- which was based on data he collected while working with future Nobel laureate Simon Kuznets at the National Bureau of Economic Research. Under his "permanent income" theory, people smooth their spending based on what they expect their incomes to be in the long term -- meaning that things such as unexpected tax breaks or other windfalls will have only a limited effect on spending.

He also attacked the system of fixed currency-exchange rates that emerged after World War II with encouragement from Mr. Keynes. George Shultz, a longtime friend of Mr. Friedman who served in both the Nixon and Reagan administrations, says that after Mr. Nixon was elected in 1968 but before he took office, Mr. Friedman wrote to him saying that "pressures on the tie of the dollar to gold are relentless" and that Mr. Nixon would be wise to sever the link immediately as an affirmative action, rather than be forced to. Mr. Friedman "turned out to be right," but Nixon didn't listen "until he was forced to," Mr. Schultz says.

Mr. Nixon abandoned the gold standard in 1971.

By the 1970s, his influence had become substantial. He was a member of the Commission on an All-Volunteer Armed Force, appointed by Mr. Nixon in 1969. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, who was also a member, says that at the outset, panel Chairman Thomas Gates "was very clearly unconvinced that a volunteer army would work. At the end of the commission hearings he was strongly in favor of it, and the main reason was Friedman kept dissuading him on all the concerns he had." Mr. Nixon ended the draft in 1973.

In the 1970s, Mr. Friedman courted controversy for his association with Chile's military government which, after toppling a civilian government in 1973, implemented many free-market and monetarist ideas learned by its advisers who had studied at the University of Chicago. He was widely criticized for meeting with Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, whose government was eventually blamed for murdering and torturing thousands. Mr. Friedman's Nobel Prize ceremony was disrupted by demonstrators.

That same year Mr. Reagan, who had just made an unsuccessful bid for the presidency, noted the demonstrations in a radio address and said, "It seems when Milton Friedman talked, someone in Chile listened. Wouldn't it be nice if just once someone in Washington would ask: 'What did he say?'" In another address, he quoted Mr. Friedman, saying, "When you start paying people to be poor, you wind up with an awful lot of poor people."

One of the paradoxes of Mr. Friedman's immense influence on policy was his low regard for policy making. He often advocated abolition of the Fed for its failures during the Great Depression and the 1970s, though he later relented and admitted Mr. Greenspan had done a remarkable job from 1987-2006. After two years in the Treasury Department during World War II, he never served in government, aside from advisory roles.

Lawrence Lindsey, who served in both Bush presidencies and on the Fed board, recalls telling Mr. Friedman in the early 1990s, "Why don't you come to Washington, we could use you here." Mr. Friedman replied, "I detest that town."

Mr. Friedman once described his refusal to leave academia as necessary to his larger mission: "For society to be at once humane and to give opportunity for great human achievements, it is necessary that a small minority of people who do not have materialistic objectives have the greatest degree of freedom."

Milton Friedman, Free-Market Theorist, Dies At 94 (NYT)

By Holcomb B. Noble

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

Milton Friedman, the grandmaster of free-market economic theory in the postwar era and a prime force in the movement of nations toward less government and greater reliance on individual responsibility, died yesterday. He was 94 and lived in San Francisco.

His death was confirmed by Robert Fanger, a spokesman for the Milton and Rose D. Friedman Foundation in Indianapolis.

Conservative and liberal colleagues alike viewed Mr. Friedman, a Nobel laureate, as one of the 20th century's leading economic scholars, on a par with giants like John Maynard Keynes and Paul Samuelson.

Flying the flag of economic conservatism, Mr. Friedman led the postwar challenge to the hallowed theories of Lord Keynes, the British economist who maintained that governments had a duty to help capitalistic economies through periods of recession and to prevent boom times from exploding into high inflation.

In Mr. Friedman's view, government had the opposite obligation: to keep its hands off the economy, to let the free market do its work. He was a spiritual heir to Adam Smith, the 18th-century founder of the science of economics and proponent of laissez-faire: that government governs best which governs least.

The only economic lever that Mr. Friedman would allow government to use was the one that controlled the supply of money — a monetarist view that had gone out of favor when he embraced it in the 1950s. He went on to record a signal achievement, predicting the unprecedented combination of rising unemployment and rising inflation that came to be called stagflation. His work earned him the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economic Science in 1976.

Rarely, colleagues said, did anyone have such impact on his own profession and on government. Though he never served officially in the halls of power, he was around them, as an adviser and theorist.

"Among economic scholars, Milton Friedman had no peer," Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said yesterday. "The direct and indirect influences of his thinking on contemporary monetary economics would be difficult to overstate."

Professor Friedman also fueled the rise of the Chicago School of economics, a conservative group within the department of economics at the University of Chicago. He and his colleagues became a counterforce to their liberal peers at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard, influencing close to a dozen American winners of the Nobel in economics.

It was not only Mr. Friedman's antistatist and free-market views that held sway over his colleagues. There was also his willingness to create a place where independent thinkers could be encouraged to take unconventional stands as long as they were prepared to do battle to support them.

"Most economics departments are like country clubs," said James J. Heckman, a Chicago faculty member and Nobel laureate. "But at Chicago you are only as good as your last paper."

Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chairman, said of Mr. Friedman in an interview Tuesday: "From a longer-term point of view, it's his academic achievements which will have lasting import. But I would not dismiss the profound impact he has already had on the American public's view."

To Mr. Greenspan, Mr. Friedman came along at an opportune time. The Keynesian consensus among economists, he said — one that had worked well from the 1930s — could not explain the stagflation of the 1970s.

But he also said that Mr. Friedman had made a broader political argument: that you have to have economic freedom to have political freedom.

Mr. Friedman had a gift for communicating complicated ideas in simple and lucid ways, and it served him well as the author or co-author of more than a dozen books, as a columnist for Newsweek from 1966 to 1983 and even as the star of a public television series. He was a bridge between the academic and popular worlds, and his broader impact stemmed in large part from the fact that he was preaching a gospel of capitalism that fit neatly into American self-perceptions. He was pushing on an open door.

A Staunch Libertarian

As a libertarian, Mr. Friedman advocated legalizing drugs and generally opposed public education and the state's power to license doctors, car drivers and others. He was criticized for those views, but he stood by them, arguing that prohibiting, regulating or licensing human behavior either does not work or creates inefficient bureaucracies.

Mr. Friedman insisted that unimpeded private competition produced better results than government systems. "Try talking French with someone who studied it in public school," he argued, "then with a Berlitz graduate."

Once, when accused of going overboard in his antistatism, he said, "In every generation, there's got to be somebody who goes the whole way, and that's why I believe as I do."

In the long period of prosperity after World War II, when Keynesian economics was riding high in the West, Mr. Friedman alone warned of trouble ahead, asserting that policies based on Keynesian theory were part of the problem.

Even as he was being dismissed as an economic "flat-earther," he predicted in the 1960s that the end of the boom was at hand. Expect unemployment to grow, he said, and inflation to rise, at the same time. The prediction was borne out in the 1970s. It was Paul Samuelson who labeled the phenomenon stagflation.

Mr. Friedman's analysis and prediction were regarded as a stunning intellectual accomplishment and contributed to his earning the Nobel for his monetary theories. He was also cited for his analyses of consumer savings and of the causes of the Great Depression: he blamed the Federal Reserve, accusing it of bad monetary policy and saying it had bungled early chances for recovery. His prestige and that of the Chicago school soared, and his analysis of the Depression changed the way that the Fed thought about monetary policy.

Government leaders like President Ronald Reagan and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain were heavily influenced by his views. So was the quietly building opposition to communism within the East bloc.

As the end of the century approached, Professor Friedman said events had made his views seem only more valid than when he had first formed them. One event was the fall of communism. In an introduction to the 50th-anniversary edition of Friedrich A. Hayek's book predicting totalitarian consequences from collectivist planning, "The Road to Serfdom," Mr. Friedman wrote it was clear that "progress could be achieved only in an order in which government activity is limited primarily to establishing the framework with which individuals are free to pursue their own objectives."

"The free market is the only mechanism that has ever been discovered for achieving participatory democracy," he said.

Professor Friedman was acknowledged to be a brilliant statistician and logician. To his critics, however, he sometimes pushed his data too far. To them, the debate over the advantages or disadvantages of an unregulated free market was far from over.

Milton Friedman was born in Brooklyn on July 31, 1912, the last of four children and only son of Jeno S. Friedman and Sarah Landau Friedman. His parents worked briefly in New York sweatshops, then moved their family to Rahway, N.J., where they opened a clothing store.

Mr. Friedman's father died in his son's senior year at Rahway High School. Young Milton later waited on tables and clerked in stores to supplement a scholarship he had earned at Rutgers University. He entered Rutgers in 1929, the year the stock market crashed and the Depression began.

Mr. Friedman attributed his success to "accidents": the immigration of his teen-age parents from Czechoslovakia, enabling him to be an American and not the citizen of a Soviet-bloc state; the skill of a high-school geometry teacher who showed him a connection between Keats's "Ode to a Grecian Urn" and the Pythagorean theorem, allowing him to see mathematical beauty; the receipt of a scholarship that enabled him to attend Rutgers and there have Arthur F. Burns and Homer Jones as teachers.

He said Mr. Burns, who later became chairman of the Federal Reserve, instilled in him a passion for scientific integrity and accuracy in economics; Mr. Jones interested him in monetary policy and a graduate school career at Chicago.

In his first economic-theory class at Chicago, he was the beneficiary of another accident — the fact that his last name began with an "F." The class was seated alphabetically, and he was placed next to Rose Director, a master's-degree candidate from Portland, Ore. That seating arrangement shaped his whole life, he said. He married Ms. Director six years later. And she, after becoming an important economist in her own right, helped Mr. Friedman form his ideas and maintain his intellectual rigor.

After he became something of a celebrity, Mr. Friedman said, many people became reluctant to challenge him directly. “They can’t come right out and say something stinks,” he said. “Rose can.”

In 1998, he and his wife published a memoir, “Two Lucky People” (University of Chicago Press), in which they reveled in “having intellectual children throughout the world.”

His wife is among his survivors. They also include a son, David, and a daughter, Janet Martel, four grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

A Fateful Class

That fateful class at the University of Chicago also introduced him to Jacob Viner, regarded as a great theorist and historian of economic thought. Professor Viner convinced Mr. Friedman that economic theory need not be a mere set of disjointed propositions but rather could be developed into a logical and coherent prescription for action.

Mr. Friedman won a fellowship to do his doctoral work at Columbia, where the emphasis was on statistics and empirical evidence. He studied there with Simon Kuznets, another American Nobel laureate. The two turned Mr. Friedman’s thesis into a book, “Income From Independent Professional Practice.” It was the first of more than a dozen books that Mr. Friedman wrote alone or with others.

It was also the first of many “Friedman controversies.” One finding of the book was that the American Medical Association exerted monopolistic pressure on the incomes of doctors; as a result, the authors said, patients were unable to reap the benefits of lower fees from any real price competition among doctors. The A.M.A., after obtaining a galley copy of the book, challenged that conclusion and forced the publisher to delay publication. But the authors did not budge. The book was eventually published, unchanged.

During the first two years of World War II, Mr. Friedman was an economist in the Treasury Department’s division of taxation. “Rose has never forgiven me for the part I played in devising and developing withholding for the income tax,” he said. “There is no doubt that it would not have been possible to collect the amount of taxes imposed during World War II without withholding taxes at the source.

“But it is also true,” he went on, “that the existence of withholding has made it possible for taxes to be higher after the war than they otherwise could have been. So I have a good deal of sympathy for the view that, however necessary withholding may have been for wartime purposes, its existence has had some negative effects in the postwar period.”

After the war, he returned to the University of Chicago, becoming a full professor in 1948 and commencing his campaign against Keynesian economics. Robert M. Solow of M.I.T., a Nobel laureate who often disagreed with Mr. Friedman, called him one of “the greatest debaters of all time.” But his wisecracking style could infuriate opponents.

Mr. Samuelson, also of M.I.T., who was not above wisecracking himself, had a standard line in his economics classes that always brought down the house: “Just because Milton Friedman says it doesn’t mean that it’s necessarily untrue.”

But Professor Samuelson said he never joked in class unless he was serious — that his friend and opponent was, in fact, often right when at first he sounded wrong.

Mr. Friedman’s opposition to rent control after World War II, for example, incurred the wrath of many colleagues. They took it as an unpatriotic criticism of economic policies that had been successful in helping the nation mobilize for war. Later, Mr. Samuelson said, “probably 98 percent of them would agree that he was right.”

In the early 1950s, Mr. Friedman started flogging a “decomposing horse,” as Mrs. Thatcher’s chief economic adviser, Alan Waters, later put it. The horse that most economists thought long dead was the monetarist theory that the supply of money in circulation and readily accessible in banks was the dominant force — or in Mr. Friedman’s view, the only force — that should be used in shaping the economy.

In the 1963 book “A Monetary History of the United States, 1867-1960,” which he wrote with Anna Jacobson Schwartz, Mr. Friedman compiled statistics to buttress his theory that recessions, as well as the Great Depression, had been preceded by declines in the money supply. And it was an oversupply, he argued, that caused inflation.

In the late 1960s, Mr. Friedman used his knowledge of empirical evidence and statistics to calculate that Keynesian government programs had the effect of constantly increasing the money supply, a practice that over time was seriously inflationary.

Paul Krugman, a Princeton University economist and Op-Ed columnist for The New York Times, said Mr. Friedman then managed “one of the decisive intellectual achievements of postwar economics,” predicting the combination of rising unemployment and rising inflation that came to be called stagflation.

In this regard, his Nobel award cited his contribution to the now famous concept “the natural rate of unemployment.” Under this thesis, the unemployment rate cannot be driven below a certain level without provoking an acceleration in the inflation rate. Price inflation was linked to wage inflation, and wage inflation depended on the inflationary expectations of employers and workers in their bargaining.

A spiral developed. Wages and prices rose until expectations came into line with reality, usually at the natural rate of unemployment. Once that rate is achieved, any attempt to drive down unemployment through expansionary government policies is inflationary, according to Mr. Friedman's thesis, which he unveiled in 1968.

For years economists have tried to pinpoint the elusive natural rate, without much success, particularly in recent years.

Mr. Friedman was right on the big economic issue of that time — inflation. And his prescription — to have the governors of the Federal Reserve System keep the money supply growing steadily without big fluctuations — figured in the thinking of policy makers around the world in the 1980s.

A Retort to Kennedy

Mr. Friedman also pursued his attack on Keynesianism in a more general way. He warned that a government allowed to regulate the economy could not be trusted to keep its hands off individual liberties.

He had first been exposed to this line of attack through his association with Mr. Hayek, who was predicting in the early 1940s that communism would lead inevitably to totalitarianism and the crushing of individual rights. In an introduction to a 1971 German edition, Professor Friedman called Mr. Hayek's book "a revelation particularly to the young men and women who had been in the armed forces during the war."

"Their recent experience had enhanced their appreciation of the value and meaning of individual freedom," he wrote.

In 1962, Mr. Friedman took on President John F. Kennedy's popular inaugural exhortation: "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country." In an introduction to his classic book "Capitalism and Freedom," a collection of his writings and lectures, he said President Kennedy had got it wrong: You should ask neither.

"What your country can do for you," Mr. Friedman said, implies that the government is the patron, the citizen the ward; and "what you can do for your country" assumes that the government is the master, the citizen the servant. Rather, he said, you should ask, "What I and my compatriots can do through government to help discharge our individual responsibilities, to achieve our several goals and purposes, and above all protect our freedom."

It was not that Mr. Friedman believed in no government. He is credited with devising the negative income tax, which in a modern variant — the earned-income tax credit — increases the incomes of the working poor. He also argued that government should give the poor vouchers to attend the private schools he thought superior to public ones.

In forums he would spar over the role of government with his more liberal adversaries, including John Kenneth Galbraith, who was also a longtime friend (and who died in April 2006). The two would often share a stage, presenting a study in contrasts as much visual as intellectual: Mr. Friedman stood 5 feet 3; Mr. Galbraith, 6 feet 8.

Though he had helped ignite the conservative rebellion after World War II, together with intellectuals like Russell Kirk, William F. Buckley Jr. and Ayn Rand, Mr. Friedman had little or no influence on the administrations of Presidents Dwight D. Eisenhower, Kennedy, Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon. President Nixon, in fact, once described himself as a Keynesian.

It was frustrating period for Mr. Friedman. He said that during the Nixon years the talk was still of urban crises solvable only by government programs that he was convinced would make things worse, or of environmental problems produced by "rapacious businessmen who were expected to discharge their social responsibility instead of simply operating their enterprises to make the most profit."

Rising With Reagan

But then, after the 1970s stagflation, with Keynesian tools seemingly broken or outmoded, and with Ronald Reagan headed for the White House, Mr. Friedman's hour arrived. His power and influence were acknowledged and celebrated in Washington.

With his wife, in 1978 he brought out a best-selling general-interest book, "Free to Choose," and went on an 18-month tour, from Hong Kong to Ottumwa, Iowa, preaching that government regulation and interference in the free market was the stifling bane of modern society. The tour became the subject and Mr. Friedman the star of a 10-part PBS series, "Free to Choose," in 1980.

In 1983, having retired from teaching, he became a fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University. Five years later he was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the National Medal of Science.

The economic expansion in the 1980s resulted from the Reagan administration's lowered tax rates and deregulation, Professor Friedman said. But then the tide turned again. The expansion, he argued, was halted when President George H. W. Bush imposed a "reverse-Reaganomics" tax increase.

What was worse, by the mid-1980s, as the finance and banking industries began undergoing upheavals and money began shifting unpredictably, Mr. Friedman's own monetarist predictions — of what would happen to the economy and inflation as a result of specific increases in the money supply — failed to hold up. Confidence in his monetarism theory waned.

Prof. Robert Solow of M.I.T., a Nobel laureate himself, and other liberal economists continued to raise questions about Mr. Friedman's theories: Did not President Reagan, and by extension Professor Friedman, they asked, revert to Keynesianism once in power?

"The boom that lasted from 1982 to 1990 was engineered by the Reagan administration in a straightforward Keynesian way by rising spending and lowered taxes, a classic case of an expansionary budget deficit," Mr. Solow said. "In fairness to Milton, however, it should be said that one of the reasons for his wanting a tax reduction was to force the spending cuts that he presumed would follow." Professor Samuelson said that "Milton Friedman thought of himself as a man of science but was in fact more full of passion than he knew."

Mr. Friedman remained the guiding light to American conservatives. It was he, for example, who provided the economic theory behind "prescriptions for action," as his onetime professor, Jacob Viner, put it, like the landslide Republican victory in the off-year Congressional elections of 1994.

By then Professor Friedman had grown into a giant of economics abroad as well. He was sharply criticized for his role in providing intellectual guidance on economic matters to the military regime in Chile that engineered a coup in the early 1970s against the democratically elected president, Salvador Allende. But for Mr. Friedman that was just a bump in the road.

In Vietnam, where the Constitution was amended in 1986 to guarantee the rights of private property, the writings of Mr. Friedman were circulated at the highest levels of government. "Privatize," he told Chinese scholars at a meeting at Fudan University in Shanghai; and he told those in Moscow and elsewhere in Eastern Europe: "Speed the conversion of state-run enterprises to private ownership." They did.

Mr. Friedman had long since ceased to be called a flat-earther by anyone. "What was really so important about him," said W. Allen Wallis, a former classmate and later faculty colleague at the University of Chicago, "was his tremendous basic intelligence, his ingenuity, perseverance — his way of getting to the bottom of things, of looking at them in a new way."

Nobel Winner Milton Friedman Dies At 94 (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Milton Friedman, a brilliant champion of free-market economics and individual freedom who almost single-handedly altered the boundaries of public debate on an array of national issues, died today in San Francisco. He was 94.

The circumstances of his death were not immediately available.

"America has lost a true visionary and advocate for human freedom," said Gordon St. Angelo, president and CEO of the Milton and Rose D. Friedman Foundation.

"Milton's passion for freedom and liberty has influenced more lives than he ever could possibly know. His writings and ideas have transformed the minds of U.S. presidents, world leaders, entrepreneurs and freshmen economic majors alike."

Friedman was considered a leading economic thinker of the 20th century. His many prescriptions for policy, notably on managing the nation's money supply and curbing the welfare state, influenced presidents and presidential candidates dating back to the 1960s. His sweeping, pro-capitalist ideas earned him legions of followers domestically and overseas, while also sparking dissent and controversy.

Friedman was awarded the Nobel Prize in economics in 1976 for a body of "original and weighty work," including his money supply research, which jurors said had influenced fellow scholars as well as the U.S. Federal Reserve and the central banks of other nations.

Friedman's influence extended far beyond the ivory tower. He became an economist-celebrity, promoting his passionate beliefs in books, magazines and television appearances. With confidence and a professor's logic, he sought to demolish the conventional wisdom after World War II that government must play a sweeping role in people's lives.

Taxes, he said, should be cut and simplified. Society benefits when personal choice reigns supreme.

"My world will not be the same," said former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan in a statement today. "He had been a fixture in my life both professionally and personally for half a century."

Ed Crane, president of the Cato Institute, commented today on Friedman's life and legacy: "Here's a guy who won the Nobel Prize in economics for his work in monetary theory and he was a great Chicagoan, a great empiricist and theoretician of economics. But ultimately, what Milton believed in was human liberty and he took great joy in trying to promote that concept.... Milton would say, 'Maybe I did well and maybe I led the battle, but nobody ever said we were going to win this thing at any point in time. Eternal vigilance is required and there have to be people who step up to the plate, who believe in liberty and who are willing to fight for it.' "

Friedman had an uncanny ability to discern issues before most others, framing political battles decades before they flared publicly.

In the 1960s, he argued that personal retirement accounts made more sense than a mandatory system of Social Security, helping set the stage for the recent national debate. Similarly, he contended that parents should be allowed to choose what schools their children attend, laying the foundation for ongoing arguments about school choice.

"Why do America's universities have a greater reputation around the world than its public schools?" he once asked aloud. "You have choice. That makes all the difference in the world."

He emerged as a leading voice in the Vietnam-era movement to end the draft, a position ultimately endorsed by President Richard Nixon.

Friedman offered blunt advice on subjects as personal as laws against prostitution — he saw them as incursions into individual choice — and as sweeping as the international system of relatively fixed exchange rates, which he sought to overturn and which did collapse in the early 1970s.

He became the human face of the influential "Chicago school" of economics, emphasizing the role of monetary policy, which affects interest rates, and the benefits of laissez-faire or free-market approaches to the economy.

Political leaders listened, granting almost unparalleled influence to a capitalist icon whose free-market emphasis had once seemed out of step with his times. The rise of Ronald Reagan and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher brought Friedman fans to seats of national power.

Later, some would see the inspiration of Friedman behind moves of former Soviet governments, the People's Republic of China and other nations to stake more of their future on a private sector.

"At the Harvard University I knew as a graduate student in the late 1960s, Milton Friedman was treated as a right-wing Midwestern crank," said Robert J. Barro, a noted economist, during a 1998 tribute to Friedman at Stanford University. "It is notable that Milton Friedman's transition from pariah to priest was achieved mainly through the force of ideas."

Not all of the ideas found lasting acceptance. The U.S. Federal Reserve, the Bank of England and other central banks abandoned much of his monetary prescription, after brief and unhappy experiments.

After a series of corporate and financial scandals, the Friedman-style mantra for deregulation lost its allure for much of the public. Some of Friedman's social priorities, notably for the legalization of drugs, never caught on.

Friedman acknowledged in a 2003 interview that in hindsight he might not have pushed the technical aspects of his money supply theories so aggressively. Yet he never wavered from the essence of his world view.

"You form a philosophy at a certain stage and for the rest of your life it dominates," he told the Financial Times in June 2003. "On the big issues of policy, I don't think there is anything I've changed my mind about."

To many of his admirers, Friedman will most be remembered for the sweep of a vision that encompassed economic and political freedom and he viewed each as a complement to the other.

"He has used a brilliant mind to advance a moral vision: the vision of a society where men and women are free, free to choose," President Bush said in a May 2002 White House tribute to Friedman. "That vision has changed America and it is changing the world."

Friedman was born in Brooklyn on July 31, 1912, the fourth child in a family of struggling Jewish immigrants from a region that is now part of Ukraine. When he was 13 months old, the family moved to the northern New Jersey town of Rahway.

The household was warm and supportive and childhood was generally happy, Friedman would recall. But money was tight. Friedman's parents engaged in various enterprises with limited success, including a small shop and an ill-fated ice cream parlor. The family lived over the shop.

"Among my most vivid memories are heated discussions between my parents at night about where the money was to come from to pay incoming bills," Friedman recalled in his 1998 memoir, "Two Lucky People," written with wife, Rose.

The youthful Friedman made heavy use of Rahway's small local library -- "almost exhausting the contents" -- and was an enthusiastic Boy Scout. He shined in the classroom, winning an unexpected promotion to seventh grade midway through sixth. Slight of stature — Friedman was about 5"2' as an adult — he played on the chess team and volunteered to do chores for the baseball team.

After graduating, he moved 12 miles away to New Brunswick and entered Rutgers University on a scholarship. Always enterprising, he supplemented the aid by waiting on tables, hustling fireworks, tutoring high school students and clerking in a retail store. Friedman also began fruitful intellectual relationships with two professors: Arthur F. Burns, later to become chairman of the Federal Reserve, and Homer Jones, who lectured students on the importance of individual freedom.

The profession of economics did not beckon at first. Friedman planned to become an actuary, hoping he could use his math skills to earn a decent living. He would later joke that he changed his mind after flunking some difficult actuarial exams. But in an October 2000 PBS interview, Friedman offered a deeper insight into his motives, recalling that he faced a career decision during the depths of the Great Depression.

"If you're a 19-year-old college senior, which is going to be more important to you: figuring out what the right prices ought to be for life insurance or trying to understand how the world got into that kind of a mess?"

Friedman chose to pursue the latter question as a University of Chicago graduate student in 1932.

To a kid who lived over a store in Rahway, the university atmosphere was electrifying, an entree to whole new worlds. Chicago "exposed me to a cosmopolitan and vibrant intellectual atmosphere of a kind that I had never dreamed existed. I have never recovered," Friedman later said.

At Chicago, Friedman also met his future wife, Rose Director, a quiet economics student and European immigrant who had grown up in Portland. They married in 1938.

New worlds continued to open. Over the next several years, Friedman studied economics at Chicago and Columbia University, did a stint on a New Deal economics project in Washington, the National Resources Committee, and went to work for the nonprofit National Bureau of Economic Research in New York.

He would discover that scholarly conclusions can lead to controversy. At the bureau, Friedman worked with an economist, Simon Kuznets, on a study of professional income. Based on their research, Friedman wrote in his doctoral thesis that physicians gained extra income through the powers of the American Medical Assn. to restrict entry into the profession. These same powers, Friedman reported, reduced the availability of medical care for the public.

Columbia University held up accepting Friedman's thesis for five years. "I was young and innocent at the time and did not realize that a storm of protest would develop," Friedman wrote in "Two Lucky People. "I soon learned better."

Meanwhile, Friedman and his future wife corresponded several times a week. Rose had gone to work for the New Deal economics panel in Washington.

A 1938 letter to Rose, then his fiancee, reveals Friedman's frustration that his work seemed removed from the more urgent problems of a world headed for war: "I must say this damn European situation certainly is lousy. Here the world is going to pieces over our heads and we sit worrying about means and standard deviations and professional incomes. But what the hell else can we do?"

After a fierce inner struggle, Friedman agreed on a Jewish wedding in deference to his relatives. The two were married that year in a small ceremony in New York City.

Friedman had not yet arrived at a vehement rejection of tax-and-spending policies as a way to steer the national economy. During World War II, he even went to work for the federal government, advising the Treasury on wartime tax policy and other matters.

There followed a brief stint at the University of Minnesota. Then in 1946 Friedman joined the faculty of the University of Chicago, which would serve as home base for the next 30 years.

Inside the classroom, Friedman gained a reputation as a strict but inspiring teacher who brought principles of economics to life.

"Being a student of Milton's was magic indeed," Gary S. Becker, a 1951 graduate student of Friedman who later would win his own Nobel Prize, recalled years later. "People would always ask me, 'Why are you so excited? Are you going out on a date with a beautiful woman?' I said, 'No, I'm going to a class in economics.'"

Early on, Friedman arrived at one of his famous findings: The Federal Reserve had blundered terribly in the late 1920s and early 1930s, triggering the 1929 stock market crash and deepening the Great Depression through excessive tightness in the money supply. That knowledge, he believed, should protect America from a recurrence.

"In 1953 I gave a talk in Stockholm under the title of 'Why the American Economy is Depression-Proof.' I've been right for 45 years," he told Forbes magazine in 1997. "Why should I change my story now?

"And the reason I said it then is the same reason I say it now: The Great Depression need not have occurred if the monetary authorities had behaved differently."

Other core beliefs that he would forever retain were now taking shape. These included his faith in the efficiency of free markets and an emphasis on the role of the Federal Reserve as the key to economic stability.

Friedman's lifelong views on freedom and personal choice were also emerging in the 1940s and 1950s.

In particular, he was moved by an economics professor named Friedrich Hayek, whose intellectual attacks on socialism galvanized a small group of true-believers under the banner of "liberalism."

At the time, mainstream Democrats and Republicans assumed the federal government would retain a huge, ambitious role throughout society, serving as an equalizer for the disadvantaged and softening the sharp edges of a Darwinian marketplace. John Maynard Keynes, an eminent British economist, emerged as the intellectual symbol of the prevailing view.

Friedman set out to provide an alternative. In 1962, Friedman published "Capitalism and Freedom," a widely read primer on his anti-government convictions, containing thoughts on monetary policy, public education, welfare and poverty. He blasted the Social Security program for restricting people's options in saving for retirement, pushed for a single-rate, "flat" tax to replace the more complex system of multiple brackets, and called for an end to professional licensing boards.

The following year he published what many consider his scholarly masterpiece, an 800-page "Monetary History of the United States," written with economist Anna Schwartz. It provided detailed evidence for his monetarist view that careful growth of the money supply was the paramount factor in sustaining economic growth.

In the 1964 presidential campaign, Friedman stepped directly into the political battlefield.

Lyndon Johnson, the Democratic incumbent, advocated a Keynes-style Great Society of ambitious federal programs. Sen. Barry Goldwater, the conservative Republican nominee, was drawn to Friedman's policies and picked the economist as an advisor.

Johnson won in a landslide. But Friedman stayed at the forefront of the policy struggle, soon beginning a Newsweek column that provided him a forum for his ideas on taxes, red tape, import restrictions, the Federal Reserve and many other matters.

Although many took offense at Friedman's anti-government views, his ideas did not fall into a tidy framework.

His push to decriminalize drug use found little support among many conservatives. His advocacy of school vouchers, which he viewed as essential to giving poor children a better chance to attend quality schools, was greeted with disdain by many liberals. His opposition to most of government beyond matters of security made him a hero to libertarians.

Friedman's wariness of government fit with the libertarian ideology, at times making it impossible to label him in simplistic liberal-conservative terms.

When Nixon appointed Friedman to a panel examining whether to abolish the draft, Friedman found himself at odds with Gen. William Westmoreland, the Army chief of staff and former Vietnam commander.

At one point, Westmoreland declared that he did not want to command an army of "mercenaries."

"I stopped him and said, "General, would you rather command an army of slaves?" Friedman later recalled. "He drew himself up and said, 'I don't like to hear our patriotic draftees referred to as slaves.' I replied, 'I don't like to hear our patriotic volunteers referred to as mercenaries.'"

U.S. officials ended the draft in 1973. Friedman also offered a range of economic advice to the Nixon White House, including a plan for a negative income tax that would provide new aid to the poor.

But the economist was horrified when Nixon imposed wage and price controls and Friedman blasted the plan as "pure window dressing which will do harm rather than good." He also was disappointed at Nixon's willingness to accept a batch of new regulatory agencies, including the Environmental Protection Agency, Occupational Safety and Health Administration and Consumer Product Safety Commission.

Soon after, the novel problem of stagflation — inflation amid sluggish growth — created a new opening for Friedman's strategies.

Contrary to the long-held view, he argued that inflation did not help ease unemployment by heating up the economy. The answer to slumps, he maintained, was carefully controlled growth of the money supply.

On Oct. 14, 1976 reporters swarmed Friedman as he entered a Detroit news conference about a proposed state spending limit. To Friedman's surprise, they informed him he had won the Nobel Prize in economics.

The Swedish academy credited Friedman with insights into managing the nation's money supply — it should grow gradually and steadily, he believed — and how households decide what they can afford to spend, based on expected lifetime earnings. They also cited Friedman for exploding the old fallacy that inflation could reduce unemployment.

"It is very rare for an economist to wield such influence, directly and indirectly, not only on the direction of scientific research but also on actual policies," the judges said.

It was an award that Friedman's loyalists thought he should have gotten earlier. Caught off guard, the economist responded archly: "It is not the pinnacle of my career. I would not want a professional judgment of my scientific work to be those seven people who selected me for the award."

But for Friedman, the Nobel Prize also brought controversy.

He had enraged human rights activists the prior year by giving a series of lectures in Chile, which was controlled by the military dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet. Critics accused the economist of bolstering Pinochet, whose government included Friedman disciples, dubbed "the Chicago boys."

When the Friedmans traveled to Stockholm for the Nobel award, protesters were waiting. The furor annoyed the economist, who believed that economic freedom was a force for political freedom.

"I gave exactly the same lectures in China that I gave in Chile," Friedman said years later. "I have had many demonstrations against me for what I said in Chile. Nobody has made any objections to what I said in China. How come?"

DOJ_NMG_0095919

Friedman's involvement in policy deepened. In 1980 he served as an advisor to the presidential campaign of Ronald Reagan and continued to offer some advice after Reagan was in the Oval Office. The two shared an admiration of Hayek and a distrust of government.

Reagan soon supported a politically costly effort by the Federal Reserve to clamp down on the money supply and combat inflation, adhering to Friedman's principles. The effort conquered inflation, but at the cost of a steep recession.

Friedman always looked back kindly on Reagan's economic stewardship: "You know, there is a myth that Reagan was somehow simple-minded and didn't understand these things," Friedman said in the 2000 PBS interview. "That's a bunch of nonsense. He understood this issue very well.... He knew very well that he was risking his political standing in order to achieve a basic economic objective."

The Fed stayed on the Friedman bandwagon in the early 1980s, focusing on the money supply with careful attention to technical measures known as M1 and M2. The investment world took notice and Friedman's influence reached dizzying heights.

"Every Friday afternoon, a kind of an eerie silence settled over the normally boisterous trading rooms on Wall Street," recalled Walter Wriston, former chairman of Citibank, at the 1998 tribute. "The computer screens started going blank at about 4:20 as traders waited for the 4:30 announcement by the Federal Reserve of the M1 and M2 figures."

It was a "truly extraordinary demonstration of how the power of an idea advanced by a private citizen can affect the way the world works," Wriston added.

Throughout his career, Friedman would tell people that he considered his public activities something of a diversion from his real work as a "scientist." Yet there is little doubt that he felt some lure of the limelight.

His public celebrity skyrocketed in 1980 with the 10-part PBS series "Free to Choose," a compilation of Milton and Rose Friedman's shared philosophy about personal, political and economic freedom. A book based on the project became the year's top seller in nonfiction. Friedman later described the effort as "the most exciting experience of our lives."

Friedman continued his research at Stanford's Hoover Institution, which he had joined in 1977 after three decades at Chicago. More honors were to come, including a presidential Medal of Freedom in 1988 and the National Medal of Science that same year.

But if he remained a hero to many, Friedman's influence in some circles declined in later years. The Fed and other central banks had long ago concluded that his monetary strategies should not be taken literally, although Fed vigilance against inflation continued under Greenspan.

Similarly, his appeals to abandon the war on drugs and other government programs remain outside the mainstream of political debate.

"Human life requires the balancing of freedom with other goals, including security and equality," said Richard Parker, a senior fellow at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. "Friedman's repeated neglect of these other values has been the repeated source of error in his policy advice."

But to legions of admirers, Friedman remains a towering figure, unparalleled in the breadth of his insights about freedom and the economy.

Said Allan H. Meltzer, professor of political economy at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh and a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research: "He's a giant."

He is survived by his wife Rose; daughter Jane, an attorney; and son, David, a professor of law and economics at Santa Clara University.

Economist Touted Laissez-Faire Policy (WP)

By Patricia Sullivan And Carlos Lozada

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Milton Friedman, 94, the Nobel Prize-winning economist whose tireless advocacy of unfettered free markets reshaped the nation's economic policies, died Nov. 16 of a heart ailment at St. Francis Memorial Hospital in San Francisco.

One of the most influential economists of the 20th century, Friedman championed individual choice on topics ranging from Social Security to the military draft. He revived conservative economic theory after the big-government era of the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s, leading the movement that says government's proper role in the market is to stabilize the growth of the money supply -- and stay out of the way.

His views gained traction in the 1970s when a combination of high unemployment and inflation, known as "stagflation," sharply ended the long post-World War II boom.

"Inflation is always and everywhere a monetary phenomenon," he often said.

"Friedman's monetary framework has been so influential that, in its broad outlines at least, it has nearly become identical with modern monetary theory," Ben S. Bernanke, now chairman of the Federal Reserve, said in a 2003 speech at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas.

A 5-foot, 2-inch scholar with a dry wit, the bald, bespectacled Friedman joked that he'd lost an inch because of the weight of the world on his shoulders. He was widely respected as an academic who also expressed himself in ways that could be understood by those who were interested, but unschooled, in economic theory. He took his theories to television, starring in a 10-week series on economics that aired on public television in the 1980s, and he wrote a column for Newsweek from 1966 to 1983. He published nearly two dozen books.

Friedman, an economic adviser to presidents Richard M. Nixon and Ronald Reagan, was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the National Medal of Science in 1988. He won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1976.

His laissez-faire ideas went from maverick to mainstream during his lifetime. He began graduate studies in economics during the Great Depression as the theories of British economist John Maynard Keynes were revolutionizing his profession. Keynes believed that government intervention was necessary to help smooth out the boom-bust cycles in the economy. That theory became the rock against which Friedman pushed for decades until it moved.

One of his most famous arguments dealt with the causes of the Depression. It was prompted not by changes in tariff laws or by the stock market crash, he said, but by the Federal Reserve Board's decisions to shrink the money supply for fear of inflation in 1929 and again in 1936. Those choices choked the life out of the economy and exacerbated a bad situation, he stated in "A Monetary History of the United States, 1867-1960," (1963) co-written with Anna J. Schwartz. The book is considered the definitive history of the nation's money supply.

Friedman's ideas were not initially hailed, and they remain controversial, especially among those who believe government should be a more active player in the economy, a position epitomized by the late Harvard University economist John Kenneth Galbraith.

Richard Parker, a Galbraith biographer, wrote last year in the Boston Globe that Friedman's "passionate calls for financial and securities market deregulation played no small role in ushering in the half-trillion dollar S&L fiasco of the 1980s and the deeply corrupt Wall Street stock market boom of the 1990s. His tax-reduction-at-all-costs policies helped lead to the nation's yawning budget deficits."

But the core of Friedman's work -- that controlling the money supply is a major key to economic health -- was embraced widely across the political spectrum.

His landmark 1962 work, "Capitalism and Freedom," listed common governmental activities in the United States and other Western societies that he considered unjustifiable under his economic principles. These included price supports for agriculture; restrictions on international trade; rent controls; legal minimum wage rates; detailed regulation of industries such as banking or transportation; control of radio and television by the Federal Communications Commission; Social Security (which he called a Ponzi scheme); licensing restrictions on any enterprise, occupation or profession; public housing programs; the military draft; the legal prohibition against carrying mail for profit; and publicly owned and operated toll roads.

"This list is far from comprehensive," Friedman added.

He was a hero to libertarians for advocating the legalization of drugs and prostitution and for promoting the idea of school choice. He also served on a presidential commission that urged Nixon in 1970 to end the military draft.

"No public-policy activity that I have ever engaged in has given me as much satisfaction," he wrote in "Two Lucky People," the 1998 memoir he wrote with his wife. The most dramatic moment, he wrote, was when Gen. William Westmoreland testified that he did not want to command an army of mercenaries. "I stopped him and said, 'General, would you rather command an army of slaves. . . . If they are mercenaries, then I, sir, am a mercenary professor, and you, sir, are a mercenary general, and we are served by mercenary physicians, we use a mercenary lawyer and we get our meat from a mercenary butcher.' "

Milton Friedman was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., on July 31, 1912, the son of Jewish Austro-Hungarian immigrants. He grew up in nearby Rahway, N.J., where his parents ran a garment shop, a dry goods store and an ice cream parlor.

Friedman enrolled in Rutgers University and worked as a waiter, department store clerk and tutor. He started small businesses selling clothes and secondhand books.

After graduating in 1932, he moved to the University of Chicago, where he earned a master's degree in economics in 1933. That's also where he met and later married Rose Director Friedman, his wife of 68 years, who is also an economist and with whom he wrote many books. They had two children, who survive him.

Later, Friedman became a federal employee with the National Resources Committee, a New Deal agency of the kind that he would later criticize so fervently. Part of his work there and at other agencies involved designing the federal withholding tax system.

He received a doctoral degree in economics from Columbia University in 1946 and joined the University of Chicago, where he became known as the leader of the Chicago School of free-market economists. As a believer in the principles espoused by 18th-century economist Adam Smith, Friedman argued vigorously that economic freedom was necessary for political freedom.

Upon retiring in 1977, he became a senior research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution.

The idea of the world's foremost laissez-faire economist living in one of the nation's most liberal cities struck many as unlikely. Asked why he chose San Francisco, he responded with his trademark wit, "Not much competition here."

Influential Economist Milton Friedman Dies At Age 94 (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nobel Memorial Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman, an outspoken advocate of free markets and free choice, adviser to presidents and best-selling author, died Thursday at 94.

Often described as one of the most influential economists of the last century, Friedman died of heart failure in San Francisco.

“He had been a fixture in my life both professionally and personally for a half century. My world will not be the same,” said former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke called him an economic scholar without peer.

Friedman was a leader of a school of thought that became known as the Chicago school of economics, named after the University of Chicago, where he was a professor. Friedman's work emphasized free markets and monetarism, which stresses the importance of the money supply in inflation and business cycles. He famously noted “inflation is always and everywhere a monetary phenomenon.” His work contrasted with John Maynard Keynes' advocacy of government intervention to manage the economy.

Friedman was instrumental, with 2006 Nobel Memorial winner Edmund Phelps, in promoting the view that there is not a sustainable long-run trade-off between inflation and unemployment.

Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight notes Friedman correctly predicted the rise of inflation in the 1960s and 1970s, which many others missed. His theories explained stagflation — high inflation and unemployment.

Friedman and co-author Anna Schwartz reshaped understanding of the Great Depression, illuminating the role played by misguided central bank policy.

Friedman wrote extensively on public policy, including a column in Newsweek magazine. Among his best-known popular works is Free to Choose, which became a best-selling non-fiction book in 1980. It was written with his wife, Rose Friedman, to accompany a 10-part public television series.

Friedman advocated greater school choice via vouchers. He was an opponent of the military draft and a force in ending conscription in 1973.

Friedman was a senior research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution since 1977. He was a professor at the University of Chicago from 1946 to 1976, when he won the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economics.

Born in 1912, Friedman grew up the son of Eastern European immigrants in a working-class family in Rahway, N.J. Friedman paid his way through Rutgers University with a scholarship and a series of odd jobs. He considered majoring in math and becoming an actuary but turned to economics.

Friedman worked on tax policy in World War II, helping develop tax withholding (which he later wanted to abolish). He was briefly posted in Paris helping administer the Marshall Plan for rebuilding Europe, where he became interested in floating exchange rates.

Friedman advised conservative Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater in his 1964 presidential run and later Presidents Nixon and Reagan and foreign leaders. In a 2002 tribute, President Bush noted that Friedman's free-market ideas have been adopted in many countries: “The rest of the world is finally catching up with Milton Friedman.”

Friedman received a bachelor of arts from Rutgers in 1932, a master's from the University of Chicago in 1933 and a Ph.D. from Columbia University in 1946.

In an autobiography, Friedman talked of meeting his wife, who survives him, while she was a “shy, withdrawn, lovely, and extremely bright fellow economics student” doing graduate work at the University of Chicago. They were married in 1938.

Friedman Debunked The Gospel Of Keynes (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095922

One thing that baffles those of us with no training in economics is that two people who hold diametrically opposite views can both be held out as giants of their profession.

After all, if the great British economist John Maynard Keynes was right that government can smooth out the business cycle by stimulating and managing demand for goods and services through such mechanisms as public-works programs, deposit insurance and deficit spending, then how could Milton Friedman be right that the better approach is for government to cut taxes, curb regulation and focus on the supply of money in circulation?

Or how do we square Keynes's prescription that global finance can be stabilized through fixed exchange rates with Friedman's formula of floating exchange rates?

There is, of course, a political analogy to this conundrum. The same country reveres the memory of Franklin Roosevelt for pulling us out of the Great Depression while crediting Ronald Reagan with restoring the competitiveness of the American economy.

The dirty little secret is that there are few scientific truths in economics analogous to the laws of thermodynamics or genetics. Economics is a social science, not a physical one, in which people and systems are constantly adapting to changing conditions. The policies that may be good for one era may not be right for the next. And it is the truly great economists who spot the changing dynamics, acknowledge the inadequacy of the old prescriptions and are clever enough to come up with something better.

In this respect you can say that Milton Friedman, who died yesterday, was the greatest economist of our time. He was not simply the most influential economist since Keynes, but a worthy successor, building on Keynes's insights even as he discredited key aspects of Keynesian economic management.

In the 1950s, as socialism was gaining credence around the world and Keynesian thinking dominated economics textbooks, Friedman's skepticism about government management of the economy was viewed as nothing short of heresy. But by the mid-1970s, as the country was beset by stagnant growth and high inflation, it became clear the Keynesian model had played itself out. Suddenly, Friedman's ideas didn't look so kooky.

"I grew up in a Keynesian household," recalls Larry Summers, the former Treasury secretary and Harvard president whose mother and two uncles were respected economists. "And as an undergraduate, I was taught an economics that had demand but no supply." But in time, says Summers, it dawned on him and most others in the profession that Keynesian theory was not so much wrong as incomplete.

With his focus on the overall demand for goods and services in the economy, Keynes overlooked the importance of the supply of money in circulation. Friedman argued that controlling that supply was a better tool for managing the economy than taxation and spending policies.

Inflation, it turned out, wasn't as benign an antidote to unemployment as Keynes had thought, nor was there necessarily a trade-off between the two, as he presumed.

And many Keynesian policies meant to correct for very real imperfections in the marketplace turned out to have big imperfections of their own.

The intellectual roots of Friedman's "economic liberalism" run back to Adam Smith and Alfred Marshall, and were spun out at the University of Chicago with his pal George Stigler and intellectual superstars including Ronald Coase, Zvi Griliches, Gary Becker, Robert Lucas and Kevin Murphy. But even as the profession moved toward fancy mathematics and modeling, Friedman went the other way, constantly striving to connect theory with people and policy.

With his wife, Rose, he wrote a regular column for Newsweek, churned out books in simple English and produced a television series for PBS. And over the years, he provided a steady stream of influential advice to politicians and policymakers, beginning with Barry Goldwater and Richard Nixon, and extending through Ronald Reagan, Margaret Thatcher and Alan Greenspan.

Friedman wasn't always right. His dogmatic monetarism clouded his economic predictions during the 1980s and '90s, in part because of globalization and new financial instruments that made it difficult to measure the money supply, let alone control it. And after the success of the Greenspan era at the Federal Reserve, Friedman was forced to acknowledge that maybe humans could do a better job managing monetary policy than the computer he once recommended.

Friedman's abiding distrust of government action also blinded him to its successes. But it would be wrong to confuse his libertarian instincts with lack of human sympathy. He was an early proponent of the negative income tax, now known as the earned income tax credit -- which supplements the wages of millions of low-income workers. And while he opposed rent control, public education and Social Security, he promoted government vouchers to help people buy housing, education and medical care.

Whether he was right or wrong, whether you agreed with him or not, it is certainly true, as Summers noted yesterday, that Friedman improved the quality of thinking in every debate he entered. The same might be said of his friend John Kenneth Galbraith, who was as energetic in defending the Keynesian view as Friedman was in discarding it -- and who also died this year.

Many of Friedman's ideas have become so fundamental to modern economic thinking, it's easy to forget how unconventional they once were. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke put it nicely in 2003, at a conference organized by the Dallas Fed to celebrate Friedman's life and work.

"I am reminded," Bernanke said, "of the student first exposed to Shakespeare, who complained to the professor: 'I don't see what's so great about him. He was hardly original at all. All he did was string together a bunch of well-known quotations.'"

Capitalism And Friedman (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

There are some public figures whose obituaries can be written years in advance. Milton Friedman was not one of them.

Arguably the greatest economist of the 20th century, he won his Nobel Prize 30 years ago. His classic "Capitalism and Freedom" was published 44 years ago. He died yesterday at the age of 94, but as the op-ed running nearby attests, he was active in writing about, thinking about and explaining how economics affects our world until the end.

In today's feature, he updates and re-examines conclusions he reached about the Great Depression in "A Monetary History of the United States, 1867-1960," a book published with Anna Schwartz 43 years ago. His thesis was that the Great Depression was not, as was once commonly presumed, a "market failure," but a failure of government policy. Contraction of the money supply in the wake of the stock-market crash of 1929 was what turned a financial event into an economic catastrophe.

This insight flowed from Professor Friedman's conviction that "money matters." As the Royal Academy of Sweden noted in announcing his 1976 Nobel, Friedman's was a lonely voice in arguing for the importance of the money supply in economics when he began writing about it in the 1950s.

By the late 1970s, stagflation -- the combination of high inflation and high unemployment -- had made it obvious that the then-dominant Keynesian model had some large holes. These included the effect of the money supply on inflation and the fact that inflation and employment did not move in lockstep as some of Keynes's disciples asserted. It was a seminal insight, creating what became known at the University of Chicago and elsewhere as the "monetarist school" and laying the intellectual basis for central bankers to break the great inflation of the 1970s.

In awarding its Nobel in 1976, the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences cited his "achievements in the fields of consumption analysis, monetary history and theory, and for his demonstration of the complexity of stabilization policy." The citation covers a huge swath of economic thinking, and suggests both the range and the consistency of Professor Friedman's thought. In layman's terms, the Swedish Academy credited him with nothing less than shredding the Keynesian consensus.

First, he had shown that men are no fools. People spend money in accordance with their income expectations over the long-term, not in response to one-time "stimuli" from the government. This is known as the "permanent income" hypothesis, and it called into question Keynesian notions of how short-term stimulus affects the economy. In addition to his monetary insights, Mr. Friedman questioned the degree to which fiscal policy could be used to "fine-tune" the economy by adjusting spending, tax or monetary policy. Today we take for granted that all of these operate with a lag, but it was Milton Friedman who first highlighted the problem.

For all of his academic accomplishments, Professor Friedman's role as a popularizer of free-market principles was arguably more important. He wrote a column in Newsweek for 18 years starting in 1966, preaching the importance of economic freedom to a generation that had never heard such things in school. His 1980 book, "Free to Choose," was a best seller, and the videos that accompanied it were smuggled behind the Iron Curtain like seeds of revolution.

He was among the first to point to Hong Kong as a model of free-market success, a lesson that even today is remaking Communist China. And he first suggested educational vouchers to rescue failing public schools as long ago as 1955; in recent years, he established a foundation to support this idea that continues to advance despite ferocious opposition from unions and other entrenched interests.

This newspaper had the privilege of publishing Milton Friedman's articles on numerous occasions over the years. We've also disagreed with him from time to time, notably on exchange rates and drug legalization. These disputes always gave us cause to reflect, and 20 years ago amid one debate on the benefits of fixed exchange rates we noted that "being spanked by Milton Friedman is one of life's most humiliating experiences."

In truth, Professor Friedman always argued with civility and a bracing wit. One of his best barbs on the size of government: "Given our monstrous, overgrown government structure, any three letters chosen at random would probably designate an agency or part of a department that could be profitably abolished." And he popularized "There is no such thing as a free lunch."

In "Two Lucky People," written with his wife, Rose Friedman, who survives him as a distinguished economist in her own right, Mr. Friedman well described the role of a public intellectual: "We do not influence the course of events by persuading people that we are right when we make what they regard as radical proposals. Rather, we exert influence by keeping options available when something has to be done at a time of crisis."

On the death of Ronald Reagan, whom he advised, Mr. Friedman wrote on these pages that "few people in human history have contributed more to the achievement of human freedom." The same can and long will be said of Milton Friedman.

Why Money Matters (WSJ)

By Milton Friedman

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

The third of three episodes in a major natural experiment in monetary policy that started more than 80 years ago is just now coming to an end. The experiment consists in observing the effect on the economy and the stock market of the monetary policies followed during, and after, three very similar periods of rapid economic growth in response to rapid technological change: to wit, the booms of the 1920s in the U.S., the '80s in Japan, and the '90s in the U.S.

The prosperous '20s in the U.S. were followed by the most severe economic contraction in its history. In our "Monetary History" (1963), Anna Schwartz and I attributed the severity of the contraction to a monetary policy that permitted the quantity of money to decline by one-third from 1929 to 1933. Since 1963, two episodes have occurred that are almost mirror images of the U.S. economy in the '20s: the '80s in Japan, and the '90s in the U.S. All three episodes were marked by a long period of rapid economic growth, sparked by rapid technological change and the emergence of new industries, and accompanied by a stock market boom that terminated in a crash. Monetary policy played a role in these booms, but only a supporting role. Technological change appears to have been the major player.

These three episodes provide the equivalent of a controlled experiment to test our hypothesis about what we termed the Great Contraction. In this experiment, the quantity of money is the counterpart of the experimenter's input. The performance of the economy and the level of the stock market are the counterpart of the experimenter's output, i.e., the variables whose relation to input the experimenter is seeking to determine. The three boom episodes all occurred in developed private enterprise market economies, involved in international finance and trade, and with similar monetary systems, including a central bank with power to control the quantity of money. This is the counterpart of the controlled conditions of the experimenter's laboratory.

The Money Supply: In addition, history has provided a close counterpart to the kind of variation in input that our hypothetical experimenter might have deliberately chosen. As Fig. 1 shows, monetary policy, as measured by the behavior of the quantity of money, was very similar in the three boom periods, and very different in the three post boom periods, with settings that might be described as low, medium, high.

To measure the quantity of money, I use M2 in the U.S. and the conceptually equivalent M2 plus certificates of deposit in Japan. To express the data for the two countries and the widely separated periods in comparable units, I use as an index of the money stock the ratio of the quantity of money to its average value for the six years prior to the cycle peak. The peak quarter of the relevant business cycle is the third quarter of 1929 (29.3) for the earlier U.S. episode; the first quarter of 1992 (92.1) for Japan; and the first quarter of 2001 (01.1) for the second U.S. episode (see Table 1). Finally, the data are plotted to align the dates at the cycle peak.

Fig. 1 shows a striking contrast between the period before the cycle peak and the period after the cycle peak. There are some differences before the peak -- money growth is slowest on the average for the earlier U.S. episode, fastest for Japan -- but the differences are small and there is reasonably steady money growth in all three episodes. The contrast with the period after the cycle peak could hardly be greater. Money supply declines sharply after the cycle peak in the first episode, goes from stable to rising mildly in the second, and rises steadily and sharply in the third. Our hypothetical experimenter planned his experiment well.

The GDP: The results of the third episode of this natural experiment are now all in. Fig. 2 shows how GDP in nominal terms (dollars or yen in current prices) behaved during the boom and post boom periods. I use nominal GDP rather than real GDP because M2 is also a nominal magnitude. How changes in nominal GDP are divided between prices and output is an important question but one that is not directly relevant to this experiment. One further preliminary comment: I believe the erratic behavior of nominal GNP during the '20s and '30s is largely a statistical artifact. The data for that period are scarce and of poor quality.

As in Fig. 1, there is a striking contrast between the boom and the post-boom periods: roughly similar growth during the booms, widely variable growth during the post-boom. Both before and after the cycle peak, nominal GDP growth paralleled monetary growth. During the boom, money and nominal GDP grew most rapidly in Japan, most slowly in the first U.S. episode, and at an intermediate rate in the second U.S. episode. Table 2 shows the ratio of the money stock at the cycle peak to its value six years earlier (the initial date in the figures) and the corresponding ratio for GDP. In the first two rows of the table, the ratios are highest for Japan, lowest for the U.S. 1920s.

After the cycle peak, money fell sharply in the first episode and so did nominal GDP; money growth stagnated in the second episode and so did GDP; money grew at a rapid rate in the third episode and, after a brief lag (corresponding to the mild 2001 recession) so did GDP. Table 3 shows the ratio of the money stock at the terminal date plotted to its value at the cyclical peak and the corresponding ratio for GDP. Both ratios are decidedly lowest for the U.S. 1920s, and decidedly highest for the U.S. 1990s.

The Stock Market: The peak of the stock market, as measured by S&P's index, coincided with the cycle peak in the first episode, both occurring in the third quarter of 1929 (29.3). However, that was not the case in the later episodes. In Japan, stock prices as measured by the Nikkei peaked in the fourth quarter of 1989 (89.4), nine quarters before the cycle peak. In the second U.S. episode, stock prices as measured by S&P 500 peaked in the third quarter of 2000 (00.3), two quarters prior to the cycle peak. Accordingly, Fig. 3 plots the data to align the series at the stock market peak.

The near identity of the three stock market series during the boom is truly remarkable. Yet even the minor deviations that exist reflect to some extent the differences in monetary growth, as Table 2 makes clear. Money growth was highest in Japan, and the Nikkei shows the largest rise in the stock market. The other two do not conform: Money rose more in the '90s than in the '20s, while stock prices rose slightly less, as shown by the ratio of peak to initial value in Table 2.

Of more interest for our purpose is what happened after the peak. For a year after, the three stock-price series fell in tandem, responding to the inner dynamics of a collapsing bubble. Then, the differences in monetary policy began to have an effect. Beginning in late 1930, the S&P index started falling away from the others under the influence of a collapsing money stock. For another year and a half, the other two indexes move in tandem. Then the much more expansive policy of the Fed in the '90s than of the Bank of Japan in the '80s takes effect and pulls the S&P 500 away from the Nikkei, which stabilizes in response to the passive monetary policy of the Bank of Japan (as shown by Table 3).

The results of this natural experiment are clear, at least for major ups and downs: What happens to the quantity of money has a determinative effect on what happens to national income and to stock prices. The results strongly support Anna Schwartz's and my 1963 conjecture about the role of monetary policy in the Great Contraction. They also support the view that monetary policy deserves much credit for the mildness of the recession that followed the collapse of the U.S. boom in late 2000.

Mr. Friedman, who died yesterday, was the 1976 Nobel Laureate in economics. He was a senior research fellow at the Hoover Institution and professor emeritus at the University of Chicago.

On To Vietnam, Bush Hears Echoes Of 1968 In Iraq 2006 (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

ABOARD AIR FORCE ONE, Friday, Nov. 17 — During the presidential campaign in 2000, George W. Bush, who served out the Vietnam War in the Texas Air National Guard, was asked whether he ever considered volunteering to fight when he graduated from Yale in 1968.

“Did I think about going to the Army post and saying ‘Send me to Vietnam?’ ” Mr. Bush asked, describing his own outlook in 1968. “Not really. I wanted to fly, and that was the adventure I was seeking.”

Thirty-eight years later, at age 60, Mr. Bush is finally arriving in Vietnam. On Friday he starts a 72-hour visit, linked to an annual Asian summit meeting that the Communist government in Vietnam is playing host to for the first time and that some White House officials concede is spectacularly poorly timed. Just as Lyndon B. Johnson did in 1968, Mr. Bush has ousted his longtime defense secretary and nominated a realist with “fresh eyes” to replace him. Just like President Johnson in 1968, he is conducting a broad rethinking of strategy, and is hearing options he does not like.

The White House insists that the comparisons stop there. His aides argue that the analogies between these two wars, conducted in different parts of the world, facing very different enemies, are mostly false ones.

The comparisons will nonetheless be the unavoidable subtext of Mr. Bush’s every move as he travels in Hanoi and then stops in the city that in his youth was known as Saigon, and that became the scene of an American military debacle. And he will have to convince his allies, ordinary Americans, and perhaps himself, that Iraq will end differently.

Until now, when asked what he had learned from Vietnam, Mr. Bush has almost reflexively reached for the same line: That he does not micromanage his generals, the way Mr. Johnson did. It is a response drawn from conservative orthodoxy about what went wrong in Vietnam, underlying an argument that had the generals been allowed to fight their way, the United States might have won.

But he may feel compelled to say more after he lands in Hanoi. Mr. Bush will find himself inside government halls adorned with paintings of Ho Chi Minh. He will be talking about the future of Asia with Ho's Communist successors who, Washington once warned, could not be allowed to win under any circumstances.

He will be sleeping just a mile or so from the open-air equivalent to the Situation Room where Ho Chi Minh managed his generals, from a single telephone at the end of a conference table. (It is now part of a museum, but Mr. Bush's schedule reveals no plans to visit.) His motorcade will zip past the lake where John McCain was pulled to shore after bailing out, and Mr. Bush will have his picture taken with foreign leaders under the same skies where Operation Rolling Thunder, the bombing attack on North Vietnam's capital, tried to break the enemy's will.

With such emotional imagery to deal with, it is no surprise that Mr. Bush's national security team has spent an enormous amount of time drawing distinctions between the war that their generation grew up with, and the one that they ordered.

"Historical parallels of that kind are not very helpful, and I don't think they happen to be right," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters the other day, in a tone she might have used for a Stanford graduate student whose thesis was not holding together. "This is a different set of circumstances, with different stakes for the United States."

Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, struck a similar note last week when he suggested that the "domino effect" that Americans worried about in the 1960s and 70s — the fear that neighboring countries would fall to Communism's lures — was nothing compared with the problems today.

"There were discussions about dominoes, some which fell, some which didn't fall," he said, recalling the Vietnam debate that raged when he was a student at Cornell. But, he added, "Most men and women in America believe that it is important that we not fail in Iraq; that the consequences of an Iraq that descended into chaos would be an Iraq that would be a safe haven for terrorists."

Ultimately, he said, that "could result in 9/11-type attacks against the United States," a reach across the ocean that no one really harbored three decades ago.

In private, Mr. Bush says there is another big difference between then and now — the draft. There is little question that by signing up to be a pilot in the Texas Air National Guard, the risk was low that he would end up in Vietnam as a 23-year-old. But according to an academic called into the White House recently, Mr. Bush said, "We could never have sustained this effort in Iraq, politically," if there was not an all-volunteer force. He declined to be named because he was relaying a private conversation.

The argument that Vietnam is very different gets some backing from Stanley Karnow, the Vietnam historian. "There are differences and similarities, of course," he said. "We got lied into both wars."

But, he added, "The easy summation is that Vietnam began as a guerrilla war and escalated into an orthodox war — by the end we were fighting in big units. Iraq starts as a conventional war, and has degenerated into a guerrilla war. It has gone in an opposite direction. And it's much more difficult to deal with."

U.S. Seeks Korea Nuclear Step

HANOI, Nov. 16—The United States is working with China and other Asian nations to pressure North Korea to take a visible step toward dismantling its nuclear program before starting a new round of nuclear disarmament talks, American officials said Thursday.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that while she was hopeful that the talks — begun in 2003 — would restart in December, it was pointless to return to the bargaining table without a show of good faith from both sides. Speaking to reporters in Hanoi after meeting with some of her counterparts for the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting, Ms. Rice refused to expand on what those steps would be. But American officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly, said an acceptable move might be for North Korea to dismantle one of its nuclear facilities and readmit inspectors.

Comparisons With Vietnam Shadow Bush Trip (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

HANOI -- President Bush will focus on trade and worldwide crises like AIDS and bird flu during his eight-day trip to Southeast Asia, but the specter of the Vietnam War 30 years ago and comparisons to the U.S.-led war in Iraq have followed him to the Pacific Rim.

The president has repeatedly rejected comparisons between the two wars, even as Democratic critics complain that Iraq has become a "quagmire" like Vietnam, which U.S. forces abandoned in 1973 after the deaths of 58,000 American troops.

"I see differences, I really do," Mr. Bush insisted last week in a press conference. "I don't think it is a parallel."

Other top administration officials also say there is no likeness between the two conflicts.

DOJ_NMG_0095927

"This was a different set of circumstances with different stakes for the United States and a different kind of war," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said this week in Germany. And National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said before the president departed this week on his trip that the two wars are different.

"I remember a debate about what would happen if the United States left Vietnam, and there were discussions about dominoes, some which fell, some of which didn't fall," he said. "But nobody, I think, felt that it would result in a clear and present danger to the territory of the United States."

Still, Democrats charge that the Bush administration has not learned the lessons from the Vietnam War, and some party leaders have directly compared the two wars. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, has called the Iraq war a "seemingly intractable quagmire ... with no end in sight," and others complain that there has never been an exit strategy -- a lesson that should have been learned from Vietnam.

There are, in some ways, comparisons worth noting. In nearly every speech he gives, the president insists that the war in Iraq is the central front in the war against terror and has warned that if the United States fails there, other nations in the Middle East could fall like dominoes.

"The enemy understands the stakes of what a free society will mean to their ambitions to spread their dark vision throughout the Middle East and then the world," he said during a campaign event before the Nov. 7 elections.

The construction mirrors the premise that led the United States into Vietnam in the 1960s: that Southeast nations near Vietnam would fall into communist hands if the United States failed in its effort to help South Vietnam fight the North.

Critics say, however, that the "domino theory" proved false.

"We thought the sky would fall in the '70s, too, and it didn't," said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign-policy scholar at the Brookings Institution who is part of the independent, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. He also said there are several other parallels between the two wars, including an insurgency that has established "a self-sustaining momentum that is very hard to overcome" and a weak allied government.

Vietnam scholar Robert K. Brigham, a Vassar College history professor, asserts that the parallels between the two wars are unmistakable. In both wars, superior U.S. firepower did not translate into victory, nation-building became ever more difficult with the passage of time, and public support waned after years of war.

"In going to war in Iraq, the George W. Bush administration has purposefully turned its back on the lessons of Vietnam," Mr. Brigham writes in his new book, "Is Iraq Another Vietnam?" "That the United States is not omnipotent is an important lesson Americans learned in the mangrove swamps and highlands of Vietnam. It is one the United States is (re)learning in Iraq as well."

But Pham Viet. Anh does not agree that the Iraq war is like the Vietnam War.

"I think it is different. The Vietnam War was between South Vietnam and North Vietnam, not a war between Vietnam and the United States," the 24-year-old magazine reporter said outside Hanoi's grand Temple of Literature.

But the reminders are everywhere. Near the center of the city is Truc Bach lake, where then-Lt. Cmdr. John McCain, now a Republican senator from Arizona and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, was captured after parachuting out of his damaged warplane to spend more than five years as a prisoner of war. Statues of Ho Chi Minh, the victorious North's revolutionary communist leader, are everywhere, and thousands flock to his mausoleum each year to see his body. One of the capital's trendiest nightspots is the disco Apocalypse Now, named after one of the most famous movies made about the war.

The president will add to the reminders this weekend when he tours the Joint POW-MIA Accounting Command, where he will be briefed on efforts to locate or account for all of the nearly 1,800 service members still missing from the Vietnam War.

Bush Arrives In Vietnam For Trade Talks (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

HANOI — Six years ago today, Bill Clinton became the first U.S. president to visit Hanoi and the first in more than three decades to visit Vietnam, closing a painful chapter in American diplomatic and military history.

When President Bush arrived today, he was shadowed by an issue that was politically difficult for him when he first ran for president, just as it was for Clinton: the question of military service during the Vietnam War. And there was new attention to an issue that is politically painful for him in 2006: whether the Iraq war is turning into a new generation's equivalent of the torturous Vietnam conflict.

Bush flew here this morning after a one-day stop in Singapore, where he warned North Korea not to spread its nuclear technology to nations or terrorist groups, and said the United States' partners in the region needed to recognize the threat that Pyongyang posed.

The president, speaking to government leaders and students at the National University of Singapore, said, "America's position is clear: The transfer of nuclear weapons or materiel by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action.

"For the sake of peace, it is vital that the nations of this region send a message to North Korea that the proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated."

The audience was silent during his address and applauded politely when he was done.

Bush said he was committed to liberalized trade rules, despite what he noted were "the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism" in the United States.

He said the creation of a free-trade agreement among the 21 nations of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, whose summit this weekend has brought Bush to Vietnam, "deserves serious consideration."

Bush's less-than-enthusiastic endorsement suggested he might be backing off a goal to which the Clinton administration had committed the United States.

Trade liberalization has met a resurgent skepticism in the United States and drew criticism in several congressional campaigns this fall.

In 1994, the economic forum, of which the U.S. is a member, called for "free and open trade and investment in the Asia-Pacific" by 2010 among developed nations, with developing nations following suit 10 years later.

A White House official said Bush still backed meeting the two deadlines, even though he used what the aide acknowledged was "softer" language to express the objective.

The summit is seen as Vietnam's debut on the world stage — as an economic engine in Southeast Asia and as a nation that has moved beyond the war. The communist government, however, still maintains strict one-party control, and dissidents say political freedom has yet to match the nation's economic progress.

Bush had hoped to win Congress' authorization normalizing trade relations with Vietnam before he arrived. But there were not enough votes this week to move the legislation through Congress.

Republican congressional leaders, who remain in charge during the lame-duck session, said they hoped to revisit the issue next month.

The question of whether Bush is leading the United States into a Vietnam-like quagmire in Iraq, which his critics increasingly argue is the case, has drawn sharp challenges from the president and his senior aides.

At a news conference the day after U.S. voters delivered what was largely interpreted as a rebuke to the president's Iraq policies, Bush said such an interpretation of the war was wrong.

He said that Iraq, "after the overthrow of the tyrant" Saddam Hussein, established a constitution and elected a unity government, "which is different from Vietnam" during and after the war. He said that the U.S. military was a volunteer force, not a draft-fed military, and that unlike in the Vietnam era, "the support for our troops is strong here in the United States."

"I don't think it is a parallel," he said.

Nevertheless, in the Iraq war, as was true in the Vietnam conflict, the population is divided, experts and politicians are split over whether the Pentagon should deploy more troops or be given a deadline to start pulling them out, and the mounting death toll of U.S. troops has brought a political backlash against the administration.

In Vietnam, Bush plans to focus more on current problems and not on the past, including the politically fraught question from his first presidential campaign that resurfaced in 2004: whether he used his father's clout to gain a coveted spot in the Texas Air National Guard to avoid being drafted at the height of the war.

On Saturday, Bush is scheduled to visit the U.S. military office in Hanoi, which is responsible for finding the remains of U.S. troops. It also investigates information about prisoners of war.

The United States has found no evidence that Americans are still being held as prisoners of war in Vietnam.

Bush's Trade Talk Diverges From Dems' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE — President Bush pressed familiar points in Asia on Thursday on trade and anti-terrorism policies, but Democrats are making it clear the political environment has changed back home.

A week after his Republican Party lost control of Congress, Bush told an audience here that the United States wants to expand trade in Asia and work to restrict the spread of nuclear weapons, particularly from North Korea.

“We must seize on our common opportunities,” Bush said at the National University of Singapore. “We must be willing to confront our common threats.”

Bush noted that trade and nuclear proliferation are linked because technological advances that have helped expand trade also increase global threats. He warned that “irresponsible behavior by a few can have catastrophic consequences for the entire world.”

The president was to echo these themes today in Hanoi, Vietnam, where he is attending an economic summit of Asia-Pacific leaders. Bush, the fourth U.S. president to visit Vietnam, also will visit Communist Party headquarters for meetings with party leaders.

This weekend, Bush will meet with leaders from Russia, China, Japan and South Korea — all key to helping curb North Korea's nuclear hopes.

In Washington, Democrats preparing to take charge of Congress next year challenged Bush over his approaches to free trade and North Korea, as well as the war in Iraq.

“The next few months will be a time of great transition here in Congress and hopefully in American foreign policy,” Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., said. Lantos will be the next chairman of the House International Relations Committee.

Lantos called for sending an American envoy directly to North Korea to negotiate a halt to its nuclear weapons program.

In his remarks, Bush again endorsed six-party talks that include China, Russia, Japan and South Korea, saying the region must send North Korea the message that “proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated.”

House Democrats dealt a blow to Bush's trade agenda Monday by blocking approval of normalized trade relations with Vietnam. Bush wanted the bill passed before today's trip to Hanoi, site of the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum.

Expanded trade is the linchpin of Bush's Asia policy. He noted in his speech Thursday that the United States does more business across the Pacific than the Atlantic.

“We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors,” Bush said. “These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them.”

Bush called for U.S.-Asian cooperation on the environment, alternative energy sources and infectious diseases such as HIV, AIDS and avian flu.

Elizabeth Economy, director for Asia studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, said Bush's hopes for Asia are threatened by other problems such as Iraq.

“Even without the congressional defeat, U.S. influence and prestige have been seriously diminished by concern over Iraq and the state of the U.S. economy,” she said.

Differing views could be found in Singapore, where international trade is reflected in miles of upscale shopping malls along the commercial strip on Orchard Road and food carts along the river.

Liu Chong Sin lamented Bush's “aggressiveness” while browsing in one of the many symbols of American capitalism, a Borders bookstore.

“He's caused a lot of trouble for the whole world, I believe,” he said, citing the Iraq war and tensions with North Korea. Liu hopes pressure from the new Democratic Congress will “change” Bush.

Shi Yin, after shopping in one of the high-end boutiques on Orchard Road, said terrorists threaten prosperity everywhere, and Bush is right to confront them in Iraq and elsewhere because “there are times you need to be tough.”

Bush Pushes Free Trade During Asia Trip (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Kicking off an Asia swing overshadowed by political troubles at home and diplomatic disputes abroad, U.S. President George W. Bush fired back at newly empowered Democrats challenging his free-trade push.

North Korea's nuclear program also hangs over Mr. Bush's trip, his first since voters rebuked his Republican party at the polls last week. The president in his speech issued a stern warning to Pyongyang, vowing to hold it "fully accountable" for any transfer of nuclear-weapon technology to terrorist organizations.

On trade, the president urged Asian countries to work with the U.S. to rejuvenate a long-stalled round of global trade talks and endorsed the idea of a free-trade agreement with all 21 Pacific Rim members -- even as he felt compelled to rally support anew in his own government for such efforts.

"We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to its opportunities," he told an audience at the National University of Singapore in his first major speech of the trip. "These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them."

Mr. Bush is bringing a range of objectives to his weeklong Asia trip, which will take him to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia. The centerpiece is a three-day stop in Hanoi for the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, where Mr. Bush is scheduled to sit down with a number of regional leaders, including Chinese President Hu Jintao on Sunday, to talk about trade, regional security and issues such as North Korea's nuclear program.

The trip comes at a sensitive moment for Mr. Bush, who has been weakened significantly by the Democrats' sweep of Congress. Russia and China have rebuffed White House efforts to pass a hard-hitting United Nations Security Council resolution designed to force Iran to rein in its nuclear program. The administration's handling of Iraq has also come under mounting criticism in the U.S., where members of both major political parties are hoping that a bipartisan Iraq panel headed by former Secretary of State James Baker can find a way out of the seemingly intractable mess there.

Lawmakers sent Mr. Bush off to Asia on a sour note by failing to pass legislation lifting Cold War-era economic restrictions on Vietnam and granting the country the same benefits as other U.S. trading partners in the World Trade Organization. Mr. Bush had hoped to arrive in Vietnam with the measure in place, but the administration now acknowledges that the measure won't come to another vote until December at the earliest.

More broadly, the Democratic takeovers of the House and Senate seem likely to force Mr. Bush to significantly curtail, if not abandon, his global free-trade ambitions. Many of the newly elected Democratic lawmakers campaigned on protectionist platforms, and their criticism of Mr. Bush's free-trade agenda is certain to imperil a raft of impending trade deals. Democrats are already gearing up to prevent the administration from keeping its authority to negotiate trade deals with other countries without congressional input. That issue will come to a vote next year.

Mr. Bush seemed tired during his speech, which contained no new policy proposals and none of the soaring rhetoric that has often been a hallmark of his public remarks. The auditorium where he delivered the speech was far from full, and several of the waiters who had set up food and drinks outside the hall said they were drafted at the last minute to help fill in several of the back rows of the room.

The president reserved his harshest language for North Korea, which sparked global outrage by successfully detonating a nuclear bomb last month. Mr. Bush said that the potential spread of weapons of mass destruction to terrorist groups was "the greatest danger in our world today." He added: "America's position is clear: The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

Mr. Bush alternated the tough talk with conciliatory language, praising North Korea for agreeing to return to the so-called six-party talks that also include Japan, China, South Korea and Russia. The president said the U.S. would be willing to give North Korea security assurances and economic aid if it abandoned its nuclear program.

Bush Cautiously Backs Pacific Rim Free Trade (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE, Nov. 16 -- President Bush reassured Pacific Rim leaders Thursday that the United States stands squarely behind efforts to liberalize trade with the region, and he promised to continue pressuring North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

On the eve of an economic summit in Vietnam, Bush voiced tentative support for a free-trade agreement covering all 21 member states of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, saying during a speech here that the idea deserves "serious consideration."

In addition, the president again warned North Korea that the United States would consider it a "grave threat" and would hold North Korea responsible if it transfers nuclear bomb technology to another country or to a terrorist organization. He said North Korea should take "concrete steps" to end its nuclear program, and he called on other Asian countries to send the same message to Pyongyang.

North Korea agreed last month to resume talks with five other nations on ending its nuclear weapons program, just three weeks after conducting its first nuclear weapons test. Diplomats hope talks among the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States will take place by the end of the year, but no date has been fixed.

In comments to reporters at the APEC meeting in Hanoi, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said there was deep skepticism among the group's members that North Korea actually intended to abandon its nuclear weapons. [Bush landed in Hanoi on Friday morning, the Associated Press reported.]

Asked if she would favor delaying talks until she was certain North Korea would take steps to show its commitment, Rice said: "I don't think it makes sense for us to have talks unless we think that it's going to be fruitful. It certainly doesn't make sense just to go back to talk."

In his speech at the National University of Singapore, Bush also called on North Korea to take demonstrable action to show it is willing to end its weapons program. "Pyongyang must show it's serious . . . by taking concrete steps to implement its agreement to give up its nuclear weapons and weapons program," he said.

Bush added that if North Korea did so, the United States and other nations involved in the six-party talks would provide it with economic help, security assurances and other benefits.

Bush's visit to Southeast Asia comes on the heels of elections in which Democrats won majorities in both chambers of Congress, an outcome widely seen as a repudiation of the president's leadership.

Some analysts have said many nations in Southeast Asia, which have a generally warm view of Bush, see the United States as a pillar of stability in a region where Communist-run China is the dominant force.

With Bush weakened politically, they say, many leaders in this economically booming region doubt his power to deliver on his trade liberalization and other promises.

Bush suffered a disappointment this week when the House of Representatives failed to approve a measure to establish permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam. Bush had expressed hope that Congress would approve the measure before his trip to Hanoi, but House leaders now say they will not try again to pass the bill until next month.

Passage of the bill is needed for U.S. firms to take advantage of the low tariffs Vietnam will enact as a result of its recent membership in the World Trade Organization, and its failure to pass was viewed as a disappointment by the Vietnamese government.

In his address previewing issues he plans to emphasize during his week-long trip, Bush said the United States is serious about helping the region meet the challenges that could undermine its recent record of explosive economic growth. He cited efforts to develop alternative energy sources, fight pandemic diseases such as AIDS and avian flu, and combat terrorism.

Pointing out that the United States does more trade across the Pacific Ocean than across the Atlantic, Bush said he wants his administration to remain deeply involved in the region.

Before his speech, the president met with Singapore's prime minister, Lee Hsien Loong. Accompanied by his wife, Laura, he also visited the Asian Civilizations Museum, where the two listened to a performance of Asian fusion music.

Bush briefly tried his hand at the saron, an instrument similar to a xylophone, tapping out a passable rhythm with a rubber mallet.

The president is scheduled to stay three nights in Vietnam, then visit Indonesia and Honolulu before returning to Washington on Tuesday.

Bush Warns N. Korea On Nuclear Transfers (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP, November 17, 2006

Hurt by election losses back home, President Bush tried to exert his authority on the world stage Thursday by warning a nuclear-armed North Korea against peddling its weapons and vowing the United States would not retreat into isolationism.

Bush's declaration came on the eve of his arrival in Vietnam for a summit of Asia-Pacific leaders and individual meetings with a handful of them — all curious about whether election setbacks had unsettled him. Striking moments for Bush in Hanoi will include a visit Friday to Communist Party headquarters for talks with the party's general secretary.

Bush directly challenged newly empowered Democrats in the U.S. who are demanding a fresh course in Iraq and are fearful that free-trade agreements could cost American jobs.

"We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to these opportunities," the president said in a speech at the National University of Singapore. "These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them."

Bush will turn to personal diplomacy in meetings Saturday and Sunday with Russia's Vladimir Putin, China's Hu Jintao, Japan's Shinzo Abe and South Korea's Roh Moo-hyun. All are partners with the United States in talks aimed at persuading a defiant North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons.

While North Korea's recent nuclear test has been widely condemned, the 21 members of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum appeared divided over what to say publicly.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who went to Hanoi a day ahead of the president seeking a consensus, said Thursday that North Korea must come to new disarmament talks ready to deal — or there is no point in holding such a session.

"I do think that after having set off a nuclear test that the North Koreans need to do something to demonstrate that they actually are committed to denuclearization that goes beyond words," Rice said. "Because after having set off a nuclear test, there's some skepticism about that."

Bush said the transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to others would be "a grave threat to the United States and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

"For the sake of peace," he said, "it is vital that the nations of this region send a message to North Korea that the proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated."

Bush's visit to the one-time wartime capital of Hanoi brought inevitable comparisons between Iraq and the divisive war fought and lost in Vietnam more than three decades ago. Like Vietnam, the United States faces a determined insurgency in Iraq; both wars have demonstrated the limits of U.S. power.

"Historic parallels of that kind are, I think, not very helpful and I don't think they happen to be right," Rice told reporters on the way to Vietnam. "This is a different set of circumstances with different stakes for the United States in a different kind of war."

Bush is the fourth U.S. president to visit Vietnam, where communist forces prevailed over the United States in a conflict that claimed more than 58,000 American lives. The others were Lyndon Johnson, Richard Nixon and Bill Clinton.

Bush's message in Asia was clear: The United States has been influential there for more than six decades and isn't about to pull back now. Many nations in the region are nervous about the rise of China and how Washington will react.

Despite Bush's tough talk, he was unable to deliver a promised agreement to normalize trade with Vietnam. The accord was held up by a House still in Republican hands, sending a bad signal across Asia about Bush's clout and the future of trade-liberalizing bills in the Democratic Congress taking power in January.

"In this new century," Bush said, "America will remain engaged in Asia, because our interests depend on the expansion of freedom and opportunity in this region."

He said the United States sees its role in Asia, a region with a history of colonialism, as one of "partnership, not paternalism."

In Singapore, the president met with Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong. He paid a courtesy call on acting President J.Y. Pillay and lauded Singapore's success at integrating its many ethnicities and religions by visiting its Asian Civilisations Museum.

Lee, who often has advised Bush on how to improve the U.S. image, particularly in the Muslim world, seemed pleased with the president's focus. "Singapore is very happy that America has a stake in the region, and is growing the stake in the region," Lee said.

With another foreign-policy priority pending on Capitol Hill — a civilian nuclear pact with India — Bush spoke by telephone from Singapore with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. The agreement has been approved by the House, and Bush told Singh that Republican Senate leaders have assured him they will act soon.

Bush, In Asia, Makes Appeal On North Korea (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE, Nov. 16 — President Bush opened a five-day tour of Asia today with a warning that North Korea poses a significant risk of selling its nuclear technology or bomb-grade nuclear fuel to other nations or to terror groups. Mr. Bush urged Asian nations to enforce United Nations sanctions against North Korea.

Meanwhile, American officials in Hanoi, where foreign ministers gathered today before the opening of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting on Friday, said that the United States is working with China and other Asian allies to press North Korea to take a visible step towards dismantling its nuclear program.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking with reporters in Hanoi, said that the coming resumption of long-running six-way talks with North Korea over its nuclear program would be pointless without shows of good faith from both sides.

Together, the statements by Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice suggest how much the issue of North Korea's newly acquired nuclear-power status is likely to dominate the APEC meeting, which usually focuses on trade issues.

Speaking at the National University of Singapore, Mr. Bush warned the North Korean government against aiding other nations, particularly in the Middle East, in their pursuit of nuclear weapons. He said there would be unspecified "grave consequences" if North Korea was ever caught shipping nuclear technology or weaponry abroad.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action," Mr. Bush said. "For the sake of peace, it is vital that the nations of this region send a message to North Korea that the proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated."

Mr. Bush did not directly mention Iran, but that was clearly the potential customer he had in mind.

Other senior administration officials have said in recent months that they are looking for evidence that North Korea is seeking to expand its dealings with Iran beyond the sale of missile technology. In a recent interview, Ms. Rice said that she had seen no such evidence that the two countries have cooperated in the nuclear arena.

Mr. Bush also sought to reassure American allies and trading partners that the United States was not on the retreat in the Pacific, just as China is rapidly expanding its influence throughout the region.

"In this new century, America will remain engaged in Asia, because our interests depend on the expansion of freedom and opportunity in this region," Mr. Bush said. "We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to these opportunities. These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them."

In these comments Mr. Bush appeared to be addressing members of his own Republican party who helped kill a deal that would have given control over several American seaport terminal operations to DP World, a company based in Dubai.

Many Republicans have also expressed reservations about free-trade agreements, even as the Bush administration has been pushing to revive stalled global trade talks.

In Hanoi, speaking after a breakfast meeting with some of her counterparts, Ms. Rice refused to say specifically what steps the United States and China are urging North Korea to take before the six-nation talks on its nuclear program resume, saying she did not want to negotiate in the press.

But other American officials said that the steps she had in mind could include the dismantling of one of the North's many nuclear facilities and the readmission of international inspectors.

The officials said they would like to see the dismantling begin with a facility like North Korea's five-megawatt reactor, which is continuing to produce nuclear fuel, or its plutonium reprocessing center, where spent reactor fuel can be turned into material for weapons.

"I do think that after setting off a nuclear test, the North Koreans need to do something to show they're committed to denuclearization that goes beyond words and just saying that they're committed to denuclearization," Ms. Rice said, "because after having set off a nuclear test, I think there's some skepticism about that."

Ms. Rice acknowledged that the United States will have to give a little to get a little. "There are principles on both sides, on denuclearization, and on movement toward the easing of tensions in economic and other relations" she said. "So I think, obviously, people will want to look at both."

But the main topic on the minds of American officials was on how to put enough pressure on the regime in Pyongyang to get real results out of the next round of negotiations.

That has been the rub in the disarmament talks, which have dragged on fitfully and inconclusively for several years before North Korea started boycotting them more than a year ago, angry over newly imposed American financial sanctions. Two weeks ago, China announced that the six-nation talks, which als include Russia, Japan and South Korea, would reconvene soon; American officials said at the time that the next meeting was likely in November or December.

But Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, is now known to have accelerated his pursuit of nuclear weapons even while his envoys participated in earlier rounds of talks. .Some analysts suspect that he has agreed to resume the talks now simply to forestall tough enforcement of the international sanctions prompted by Pyongyang's nuclear test and recent missile tests, and to persuade China and South Korea to ease his government's growing economic woes.

In fact, earlier this week, South Korea said it would not join a United States-led effort to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying unconventional weapons or related cargo. Even after the nuclear test, the government in Seoul has continued to hew to its policy of avoiding confrontation with the North.

Asked about that policy in Hanoi, Ms. Rice refused to publicly criticize South Korea. "Their context is different," she said, later adding that she did not have "any doubt that they are committed, and know they have to stay committed."

Privately, though, American officials have expressed frustration with South Korea, and say they are well aware of growing skepticism about whether the talks will succeed.

"The issue is, we really need this next round to be successful" and yield concrete results, one senior United States official said. "We can't emerge saying we set up a working group."

Given that friction, a face-to-face encounter between Mr. Bush and President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea at the APEC meeting may well turn testy. Mr. Roh has been vocal in criticizing what he has called a one-sided American approach to North Korea.

American officials say that Mr. Roh told them in Washington before the nuclear test that a detonation by the North would "change everything" in inter-Korean relations. But now that it has happened, one of Mr. Bush's senior national security aides said in Washington before the president left, "It seems to have changed almost nothing."

Mr. Bush arrived this morning here in Singapore, one of Asia's most prosperous corners, and spent the day sightseeing and meeting with local leaders, including Singapore's prime minister, Lee Hsien Loong. The president's visit is seen as a gauge of whether his influence has been diminished by his party's sweeping defeat in the midterm elections last week.

Stopping over in Moscow Wednesday while his aircraft refueled, Mr. Bush and his wife, Laura, had a 90-minute visit with President Vladimir V. Putin, which the White House described as largely social.

But it included some exchanges about whether Russia would support a United Nations Security Council draft resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for its continued defiance regarding its nuclear program.

On the way here, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, acknowledged that the two countries were still far apart on such sanctions.

"The issue is just what should be in the resolution," Mr. Hadley said after talking to his counterpart, Igor Ivanoff, in Moscow. "It's a little bit like sausage making — it's not pretty, and a lot of it spills out into the public. But I think the international community has held together on this issue, and I think we will again."

Russia has deep economic ties to Iran's nuclear power program: it is the supplier of nuclear reactors that are now under construction there. And Russia has expressed reluctance to impose sanctions, saying they would undercut efforts to reach a negotiated settlement. Bush administration officials make little secret of their frustration that Iran is still enriching uranium as the year draws to a close.

Asked about seeking Iran's help with ending violence in Iraq while pressing it at the same time on the nuclear issue, Mr. Hadley said the administration had no intention of easing up on one to win Iran's help on the other. "There's not a tradeoff between the two," he said. "Iran ought to have an interest in having a unified and stable Iraq."

In Moscow, the Kremlin's spokesman, Dmitry Peskov, described the meeting of the presidents and their wives as brief but "very positive." He said that among the subjects they took up was an agreement, already announced, for Russia to enter the World Trade Organization. When Mr. Bush travels to Hanoi on Friday, he will face a more difficult trade issue: Congress balked at final passage of a bill that would normalize trade relations with Vietnam.

Mr. Bush had hoped to have that bill approved and ready to bring with him; instead, Mr Hadley said, he will tell the Vietnamese that he believed the problems in Congress over the matter — some with Bush's own Republican allies — will soon be resolved.

Vietnam Rolls Out Red Carpet For Bush (FT)

By Amy Kazmin And Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Vietnam's communist rulers will on Friday suppress their irritation at the US rejection of a trade bill and roll out a red carpet for President George W. Bush. They are keen to deepen a relationship crucial to their country's future prosperity.

But the second US presidential visit since the end of the Vietnam war has spawned little of the public enthusiasm generated by Bill Clinton's ground-breaking trip six years ago.

As a Hanoi National University student at the time, Huy, now a 28-year-old IT professional, was thrilled to be among several hundred students invited to hear the then US president speak.

But as he sipped espresso and surfed the internet at a Hanoi café on Thursday night, Mr Huy expressed indifference towards Friday's arrival of Mr Bush. Initially describing his opinions as "too sensitive" to share, Mr Huy, who asked that his full name not be used, admitted he was unhappy with Mr Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq. "He is fighting so many countries," he said. "In the past, we were fighting so much, so we like peace. We hate war."

Such lukewarm sentiment towards the White House's current occupant seems widely shared on the streets of Hanoi, where questions about Mr Bush's visit are met with platitudes, rather than genuine enthusiasm. "We welcome Mr Bush as our visitor," said a young employee of a securities company, before acknowledging, "I liked Mr Clinton so much more."

The apathy over the visit does stem in part from a visceral antipathy towards the US military intervention in Iraq. Yet the striking change in attitude also reflects Vietnam's economic progress – and rising self-confidence – since euphoric Vietnamese lined the roads to welcome Mr Clinton, a gesture of an overwhelming desire to bury past enmity once and for all.

"It's comparing apples and oranges," said Adam Sitkoff, a former Clinton staffer, now executive director of the American Chambers of Commerce in Hanoi. "The Clinton visit was the first post-war visit by a US president, and it was back at a time when Vietnam hadn't integrated into the world economy as much.

"George Bush is coming here to see a Vietnam that is now a friendly country of the US, and that has normalised relations with the US," he said. "The types of discussions he is going to have here are very different than the types of discussions Mr Clinton had here."

Mr Bush's schedule – devoted primarily to meeting other leaders attending the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation forum summit – also suggests the administration sees little symbolism in the visit.

While a US administration official said Mr Bush did hope to "open a new chapter in US-Vietnam relations", the failure of the US House of Representatives to approve a bill to normalise trade relations with Vietnam permanently has cast a symbolic shadow over the visit, and raised the prospect that Hanoi will join the World Trade Organisation with US companies unable to take full advantage of its market opening.

Still, Hanoi is keen to strengthen further its relationship with Washington, which is better than ever before. Although two-way trade is now at $9bn (€7bn, £4.8bn) – making the US Vietnam's largest trading partner – "the potential re-mains huge between the two countries," Nguyen Tang Dung, the Vietnamese premier, said. "It is the consistent policy of the government of Vietnam to move forward, and push relations with the Americans."

Washington, too, is also keen to explore how to further links with a country strategically located on China's southern border, despite its concerns about the communist-ruled country's lack of political freedom and human rights violations.

Hanoi has sought to address some of Washington's preoccupations, particularly on religious freedom, leading to its removal this week from Washington's list of countries that repress religious worship.

Hanoi and Washington have also recently begun tentative military-to-military co-operation – with US warships docking at Vietnamese ports and senior Vietnamese military officers going to the US for study and training. "There is, I think, overall a very good sense that Vietnam is moving on the right path, that we ought to be engaged on it," said Derek Mitchell, a senior fellow in international security at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Yet the administration is torn over how far to pursue the ties, given what Washington sees as a clash over some key values. As Mr Mitchell puts it: "There is a debate within the administration, of course, of how strategic can Vietnam be, given it is 'communist Vietnam'."

Seoul Backs UN Vote Attacking N Korea (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

South Korea on Thursday said it would vote in favour of a United Nations resolution condemning North Korea for its human rights record, an about-face from its traditional practice of avoiding antagonising its neighbour.

The shift comes as Ban Ki-moon, the former foreign minister, prepares to take over the running of the UN, a move that has contributed to Seoul's realisation that it cannot stay silent about what it sees as one of the world's worst human rights situations.

The General Assembly was expected to vote late on Thursday on the resolution drafted by the European Union, the US, and Japan that urges Pyongyang to "fully respect all human rights and fundamental freedoms, and expend its full co-operation to the [UN's] special rapporteur" on North Korean human rights.

South Korea's foreign ministry said: "The government has decided to approve the resolution, and expects the decision to make contributions to the improvement of human rights as a universal value and serve as a stepping stone to facilitate concrete dialogue and co-operation between North Korea and the international community in the field of human rights, which is needed more urgently after the nuclear test."

Song Min-soon, the incoming foreign minister, said on Thursday that the nuclear test and missile launches contributed to the change in position. Meanwhile, Kim Jang-soo, the incoming defence minister, said that "North Korea is a direct threat", according to the Associated Press.

Seoul abstained from three previous UN votes on North Korean human rights to avoid jeopardising its attempts to foster closer economic and political ties with its neighbour, a pattern that irked many in the EU and the US who have been pushing for international condemnation of Pyongyang's rights record.

The development comes amid public dissatisfaction with the government's "sunshine policy" of engagement after last month's nuclear test and increasing divisions among policymakers over how to respond.

Officials in the foreign ministry are understood to be promoting taking a tougher line on human rights but to be encouraging the resumption of humanitarian aid suspended after the July missile launches.

US Panel Seeks Broader Sanctions Against China (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, November 17, 2006

A US Congress-appointed panel sought broader sanctions against Chinese firms proliferating unconventional weapons and wanted Beijing to inspect ships plying to or from nuclear-armed North Korea's ports.

DOJ_NMG_0095936

The United States-China Economic and Security Review Commission said in its annual report that current sanctions against Chinese companies that proliferate equipment and technology related to weapons of mass destruction should be "broadened and harmonized for increased effectiveness."

The 12-member bipartisan panel wanted Congress to urge the government "to seek agreement with China to carry out inspections at sea of ships bound to or from North Korean ports, and establish a US-China joint operation to inspect for contraband shipping containers" to or from the Stalinist state.

They were among 44 recommendations in the commission's 234-page report to Congress. It was written after eight hearings this year and a flurry of meetings, including with US defense and Chinese government and Communist Party officials and scholars.

Noting that China had contributed at least indirectly to North Korea's nuclear weapons program and aided Iran's atomic activities, the commission warned that "Chinese proliferation threatens US security and potentially could place at risk US troops" operating in East Asia and the Middle East.

In June, the United States imposed sanctions on four Chinese companies linked to providing support for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, a key actor in developing Iran's missile program.

All of the firms had been sanctioned previously under US laws.

"Chinese companies and government organizations continue to proliferate weapons, weapons components and weapons technology," the report said.

"Some of these transfers violate China's international nonproliferation agreements, harm regional security in East Asia and the Middle East, and are a measure of China's failure to meet the threshold test of international responsibility in the area of nonproliferation," it said.

Following UN Security Council sanctions in October against North Korea for a nuclear weapons test, China said it would not be involved in interdicting North Korean ships on the open seas, but did agree to inspect cargo passing through its territory.

Washington has acknowledged that China has begun inspecting trucks traveling across China's border to North Korea.

The commission's chairman, Larry Wortzel, in releasing its report Thursday, said that "while China is a global actor, its sense of responsibility has not kept up with its expanding power."

As the world moved to address problems such as proliferation of ballistic missile technology and weapons of mass destruction, "the Chinese government has, at the least, stood in the way, and in some cases actively contributed to the underlying problems," said commission vice chairman Carolyn Bartholomew.

The commission urged Congress to instruct the US government to insist that China take "more significant measures" to denuclearize the Korean peninsula and counter North Korean proliferation activities.

China is the major source of aid and trade for impoverished North Korea.

The commission also asked the US director of national intelligence to establish a more effective program for assessing the implications of China's military modernization and development.

The report said that notwithstanding China's "commendable efforts" to persuade North Korea to remain involved in multilateral talks aimed at ending Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program, Beijing has "refused to use its leverage effectively."

It said that China also had refused to cooperate in efforts by a number of nations to persuade or force Iran to halt its military nuclear program.

Attach Conditions To U.S.-Vietnam Trade (USAT)

By Aimee Phan

USA Today, November 17, 2006

For many Vietnamese-Americans, a trial last week in Vietnam was their worst nightmare realized.

Three Vietnamese-Americans were convicted on terrorism charges last Friday. Along with four Vietnamese nationals, they were found guilty of plotting to use radio equipment to call for a public insurgency against the Communist regime. The defendants were accused of having ties with the Government of Free Vietnam, which Hanoi regards as a terrorist organization. According to its website, the California-based pro-democracy group claims to advocate peaceful protest against the current regime.

What does the verdict say to other Vietnamese-Americans, many of whom have returned on occasion to visit their homeland? It says that should they return again to Vietnam, even for a visit, that they remain vulnerable to the whims of the Communist regime.

The defendants were sentenced to 15 months with 14 months time served. One of the American citizens has already been deported to the USA; the nationals will remain under house arrest.

The trial's timing has drawn global attention, especially because President Bush is scheduled to visit Hanoi today for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Summit. On Monday, the House defeated a bill that would have permanently eased U.S. trade restrictions against Vietnam. While Republicans plan to revive the bill, several members of Congress have cited concerns about Vietnam's record on human rights.

The case gives the Bush administration an opportunity to leverage trade relations with Vietnam in exchange for improved human rights policies. The fact that these defendants were held for more than a year before being charged, without chance of bail or access to the evidence used against them, only validates fears among Vietnamese-Americans that Vietnam is still a hostile environment and doesn't yet deserve normalized relations with the United States. The case also raises the question of what constitutes an act of terrorism. In Vietnam today, terrorism apparently includes merely voicing a view critical of the government.

In its eagerness to join the World Trade Organization and strengthen U.S. ties, Vietnam claims to have moved past the war. But such rhetoric rings painfully insincere in light of this case. Views of dissent are apparently still seen as dangerous.

Vietnamese refugees made the USA their home to escape the political persecution that still occurs in Vietnam. Now they'd like to see the United States use its diplomatic influence to press Vietnam to reconsider these detrimental policies.

U.S. Economic Leadership (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

THE ANNUAL summits of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum became a fixture in the 1990s partly because the United States hoped to use them to open Asian markets. But President Bush's presence in Vietnam for this year's APEC gathering highlights faltering U.S. economic leadership. Mr. Bush hoped to arrive bearing Congress's blessing for Vietnam's accession to the World Trade Organization. But this prize has eluded him. Meanwhile, the APEC summit has rekindled hopes of progress on the Doha round of international trade talks. But the U.S. ability to participate constructively in those talks will soon expire, because Mr. Bush's trade-promotion authority runs out next summer. A Democratic Congress seems unlikely to renew it.

The Vietnam deal in particular demonstrates the perversity of congressional obstructionism on trade. U.S. negotiators have helped to secure access to Vietnam's markets as a condition for its joining the World Trade Organization. The negotiation is complete, and Vietnam will join the WTO irrespective of what Congress says. But Congress does have the power to shoot itself in the foot: If it refuses to ratify the deal, other WTO members will enjoy the market access that Vietnam has promised while the United States is denied it. An attempt to pass enabling legislation failed in the House this week, and a second attempt was pushed into December.

Congress is also sending confused signals on a trio of trade preferences due for renewal. One preference bill would extend trade concessions to four Andean countries -- Colombia, Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador -- that will otherwise expire at the end of this year. Another would help textile producers in Africa and Haiti. Yet a third would extend the Generalized System of Preferences, which helps more than 100 countries. Colombia's president, Alvaro Uribe, said last week that the risk of nonrenewal has already caused U.S. apparel companies to switch orders away from his country. Colombia is a pro-American democracy struggling against drug lords. This is not the way to treat it.

The preference bills are threatened by a minority in Congress who represent vulnerable textile regions and a majority that is supportive but lethargic. But even if Congress eventually bestirs itself to pass these measures, a fiercer battle will be joined on free-trade pacts that Mr. Bush has negotiated with Peru and Colombia. Both deals build on the market access granted by the preferences and end the periodic scramble for renewal; both would offer the United States new export opportunities. But the Democrats want to use their new majority status to write in tougher labor and environmental provisions. Reopening these deals will delay and possibly kill them, and the premise for doing so is wrong: The elected leaders of Peru and Colombia don't need the threat of trade sanctions to care about environmental damage or harsh labor practices that affect their citizens. By holding up trade deals that could raise living standards and provide alternatives to slash-and-burn agriculture, the Democrats will help neither workers nor the environment.

The world's trading system has been progressively opened since 1945, largely thanks to U.S. leadership. This has been one of the great achievements of the American era; denying the economic evidence that trade boosts growth is like denying the scientific evidence for climate change. Because the expansion of trade has coincided with a rise in inequality, many American voters are understandably skeptical of its benefits. But the Democrats must respond to that concern by implementing tax and spending policies that distribute prosperity more evenly, not by abandoning the nation's role as the chief driver of trade liberalization.

Russia's Role In Asia (WT)

By Vladimir Putin

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Since 1998, Russia has been a full-fledged member of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC). In the run-up to the APEC summit in Vietnam, I would like to share my views about the road traveled by this multilateral association and, naturally, about the prospects for our cooperation.

In the 17 years since the creation of the forum, it has grown into one of the most representative and established organizations to promote integration in Asia and the Pacific. Today, APEC member nations comprise the world's most dynamically developing economic zone, and our experts predict that the forum's leading positions will become even stronger.

As a Eurasian power, Russia's plans for social and economic development (particularly in Siberia and the Far East) are closely linked with active participation in regional integration. For us this is a natural and strategically necessary approach.

First of all, we appreciate APEC's expertise in working out rules for trade, economic and investment cooperation. Needless to say, cooperation in this sphere is largely guided by World Trade Organization criteria. Russia has not yet joined the WTO, but we closely watch its activities and take part in them whenever possible, specifically by joining in efforts to reduce transaction costs and excessive state regulation of the economy, and to improve national economic legislation.

We understand APEC's goals of consolidating the fundamentals of the market economy and invigorating public-private partnership with a view to encouraging medium-sized and small businesses and promoting social development. We are very interested in the formation and proper functioning of various free trade zones within APEC. We are thoroughly studying APEC countries as models for improving our domestic investment environment, as well as their experience in fighting corruption. They are of practical importance for our reforms, which are aimed at building up and diversifying Russia's foreign economic contacts.

We fully share the economic and social aspirations of APEC's members. In this respect, we value the forum's assessment of Russia's individual action plan in APEC.

At the upcoming summit in Hanoi, we are going to discuss a plan of action to implement the already approved "roadmap" for achieving the Bogor goals. We have high expectations for this project, and we hope that it will become a major step towards building a system of free and open trade and investment in the region.

At the same time, it is obvious that the road to achieving these goals is not as easy as it might have seemed during the adoption of the Bogor Declaration and the Osaka Action Plan. We are well aware of changes in the world's political and economic situation and of new challenges. The latter, by threatening international security and stability, hinder normal economic development both worldwide and in individual regions. The APEC forum and its members should take into account these ongoing changes. I believe it is necessary to avoid a situation in which the rigid formulas set for the Bogor Declaration contradict the logic of global development and the real potentialities of the APEC economies.

APEC was formed primarily as an economy-focused multilateral mechanism, but real life is continuously placing issues of international and regional politics on its agenda.

One of its key goals is countering international terrorism. The APEC members and other countries of Asia and the Pacific are at different levels of development. It is no secret that terrorists are actively seeking a "temporary shelter" in some of the less prosperous regions. Therefore, along with measures to eliminate hotbeds of terrorism, it is essential to completely eradicate the social roots of terrorism — poverty, hunger and chronic unemployment. In general, it is important to bridge the gap in the social and economic development of nations.

I am convinced that APEC will provide us with quite a few opportunities to achieve this goal. We must help the poorest countries in their efforts to encourage public-private partnership, investment and other economic activities. To this end, APEC should primarily use its own funds, as well as money provided by international organizations and financial institutions for specific projects.

The humanitarian and ideological aspects of the struggle against terrorism are no less important. APEC's initiative to promote dialogue between cultures and religions is especially significant in this respect. Asia and the Pacific is a region of unique cultural and ethnic diversity, and it should develop immunity to the ideology of confrontation between civilizations, as well as to nationalism and extremism. I am certain that APEC's spirit of trust, tolerance and partnership will help fulfill this task. I believe it is highly symbolic that Indonesia and Russia, with their unique multi-ethnic populations professing different religions, have played a major role in drafting this initiative.

It is necessary to continue efforts to eliminate funding for terrorism. APEC has been clear enough in setting this goal, which is further evidence of its ability to adapt itself to the realities of today. I would like to emphasize Russia's preparedness to take an active part in working with its partners to reach this goal.

We are also open to cooperation with APEC in the fight against organized crime, drug trafficking and arms smuggling. I am sure that our countries' law-enforcement bodies can do more than simply exchange relevant information. We should plan and implement coordinated actions against criminals.

It is extremely important to ensure the security of transportation and information. This is one of the major conditions for trade and telecommunications, which are vital for the vast Asia-Pacific region. Governments and the business community are equally interested in ensuring their normal functioning and dependable protection against criminals.

Russia recently made a specific contribution to cooperation in this sphere by putting forward an initiative in the framework of APEC's counterterrorism task force. This proposal calls for creating a system to protect key energy facilities that would allow for a prompt response to emerging threats.

International energy security plays a key role in economic development. We acknowledge that this is an urgent matter for many APEC members due to rising global oil prices.

As a major supplier of energy to world markets, Russia is open to cooperation in this sphere. We are convinced that the terms should be beneficial for all partners. They should rest on the mutual responsibility of energy producers and consumers, a fair distribution of risks between them and an exchange of assets in the energy sector. I'd like to mention that the plan of action approved at the Group of Eight (G-8) summit in St. Petersburg provides for measures to enhance the transparency, predictability, and stability of energy markets, and to improve the investment climate as a whole. Along with these measures, it is important to develop energy-saving technologies, and to diversify types of energy sources and their transportation routes. It is also necessary to take practical steps to ensure the safety of the energy infrastructure, help energy-starved countries and tackle environmental problems.

All these issues are particularly important now that APEC is increasingly interested in having a new, more reliable energy system. Russia is prepared to take an active part in implementing this large-scale initiative. Moreover, we are going to propose and implement a number of specific infrastructure projects, specifically, the construction of oil and gas pipelines to supply Asia and the Pacific with hydrocarbons from eastern Russia. I believe that APEC has the capability to guarantee continuous delivery of energy to the region.

In addition, cooperation in APEC opens up new possibilities in the fight against infectious diseases. It is in our common interest to establish an effective system for exchanging information and making coordinated decisions in order to combat epidemics and pandemics. We fully support the development of an APEC partnership to create an early-warning system for emergencies in the region and jointly deal with their aftermath.

We are extremely interested in APEC's interaction experience in innovation, especially in developing nanotechnologies and exchanging information in such high-tech areas as IT and biotechnologies. Russia is committed to invigorating cooperation in these and other spheres, which will determine scientific and technical progress in the near future. It goes without saying that the APEC nations should pay greater attention to the development of cooperation in education.

In conclusion, I'd like to emphasize that we are optimistic about APEC's future. We are capable of meeting new challenges and steadily moving towards our common development goals. The main topic of the forthcoming summit in Vietnam — "building a dynamic community for sustainable development and prosperity" — clearly shows the direction of this movement.

Russia, having made the important decision to work with APEC, intends to take a vigorous part in addressing future challenges together with other members.

I am convinced that APEC, which has already achieved impressive results, is capable of accomplishing much more for the benefit of our nations and for the promotion of peace, stability and progress in our shared region.

Vladimir Putin is president of Russia.

Don't Give Up On Russia (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

For George W. Bush, meeting Vladimir Putin is no longer an uplifting opportunity to look into the Russian leader's eyes and glimpse a kindred soul. Their encounters have become exercises in damage limitation or unavoidable bits of scheduling during international conferences.

In private talks with aides and foreign leaders in recent months, Bush has voiced profound disillusionment with Putin, according to a half-dozen foreign and U.S. officials aware of the details of such conversations.

"We have lost Putin," Bush is reported to have said in several conversations. "Putin fears democracy more than anything else," the president added sadly in one comment describing the Russian, whom Bush had praised enthusiastically after their first summit in June 2001 as "straightforward and trustworthy" and a partner for "a new approach for a new era."

Bush and his aides work hard to observe diplomatic formalities and to keep signs of this disillusionment out of public view. So the two leaders exchanged smiles and a hug when Bush briefly stopped over in Moscow this week on his way to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi, where Bush and Putin are due to meet again on Sunday.

But the thrill is gone -- just as earlier attempts by Bush's father and Mikhail Gorbachev, and by Bill Clinton and Boris Yeltsin, to base White House-Kremlin ties on personal relations ended in disappointment and frustration on both sides. American and Russian presidents seem condemned to challenge and then confirm the maxim that nations have interests, not friends.

As recently as May -- when Vice President Cheney delivered a forceful but seemingly personal denunciation of Russia's backsliding on democratic freedoms -- Bush was still emphasizing the need to work with Putin. But by the time of the Group of Eight summit hosted by Putin in July, Bush had begun to echo in private Cheney's darker public vision, and he amplified on it later in closed-door sessions held in September at the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly and elsewhere.

And when Putin cavalierly dismissed the assassination of Russian dissident journalist Anna Politkovskaya last month, Bush made his own statement of concern about the killing rather than let an earlier, weaker State Department reaction stand as the U.S. response.

The turn by Bush has been cumulative rather than sudden, as I understand it, and is fueled primarily by the president's reluctant but hardening conviction that Putin has no desire or intention to make Russia's society more democratic. Russian equivocation on the joint U.S.-European effort to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons is another important factor in the downturn.

It is easy to understand why Bush has dropped his earlier enthusiasm for Putin. But Washington and Moscow have two looming opportunities to put political and trade relations on a sounder footing and make their relationship less vulnerable to personal ups and downs.

At the NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, at the end of this month, Bush may be tempted to go back on a tentative compromise that Washington has struck with its European and Canadian allies concerning future alliance membership for Georgia and Ukraine. The United States has agreed not to push for the meeting to adopt a clear membership plan for the two former Soviet republics and to settle instead for a more cosmetic "intensified dialogue" with Georgia and silence on Ukraine.

The compromise still makes sense. Cooling the escalating tensions between Russia and Georgia should be the urgent priority, especially after Georgia's unsteady handling of recent border incidents and the publicizing of the discovery of a bumbling Russian spy ring in Tbilisi. The collapse of Ukraine's reform government robs that country of any national consensus on NATO membership.

The second opportunity will provide an early test in foreign policy for the new Democratic majorities in the U.S. House and Senate. The administration has reached a bilateral agreement with Russia on the latter's application to join the World Trade Organization. But Congress must drop the symbolic Cold War restrictions on trade contained in the 1974 Jackson-Vanik law for the new accord to come into effect.

Jackson-Vanik, which attempted to exert pressure on the Soviet Union to permit Jewish emigration to Israel, is a carryover from a time gone by. Its sentimental value is far less than the irritation it creates in a relationship that needs more ballast, not more burrs.

Bush's clearing vision of Putin's flaws and the American leader's candor with his peers are welcome developments. But they make it even more important for the United States and Russia to seize opportunities that reinforce a relationship that cannot for long be dominated by personal ties. Just ask George H.W. and Gorby, or Bill and Boris.

Nuclear Deal With India Wins Senate Backing (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — The Senate gave overwhelming approval late Thursday to President Bush's deal for nuclear cooperation with India, a vote expressing that a goal of nurturing India as an ally outweighed concerns over the risks of spreading nuclear skills and bomb-making materials.

By a vote of 85 to 12, senators agreed to a program that would allow the United States to send nuclear fuel and technology to India, which has refused to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The agreement, negotiated by President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India in March, calls for the United States to end a long moratorium on sales of nuclear fuel and reactor components. For its part, India would divide its reactor facilities into civilian and military nuclear programs, with civilian facilities open to international inspections.

Critics have been unwavering in arguing that the pact would rally nations like North Korea and Iran to press ahead with nuclear weapons programs despite international complaints and threats. Opponents of the measure also warned that the deal would allow India to build more bombs with its limited stockpile of radioactive material, and could spur a regional nuclear arms race with Pakistan and China.

Senator Richard G. Lugar, the Indiana Republican who is chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, hailed the measure's passage as "one more important step toward a vibrant and exciting relationship between our two great democracies."

His endorsement was significant, coming from a senator respected for efforts in nonproliferation and whose name is part of a sweeping program to secure nuclear bomb-making materials in the former Soviet Union. He also expressed "thanks for a truly bipartisan effort" to Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat set to become Foreign Relations chairman in the new Congress.

While advocates of the measure said it would be an incentive for India to refrain from nuclear tests, denunciations came quickly from a minority of senators who opposed it, as well as from critics in the House.

"It is a sad day for U.S. national security when the Senate passes a sweeping exemption to our nonproliferation laws that will allow India to increase its annual bomb-production capacity from 7 to over 40 bombs a year," said Representative Edward J. Markey, co-chairman of the House Bipartisan Taskforce on Nonproliferation. He said the measure "sends the wrong signal at a time when the world is trying to prevent Iran from getting the bomb."

After the vote, the White House issued a statement from President Bush praising passage of the bill.

"The United States and India enjoy a strategic partnership based upon common values," the statement said. "The U.S.-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation agreement will bring India into the international nuclear nonproliferation mainstream and will increase the transparency of India's entire civilian nuclear program."

The Senate rejected several amendments that sponsors said would clarify or narrow the deal, including one that would have required India to halt all military relations with Iran. The legislation, as passed, does contain a new provision that requires the president to declare that India has joined multinational efforts to contain Iran's nuclear program before the United States-India nuclear deal moves forward.

The Senate legislation now must be matched to the House version, which passed in July by a vote of 359 to 68; both chambers then must approve the final language. Even with Senate approval, the package will not move forward until both houses agree to specifics of a nuclear-cooperation accord with India. A complementary deal between India and the International Atomic Energy Agency also must be reached.

When the plan was announced, India pledged to classify 14 of its 22 nuclear reactors as civilian facilities. That would put those reactors under international inspections for the first time. But other reactors would remain under Indian military jurisdiction, and not open to inspectors.

After India and Pakistan conducted surprise nuclear tests about eight years ago, the Clinton administration imposed economic sanctions on both countries. But the Bush administration's effort to enlist allies for its global antiterrorism campaign brought an end to those sanctions.

Senate Endorses U.S.-India Nuclear Deal (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

The Senate on Thursday overwhelmingly endorsed a plan allowing the United States to ship civilian nuclear fuel and technology to India, handing President Bush an important victory on one of his top foreign policy initiatives.

Senior lawmakers from both political parties championed the proposal, which reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy, saying it strengthens a key relationship with a friendly Asian power that has long maintained what the United States considers a responsible nuclear program. The vote was 85-12.

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., called the plan "a lasting incentive" for India to shun future nuclear weapons tests and "to cooperate closely with the United States in stopping proliferation."

Bush, in a statement issued during a trip to Asia, praised the Senate for endorsing his plan, saying it will "bring India into the international nuclear nonproliferation mainstream and will increase the transparency of India's entire civilian nuclear program."

His remarks were echoed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in Vietnam with the president for a meeting of Asia-Pacific leaders. "This really does open up an extraordinary new era, both in U.S.-Indian relations, but also I think for the many interests that will served, from the economic point of view, from an energy point of view and from a nonproliferation point of view," she said.

Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware said the endorsement pushes America "a giant step closer" to a "major shift in U.S.-Indian relations. "If we are right, this shift will increase the prospect for stability and progress in South Asia and in the world at large," he said.

Even with the strong approval by the Senate, however, several hurdles loom before India and the United States could begin civil nuclear trade.

First on that list, lawmakers in the House, which overwhelmingly endorsed the plan in July, and the Senate must now reconcile their versions into a single bill before the next congressional session begins in January. That bill would then be sent to Bush for his signature.

Critics argued that the plan would ruin the world's nonproliferation regime and boost India's nuclear arsenal. The extra civilian nuclear fuel that the deal would provide, they say, could free India's domestic uranium for use in its weapons program. Pakistan and China could respond by increasing their nuclear stockpiles, sparking a regional arms race.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., called the agreement "a horrible mistake" that "provides a green light" for India to produce more nuclear weapons. "I believe one day we will look back at this with great regret," he said.

During debate Thursday, supporters beat back changes they said would have killed the proposal by making it unacceptable to India. Critics said the changes were necessary to guard against nuclear proliferation.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., unsuccessfully proposed a condition that would have required India to cut off military-to-military ties with Iran before allowing civil nuclear cooperation.

Rep. Ed Markey of Massachusetts, a Democratic critic in the House, said the Senate's endorsement of the proposal "sends the wrong signal at a time when the world is trying to prevent Iran from getting" a nuclear bomb. The plan, he said, would set "a precedent that other nations can invoke when they seek nuclear cooperation with countries that also refuse to abide by nonproliferation rules."

The bill carves out an exemption in American law to allow U.S. civilian nuclear trade with India in exchange for Indian safeguards and inspections at its 14 civilian nuclear plants; eight military plants would be off-limits.

Congressional action is necessary because U.S. law bars nuclear trade with countries that have not submitted to full international inspections. India built its nuclear weapons program outside the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which provides civil nuclear trade in exchange for a pledge from nations not to pursue nuclear weapons.

There are other necessary steps before U.S.-Indian nuclear cooperation could begin. An exception for India must be made by the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an assembly of nations that export nuclear material. Indian officials also must negotiate a safeguard agreement with the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

And once technical negotiations on an overall cooperation agreement are settled between India and the United States, the U.S. Congress would then hold another vote on the overall deal.

US Senate Approves India Nuclear Deal (FT)

By Jo Johnson And Farhan Bokhari And Edward Luce

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

The US Senate on Thursday night approved the Bush administration's historic deal to legalise nuclear trade with India, an important step in the ending of a 30-year-old technology denial regime.

The deal was approved in a 85-12 vote after the Republican-led Senate defeated several amendments that India had said would kill the deal, including a requirement that New Delhi end military cooperation with Iran.

Several more critical approvals - by Congress, the International Atomic Energy Agency and the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group - are needed before the agreement can take effect. But the Senate vote means India is getting closer to being able to purchase US nuclear fuel, reactors and related technology.

The approval came despite concerns that the deal would encourage India to expand its nuclear weapons arsenal and spur a regional arms race with nuclear rivals Pakistan and China.

Washington is especially concerned that China's President Hu Jintao will give the green light to an ambitious expansion of Beijing's controversial nuclear co-operation with Pakistan during his visit to Islamabad next week.

The delicacy of south Asia's nuclear balance was underscored on Thursday as Pakistan test-fired a nuclear capable medium-range missile, a day after peace talks with New Delhi.

The medium-range missile, which can hit targets at a distance of 1,300km, was launched to mark the end of military exercises being held at an undisclosed location, an army statement said. Pakistani army chiefs described the test as routine.

Under the US-India accord, reached during President George W. Bush's visit to India this year, New Delhi would be allowed access to US civilian nuclear technology in return for a pledge to open its non-military nuclear facilities to international inspections.

However, Manmohan Singh, India's prime minister, on Thursday reiterated New Delhi's concern that elements of the bill would be unacceptable to New Delhi. The bill would allow members of the Nuclear Suppliers Group to provide nuclear fuel to India in exchange for India agreeing to submit most of its civil nuclear plants to international safeguards.

Washington has rejected Pakistan's requests for similar treatment to India, with Mr Bush describing the two rivals as "different countries with different needs and different histories".

Islamabad has been pushing for a similar deal from China for well over a year, but there remain doubts as to whether Beijing will risk international goodwill by supplying fresh technology to a country with the weakest of proliferation records.

China has helped Pakistan build two nuclear energy reactors at Chashma in the Punjab province, while an older Canadian-supplied nuclear energy reactor exists in Karachi, the southern port city. Western officials say Pakistan has successfully built up other nuclear facilities near Islamabad, the capital and at locations in the Punjab, where it produces fissile material for use in nuclear warheads.

A Pakistani official said future supplies of nuclear reactors from China would come with safeguards according to international standards applied by the Vienna based International Atomic Energy Agency.

"If the US can supply nuclear energy reactors to India under what it says are adequate safeguards, why can't that logic apply to Chinese reactors for Pakistan," the official said, on condition of anonymity.

When Pakistani president Pervez Musharraf visited Beijing in February, both sides announced they would "continue strengthening co-operation in the peaceful use of nuclear energy".

India Nuclear Deal Advances (LAT)

By Henry Chu

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

NEW DELHI — The U.S. Senate on Thursday overwhelmingly approved a civil nuclear cooperation deal with India aimed at improving ties between the world's two largest democracies.

Officials in both nations hailed the 85-12 vote on the controversial accord, which would give India access to American nuclear fuel and technology.

In return, India would allow United Nations inspections of its civilian reactors, though not its military facilities.

"We welcome the passage of the bill on Indo-U.S. civil nuclear cooperation in the U.S. Senate by an overwhelming majority. This, undoubtedly, reflects the very broad bipartisan support which this initiative enjoys," Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee said in a statement this morning.

But mindful that House and Senate versions of the legislation must be reconciled, he added: "We must await the final version before drawing any conclusions on the legislation."

In Washington, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said Thursday the historic deal would "increase the prospect for stability and progress in South Asia and in the world at large."

The Indian government had watched the bill's progress for months. Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has staked much of his foreign policy on strengthening ties with the U.S., and the nuclear deal forms the cornerstone of that effort.

But the legislative process is not over. After the Senate and House versions of the bill are reconciled, the final bill would need the signature of President Bush, who has lobbied intensely on its behalf. Finally, Congress would be asked to approve a treaty formalizing the pact.

If turned into law, the agreement would overturn decades of U.S. policy on curbing nuclear proliferation.

India has refused to sign the worldwide Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, leading to the nation's isolation on the nuclear issue for 40 years. In 1998, India and archrival Pakistan shocked the world by conducting dueling nuclear test explosions.

Critics say that lifting long-established nuclear sanctions against India would reward New Delhi's noncompliance with international norms at a time when Washington is trying to rein in nuclear activity in Iran and North Korea.

Detractors also contend that India could buy nuclear fuel from the U.S., then divert some of its domestic uranium to weapons. An arms race in South Asia could ensue.

"I believe one day we will look back at this with great regret," said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.).

Supporters say India has proved itself a responsible nuclear power. Some U.S. officials have also pushed the deal as a way to counter China, a historical rival of India.

There are already signs that Beijing may retaliate: On a visit to the subcontinent next week, Chinese President Hu Jintao is expected to announce a similar civil nuclear cooperation accord with Pakistan.

India was concerned this year as U.S. lawmakers began proposing restrictive amendments to the nuclear deal that New Delhi considered unacceptable.

The Democratic sweep in the U.S. midterm election also raised concerns that the bill would fail to get passed before the year was out, which would send it back to the drawing board.

But Bush telephoned Singh earlier Thursday to assure the Indian leader of his continued support for the deal. And in the Senate vote, all of what Indians termed the "killer amendments" were defeated, including one that would have required India to stop producing weapons-grade nuclear material.

California's Democratic senators split on the deal, with Dianne Feinstein voting for the bill and Barbara Boxer opposed.

Senate Approves Deal With India Over Nuclear Fuel (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a major foreign policy and commercial diplomacy victory for the Bush administration, the Senate overwhelmingly passed a resolution that will allow the U.S. to begin sharing nuclear fuels and technologies with India.

President Bush has made the establishment of a strategic partnership with New Delhi a cornerstone foreign policy objective for his administration, while American businesses have seen the deal as a gateway to improved trade and investment relations with the world's second-most populous country. U.S. government officials believe assisting India in its economic and military development will allow the South Asian nation to combat Islamic extremism and serve as a major counterweight to China's growing power across Asia.

Mr. Bush hailed the bill's 85-12 passage during his trip to Vietnam yesterday, announcing in a statement that it will "bring India into the international nuclear nonproliferation mainstream and will increase the transparency of India's entire civilian nuclear program."

The Senate move, which comes as Mr. Bush heads into a meeting with Asian leaders, offsets somewhat the setback he suffered earlier this week, when the House blocked quick passage of a free-trade agreement with Vietnam.

Despite the deal's easy passage through the Senate, congressional officials said a number of roadblocks still need to be cleared before the U.S. can begin shipping nuclear fuels to the subcontinent. The House passed a different version of the pact, and the two chambers need to try and reconcile the versions before they adjourn in December.

And Washington still needs the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an international body that regulates the trade in nuclear fuels, to provide New Delhi with clearance. After that, the Bush administration and the International Atomic Energy Association still must reach an agreement with New Delhi over the inspection regime that's required in order for the transfer of nuclear fuels.

Still, U.S. industry is already reacting positively to the Senate's move. A number of U.S. corporations, such as General Electric Co. and Boeing Co., are expected to benefit from the new initiative in India.

"India's nuclear energy market -- estimated to require $100 billion in foreign direct investment -- will open for U.S. companies," said Ron Somers, president of the U.S.-India Business Council.

Senate Backs White House Plan For India Nuclear Deal (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The Bush administration won overwhelming Senate support yesterday for its plan to create a broad strategic partnership with India that reverses decades of U.S. nonproliferation policies and requires changes in laws aimed at limiting the spread of nuclear weapons.

The Senate voted 85 to 12 in favor of legislation that would carve out an India-specific exception to laws that forbid transfers of nuclear technology to countries such as India that have not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Senate passage brings the administration a step closer to completing its deal with India.

Advocates of the plan, including many Democrats with close ties to the India lobby, see it as a way to cement ties with a rapidly modernizing, friendly democracy whose economic and military strength could one day rival China's.

Although the effort has garnered little attention outside Washington, it has the potential to radically alter U.S. foreign policy for decades. Bush administration officials say they believe it will accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China and provide the United States with a new foothold in Asia.

R. Nicholas Burns, the administration's top negotiator on the India deal, welcomed the bipartisan support late yesterday and called the agreement "one of the most important foreign policy initiatives of the last several years."

But the plan, still being negotiated by U.S. and Indian officials, has fierce opponents among arms control experts, some of whom argue that it will weaken efforts to rein in countries such as Iran and North Korea while potentially triggering an Asian arms race.

"The benefits of the deal have been overstated, while the downsides are significant," said Daryl Kimball, director of the Arms Control Association. "The administration and Congress are gambling that the downsides will not occur."

Under the deal, India would receive badly needed nuclear fuel and technology to meet the energy needs of its 1.1 billion citizens. But that arrangement would also allow the New Delhi government to divert its existing nuclear infrastructure to produce additional weapons.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), who had fought passage of a similar bill in the House in July, lamented that the deal "will allow India to increase its annual bomb-production capacity from seven to over 40 bombs a year."

But Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) called the plan "a lasting incentive" for India not to test nuclear weapons and "to cooperate closely with the United States in stopping proliferation." The deal does not prevent India from testing, however, and nowhere does it obligate India to adopt U.S. nonproliferation goals.

India's close relationship with Iran, meanwhile, has irked some on Capitol Hill. Iran's foreign minister met yesterday in New Delhi with India's prime minister. The countries have close military, economic and political ties and are in discussions over a proposed gas pipeline from Iran to India.

In January, congressional leaders requested a secret intelligence assessment of India's nuclear program, the potential effects of the deal and New Delhi's ties to Tehran. Intelligence officials said they provided a paper in April, but staff members on Capitol Hill said it did not address Iran or any aspect of the deal.

Two senators, Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), offered amendments to the bill yesterday that would have forced India to choose between the United States and Iran when it comes to military cooperation, terrorism and nuclear issues. Both were defeated after India said it would consider them deal-breakers.

The House and Senate will sort out minor differences in their bills before bringing legislation to the full Congress for a vote. The deal with India, however, is far from complete.

Negotiators need to finish talks that have been mired in disagreement. India must separate its military and civilian nuclear infrastructure and reach a separate agreement with U.N. inspectors. The deal also needs approval from an international consortium that controls nuclear exports. Officials say it could be a year before the deal is brought back to Congress for a final vote.

Zapatero Unveils New Middle East Initiative (FT)

By Victoria Burnett

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Spain, France and Italy plan are to present a new Middle East peace initiative to their European partners at an EU summit in December, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, Spanish prime minister, said on Thursday.

Spain hopes to gain the backing of Germany and Britain for the initiative, calling for an immediate ceasefire, the formation of an internationally recognised Palestinian unity government and a peace conference.

“We cannot remain impassive in the face of the horror that continues to unfold before our eyes,” Mr Zapatero told reporters during a summit of Spanish and French leaders in Girona, Spain.

“Peace between Israel and the Palestinians means, to a great extent, peace at an international level,” he said.

Mr Zapatero’s government has struggled to carve out a role on the international stage, following the withdrawal of troops from Iraq after his election in 2003, despite the presence of Spanish troops in Afghanistan and Lebanon. His most high–profile international initiative, reviving the “alliance of civilisations” to foster better relations between Western and muslim countries, has been dismissed by critics at home as wishy-washy.

Jacques Chirac, French president, said Mr Zapatero had proposed the joint initiative when they met at the beginning of the summit, according to [a news service]. The two had arranged to call Roman Prodi, the Italian prime minister, to discuss the initiative.

Mr Chirac said France would “act jointly” with Spain, Italy and other European countries to “try to initiate indispensable moral and political reforms in the Middle East.”

The peace initiative would include an exchange of prisoners, talks between the Israeli and Palestinian leaders and an international mission to monitor the proposed ceasefire.

Blair Sees Chance For Progress On Middle East Conflict (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Mary Jordan

DOJ_NMG_0095946

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 16 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday offered hope for progress on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying that "sensible Arab and Muslim countries" now see "strategic reasons" for finding a solution and that new initiatives could come within weeks.

"This is an opportunity for us if we are prepared to seize it now," said Blair, citing leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan as among those who "want to make progress" on an issue he called the "crux" of problems in the Middle East.

Blair, in an interview with The Washington Post at his 10 Downing Street office, declined to provide specifics but said British officials were holding private talks with Middle Eastern governments as well as the Bush administration about measures "to move this forward."

The prime minister is also planning a trip in the next few weeks to the Middle East, which he said was facing a "critical moment."

Blair, who has been President Bush's chief foreign ally on Iraq, said he had no regrets about the 2003 invasion that toppled the government of Saddam Hussein, even though the continuing war has cost him dearly in British public opinion.

"If you left Saddam there, you would have had a whole stack of different problems, and in the end you'd have had to have dealt with Iraq at some point," said Blair, who spoke with passion and certainty about his policies despite growing demand in Britain and the United States for a reassessment of Iraq strategy.

Discussing remarks he made Tuesday during a closed-door video conference with the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel in Washington reviewing Iraq policy, Blair said that any solution to Iraq must begin with progress on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Israel-Palestine is the one issue that, unresolved, allows extremists to gain purchase on the more moderate elements of the Muslim and Arab world," he said, sipping coffee next to the marble mantelpiece in his office.

Blair, who has said he will step down before next September after serving since 1997, said Islamic extremists are using the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as a propaganda tool, "so there is a huge additional dimension to its importance."

He said the "next few months are critical" on the Israeli-Palestinian issue: "My worry is there is increasing not just poverty and despair on the Palestinian side but also disintegration, and that is very dangerous."

"So we either decide that we are going to take this moment and use it to drive forward, or obviously there's a danger that the whole region takes a wrong turn," he said.

Blair brushed aside a question about whether he was being unrealistic to think significant progress was possible toward a solution that has eluded a long succession of world leaders. He said focusing on the Israeli-Palestinian problem was "the only realistic thing to do."

Blair said that critics complained for years that sectarian violence in Northern Ireland was too intractable to be solved but that peace accords have ended most violence there.

He said that on the Israeli-Palestinian problem, people generally agree on the long-term solution -- two independent states -- but the difficulty is in hammering out the details.

"Everybody accepts that there's got to be two states," Blair said. "Now, there are issues like Jerusalem, refugees . . . which are very difficult." But "it's not beyond the wit of man" to devise a territorial solution, he said.

"I believe totally in supporting Israel's security," Blair said. "But the truth is the ultimate security lies in a viable and democratic Palestinian state and in resolving the issues with Israel's neighbors."

Blair said Iran has been a divisive force in the Middle East, backing radical elements of Hamas in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the Hezbollah militia in last summer's war with Israel. He has also said Iran's backing of Shiite militias in Iraq has been destabilizing there.

Blair said moderate leaders in the region now "can see that the way that Iran has been manipulating these disputes in the region changes the dynamics of power." He said that beyond the fact that many neighbors in the region have sympathy with the Palestinian cause, they now also believe it is in their strategic interest to counter what he called a "cocktail of elements of extremism and fanaticism."

Despite the Iraq war and the other conflicts, Blair said he saw reasons for optimism in the Middle East.

"You go to these Gulf states and you see the changes they're making in their democracy, the changes in their economy," the prime minister said, citing the United Arab Emirates as an example. "There is a way of moving forward in the Middle East that is about step-by-step greater democracy, opening up their economy and presenting themselves to the world in a modern and moderate light."

As the Middle East "is in the process of decision about its future," Blair said, "we have got to be in there, since we've got the right policy. I mean, what do people choose when they're given the chance? They choose to live in free, democratic societies. So we've got the best case."

DOJ_NMG_0095947

Asked if he thought the Democratic Party's victory in last week's U.S. congressional elections signaled growing momentum for a reduction in U.S. troops in Iraq, Blair said he was sure Bush "will see this through."

"I don't think you will see the administration backing away from fulfilling what it said it would do," Blair said. "There should never be any doubt, whether it's in terms of myself or the president. We have said that we will stay as long as the Iraqi government needs us to do so."

Blair also said that a key goal in Iraq was to continue to "plug any gaps in the armed forces and their training," because "the Iraqis want to take greater responsibility, and we have got to empower them to do so."

Blair said a friend who recently traveled to Iraq told him that with all the obvious problems, there was a "danger that you move from having been unduly optimistic to unduly pessimistic."

He said it was understandable that as Iraq makes the difficult transition from decades of "brutal repression" under a dictator to democratic rule, "you will have all sorts of poison that then flows out."

But people in Iraq, he said, are committed to creating a "nonsectarian future" because "the alternative is no future."

Blair also made an impassioned plea for the United States to lead the world on climate change, an issue that Blair has championed despite reluctance from the Bush White House.

"There's a big opportunity for the administration and for America on climate change," he said. "What you guys should do is come up with a sensible plan and framework" that encourages business to invest in environmental technology innovations and wins support from emerging powers such as China and India.

"No country is going to mess up its economy to meet some agreed target," Blair said. But private industry will "quickly spot an opportunity" if new markets are created for environmentally friendly technologies, he said.

Blair noted that Bush made a "pretty bold" statement about America's "addiction to oil" in his last State of the Union address.

Now, he said, Bush should follow up with "a framework that can help cure that addiction," then pitch it to the rest of the world, saying, "Come on, everybody has got to do this."

Israeli Response To Gaza Rockets: Official Restraint, Civilian Flight (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

SDEROT, Israel, Nov. 16 — The biggest reaction on Thursday to the death of an Israeli woman killed by a rocket shot from Gaza did not come from the military, as it usually does. Instead, this desert town that has been hit the hardest by the recent rocket fire packed up en masse to take advantage of an offer from one of Israel's richest men for a free week at the beach.

"The children are frightened — very frightened," said Galit Abduraam, 38, curbside with her three children waiting for a bus out of town.

"It's not just now," she said. "It's four or five years. The children have nightmares. They don't sleep. They get aggressive. They don't study."

Despite calls from some Israelis for an invasion of Gaza after the woman's death on Wednesday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert signaled that he would respond with restraint. He told reporters on his flight home from the United States that while Israel would continue targeted attacks, a large-scale assault would not necessarily solve the problem of the crude homemade Qassam rockets fired by Palestinian militants into Israel nearly every day.

"There are many opinions on how to deal with the Qassam fire," he said. "We have to remember that this war will not be over in one blow."

This is a delicate time in negotiations among Palestinian leaders who are trying to form a unity government of professionals and technocrats. Mr. Olmert's remarks seemed to indicate that a new Israeli offensive would not add to the already-deep difficulties of striking a deal.

Just back from visits to Egypt and Jordan, the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, arrived in Gaza on Thursday for another round of talks. He spoke with Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, who is a member of Hamas, the militant group that controls the government.

The intention in forming a new government that would not be beholden directly to any faction is to try to restart the flow of millions of dollars in badly needed foreign assistance that was cut off after Hamas took power in March.

The new government could also benefit Israel. The talks include discussion of the status of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the Israeli soldier captured in June near Gaza, and the international pressure for the Palestinians to renounce violence, including halting the rocket fire.

Since the beginning of the year, the Israeli military says, 1,000 Qassams have landed in Israel. Palestinians call the rocket attacks legitimate resistance to Israeli military actions. Israeli military efforts to stop the rocket fire have killed about 300 Palestinians, many of them civilians, since Corporal Shalit's capture.

The death on Wednesday of the Israeli woman, a 57-year-old émigré from Russia, was the first from the rockets here in 16 months. But that comes as no comfort to residents of this poor town of 20,000, many of them Moroccan and Russian immigrants, near the border with Gaza.

School is canceled frequently, and residents complain of constant fear.

"Even when the toilet lid falls, it makes us jumpy," said Ariel Cohen, 44, who was waiting for a bus with his wife and their daughter, May, 7, who had been in the same nursery class as a 4-year-old boy killed by a Qassam in 2004.

After the death on Wednesday, hundreds of families decided to take up an offer made Thursday by Arkady Gaydamak, a Russian businessman known for his charitable works here but wanted in France for arms dealing and tax evasion, for an all-expenses-paid vacation in the southern beach city of Eilat. During the war with Lebanon this summer, Mr. Gaydamak paid to relocate thousands of people out of range of rocket fire in Israel's north.

By early evening, 17 buses had taken away more than 800 people. An organizer working for Mr. Gaydamak said that buses would continue to arrive for everyone who wanted to go.

The military said three Qassams fell near Sderot on Thursday, injuring no one but damaging a kibbutz.

Palestinian Rivalry Rings Up Cost Of Guns (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

NABLUS, West Bank -- An arms race by rival Palestinian militants has nearly doubled the price of guns in anticipation that fighting in the Gaza Strip between Hamas and Fatah militias will spread to the West Bank.

In recent months, the cost of an M-16 short-barrel rifle has surged to 9,000 Jordanian dinar, or about $13,000, from 5,000 dinar. Bullets cost a little more than a dollar, about twice the price in Israel, said Abu Ali, who claims to be the No. 1 arms dealer in the West Bank.

Mr. Ali, who uses a pseudonym for fear of arrest by the Israeli army, is a member of the Fatah-linked Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade. He said he gives discounts to fellow Aqsa members and that he refuses to sell to rivals from Hamas, who buy their guns elsewhere.

"Hamas is buying a lot of weapons and they will pay anything for them," said Mr. Ali, 27. "People don't want money and they don't want food. They want to prove their existence on the street."

Mr. Ali declined to talk about his work at a public cafe.

So instead, the Palestinian militant hopped into a stolen sedan and drove a reporter to an empty industrial area on the outskirts of the city, where he pulled out a military-issue pistol with "Israel Military Industries" engraved on the barrel.

"Whatever you want I can get," he said.

Since Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority in March, tension between Hamas- and Fatah-affiliated militias has frequently exploded into street warfare.

The crisis has been sharpened by the strain of an international aid boycott of the Hamas government.

Government salaries of more than 140,000 public-sector employees, most of them linked to Fatah, have gone unpaid. While teachers and bureaucrats walked off the job, security officers have staged violent protests, and the government has ceased to function.

As the vacuum of lawlessness that has existed in the Palestinian territories for years grows even wider, rival security outfits as well as gunmen from mafialike clans are moving to fill the gap.

As the inscription on Mr. Ali's pistol indicates, the source of most of the weapons is Israel. The dealer says he acquires guns from Arab Israelis as well as dealers from Israel's criminal underworld.

Just after dusk at the city municipality, the echo of gunfire mingled with normal din of car horns. It's a sound that's become part of Nablus' background noise, explained Mayor Adly Yaish.

"When we are happy we shoot. When we are angry we shoot" he sighed. "At funerals we shoot, and at weddings we shoot. It's not good, of course."

Of all the West Bank cities, Nablus and its refugee camps are known as the most resilient stronghold of Palestinian militancy. Israel's army has forbidden Palestinian police from carrying guns in the city for fear they might be used against Israeli soldiers during the frequent raids in the city.

And so, militants are left free to openly brandish their weapons in carjackings and robberies. Nablus residents insist there are two types of weapons in the city: Those used in "national" attacks against Israel and those used in criminal activity.

Mr. Yaish, the mayor, said he is worried that the guns will be used in a new way. Speculation that Hamas wants to establish its own security force in the West Bank is fueling concern that internecine fighting of recent months in Gaza may spread to the West Bank, where Fatah is dominant.

"I am working very hard to prevent this from happening," said the mayor, who explains he speaks to both Hamas and Fatah. "In Nablus we can solve our problems without force."

But that principle might be difficult to explain to militants in their teens and twenties for whom guns have become a sort of youth culture. In the warrens of the Balata refugee district, Ibrahim Muroufi takes his prized possession, an M-16 rifle with a sniper scope, and lays it across his lap.

Opposite the 22-year-old Aqsa Brigades member, a computer monitor flashes a slide show of young men in a variety of poses with guns: Reclining on a bed, peering down from a balcony in ambush, and against a picture studio's illustrated backdrop of a mansion foyer.

"This is part of my hobby and identity," said Mr. Muroufi. "If I were to get a million dollars, I would spend it entirely on weapons."

Mr. Muroufi's mother explained why Nablus parents can't stand in the way of children who take up arms: "My children carry arms because there is no security. If I could carry a weapon, I would, too."

U.S. Aid Ship Cures Public Opinion (WT)

By Anju S. Bawa

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Public opinion polls conducted in two of the more populous Muslim countries showed that humanitarian aid from a U.S. Navy hospital ship had healed more than health problems. When people were made aware of the mission, it left a positive perception of the United States. These findings will encourage more such missions, officials said.

The polls, by the Washington group Terror Free Tomorrow, showed that 87 percent of Indonesians and 53 percent of Bangladeshis who had heard of the hospital ship USNS Mercy's mission to provide medical aid had a better opinion of the United States. The results were announced yesterday at the National Press Club.

Kenneth Ballen, president of Terror Free Tomorrow, which promotes fighting terrorism by winning popular support, said there was a need to hear the voice of the people.

"We hear the voice of radicals and extremists because they are the loudest. ... We need to get in there and see what people really think," he said.

The polls surveyed 1,209 persons in Indonesia and 1,010 in Bangladesh, both with a margin of error of plus or minus three percentage points. People from a variety of economic and social dispositions were surveyed in various parts of the countries, Mr. Ballen said. The Indonesian poll was conducted by the agency Lembaga Survei Indonesia.

Humanitarian efforts "undermine ideological support for terror," said Karen Hughes, undersecretary of state for public diplomacy.

"There is a misunderstanding about America," she said. "People don't realize that the United States is the No. 1 donor of medicine and food to the Palestinian people."

The USNS Mercy finished a five-month mission in September to Indonesia, Bangladesh, Philippines and East Timor. Navy personnel and volunteers from Project Hope, a health care aid organization, were among the medical providers that cared for 61,000 patients, performed 1,000 surgeries and gave 10,500 immunizations.

Some of the crew and volunteers visited the same areas they served after the December 2004 tsunami and the March 2005 earthquakes in Southeast Asia.

The polls also showed that American aid after the natural disasters led to a more favorable opinion of the United States. Adm. Michael G. Mullen, chief of naval operations, said he was committed to continuing missions with civilian volunteer organizations.

The Navy employs two hospital ships, the USNS Mercy and Comfort. The USNS Mercy has 1,000 beds, 85 intensive care units and 12 operating rooms.

Adm. Mullen said he would explore ways to deploy one ship in the Pacific and one in the Atlantic. "Latin America and Africa are in the next round."

Rice Praises Peacekeeping Efforts (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095950

HANOI, Vietnam, Nov. 17 — By agreeing in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into the war-stricken Darfur region, Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir has a chance to rehabilitate its image in the rest of the world, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Speaking to reporters here at the annual meeting of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation, Ms. Rice hailed the deal struck in Addis Ababa by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Mr. Bashir, which reversed the Sudanese government's longstanding refusal to let United Nations troops into Darfur. A small African Union peacekeeping force has been unable to quell the violence in Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have been killed in brutal ethnic and tribal warfare since 2003.

For months, the Bush administration has been leaning on Sudanese officials to accept a U.N. force, but to no avail.

"I think it certainly is a real opportunity to resolve what is an extremely difficult problem," Ms. Rice said, "and to get back on a road where innocent people can be protected and the Sudanese government has a chance to make right with the international system."

Sudan Says It Will Accept U.N.-African Peace Force In Darfur (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 16 — The Sudanese government on Thursday agreed in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into the war-stricken Darfur region, reversing its longstanding refusal to let United Nations troops in.

The agreement, reached after a day of talks with United Nations officials in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital, raised hopes for a more effective peacekeeping effort in Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have been killed in brutal ethnic and tribal warfare since 2003. A small African Union peacekeeping force has been unable to quell the violence.

It is not clear how soon the new force can enter Darfur. Two major issues must still be worked out before the agreement becomes final: the number of troops, and how the commander will be selected.

A document issued by the parties in the talks — members of the Security Council, the Arab League, the African Union and a number of African leaders — specified a force of 17,000 soldiers and 3,000 police officers. The issues will be taken up at a meeting scheduled for next Friday in Brazzaville, Congo Republic.

"This is welcome news, after working tirelessly to find a solution for Sudan," said Richard A. Grenell, a spokesman for John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations.

Andrew S. Natsios, the American special envoy for Sudan, was at the meeting in Addis Ababa.

The agreement was a breakthrough. Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, had repeatedly rejected requests by Western leaders for a United Nations force in Darfur, a vast arid region in western Sudan. Fighting has grown worse in recent weeks, despite a peace accord signed in May by Sudan and the main Darfur rebel group.

It was not clear what made the Sudanese leaders change their minds. But a United Nations official who was present said the Chinese ambassador to the United Nations, Wang Guangya, had played a role in persuading Sudan's foreign minister, Lam Akol, that there was no hidden agenda in the effort to introduce a stronger peacekeeping force. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, citing diplomatic protocol.

The agreement is something of a personal triumph for Kofi Annan, the departing United Nations secretary general. He introduced the idea of a hybrid force and lobbied African leaders for days before convening the meeting.

Sudanese rebels said Thursday that government troops and militias had killed more than 50 people in an attack in northern Darfur, [a news service] reported. Sudanese officials told Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary for humanitarian affairs, that all of his proposed destinations for a three-day tour of Darfur were too dangerous to visit.

The agreement calls for more money, troops and equipment to be given to the African Union force, whose mandate expires on Dec. 31, to supplement a $21 million package that is already being delivered with the permission of the Sudanese government. But the core proposal is the new joint force, which is to be "predominantly African in character" while including "command and control structures" provided by the United Nations.

The agreement notes that all parties agreed to take into account "the security situation along the Chad-Sudan and Central African Republic borders," where violence has spilled over from Darfur.

The conflict in Darfur pits non-Arab tribes against the Arab-dominated government of Sudan, which has armed deadly militias that have massacred civilians. The government says the violence has been exaggerated for political reasons.

Agreement Reached On Darfur Peacekeepers (AP)

By Les Neuhaus

AP, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095951

African, Arab, European and U.N. leaders agreed in principle Thursday to a joint African Union-United Nations peacekeeping force for Sudan's Darfur region.

Sudan, which has strongly opposed allowing U.N. troops in the country, did not give the plan its unreserved approval because officials needed to consult with their superiors, said the country's U.N. ambassador, Abdul Mahmoud Abdelhaleem.

The force could be as large as 27,000, including the existing 7,000-member AU peacekeeping force in Darfur, but the leaders did not lay out a timetable for the force to begin work partly because Sudan had some reservations.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said the additional personnel could include as many as 17,000 soldiers and 3,000 police officers.

A timetable for the expanded force to begin work was not announced partly because Sudan retained some reservations, including the question of who would be in charge.

"The next step is for the U.N. and AU to call a meeting of the non-signatories (of the Darfur Peace Agreement) ... and the government of Sudan. It should take place in the next couple of weeks to resolve outstanding issues by the end of the year," Annan told reporters.

The U.N. Security Council voted in August to replace the African Union's 7,000 troops, an underpowered force, with 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers. But Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir has so far refused to allow their deployment, saying they would be "neocolonialists."

The agreement was announced at a meeting in Ethiopia that brought together senior officials from the AU, the Arab League, the European Union, Sudan, the United States, China, Russia, Egypt, France and a half-dozen African countries.

"The United States welcomes the successful outcome of this historic meeting," Andrew Natsios, the U.S. special envoy to Sudan, said in a statement.

The expansion of the existing AU force will take place in three phases, said Annan, who had wanted to try to stop the bloodshed in Darfur before he leaves office on Jan. 1.

An African Union Peace and Security Council meeting will be held in the Republic of Congo on Nov. 24 during which Sudan is expected to present its final views, Annan said.

The senior British government representative at the meeting, International Development Secretary Hilary Benn, called on the Sudanese government to "accept the clear view of all the others present."

Benn called the joint U.N.-AU focus on Sudan "the best opportunity we have to bring this crisis to an end. In the mean time, we need an effective cease-fire, with all the parties committing to stop the fighting."

In recent days, pro-government militia forces known as janjaweed have stepped up attacks on villages in Darfur, killing dozens of people, international observers said Wednesday. In one raid, janjaweed militiamen — backed by government troops — forced children into a thatched hut, then set it ablaze, killing parents who tried to rescue the children, rebels said.

After years of low-level clashes over water and land in the vast, arid Darfur region, rebels from ethnic African tribes took up arms against Sudan's Arab-dominated central government in 2003. Khartoum is accused of unleashing the janjaweed. The militiamen are accused of many of the atrocities in a conflict that has killed some 200,000 people and chased 2.5 million from their homes.

The conflict has destabilized a wide region that includes parts of neighboring Chad and the Central African Republic. The chaos has been exploited by rebels from Sudan, Chad and the Central African Republic, and ethnic violence mirroring attacks in Darfur has been seen in Chad in recent weeks.

The Sudanese army has denied any connection to janjaweed attacks, saying the claims were politically motivated.

The U.N. humanitarian chief, who was visiting Darfur, said he had been told by people made homeless by the conflict that the withdrawal of non-governmental organizations from some areas had left them with fewer services and more exposure to violence.

"This is my fourth visit to Darfur, and I have never before seen such a bad security situation," Jan Egeland said from El Geneina, capital of West Darfur, according to a statement. "There are too many armed elements in and around the camps threatening the inhabitants and preventing us from going in."

"Aid workers in West Darfur cannot move on the roads because they are being attacked and their vehicles are being stolen," Egeland said.

Human Rights Watch has called for a major increase in the Darfur peacekeeping force to stop the growing number of attacks on civilians.

The New York-based advocacy group said it has documented renewed aerial bombing of civilians both in Darfur and inside neighboring Chad since late October.

DOJ_NMG_0095952

The aid agency Doctors Without Borders, or Medecins Sans Frontieres, also reported that thousands of people have fled their homes and refugee camps in Darfur. The agency said it was increasingly difficult to provide aid to the victims because of the violence.

Sudan Closing Off Darfur To Outside World (CSM)

By Katharine Houreld

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

The African Union patrol was only seven miles from Sirba, the site of one of the latest Darfur massacres, when they were forced to turn back. Nearly 400 Arab militiamen in Sudanese government uniforms, with new Land Cruisers and weapons, blocked the dusty track.

Tuesday's incident was only the latest in a crackdown on access for international observers, journalists, and humanitarian organizations - a pattern that is becoming wearily familiar to those working in Darfur.

"The timing is no coincidence," says Leslie Lefkow of Human Rights Watch. "[Sudan is] stemming the flow of information from Darfur while it continues to commit massive crimes and run a military campaign."

As outgoing UN chief Kofi Annan began a major push to stem the escalating crisis during high-level meetings in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, Thursday, the Sudanese government told top UN humanitarian official Jan Egeland that all his proposed destinations on a three-day trip to Darfur are too insecure to visit this weekend.

Last week, the Norwegian Refugee Council announced it was being forced out of Darfur after its permit to operate had been indefinitely suspended for the fifth time, making working conditions "impossible." Other foreign aid workers say they have been denied permission to reenter the country after leaving to attend a family emergency or to seek medical treatment. Killings mount

Thirty villagers were reported killed this week in Sirba, but no outside investigators have been able to enter the town to confirm the reports.

Sudanese rebels accused government troops and militias Thursday of killing more than 50 people in another attack. Two weeks ago, 63 people were reported killed in Jebel Moon, and their bodies buried in the desert.

In that case, investigators were able to access the massacre site, and found that more than 20 of the victims were children. Some of them had been shot through the head. Survivors described Arab men in uniforms, with Thuraya satellite phones, new vehicles, and animals, similar to the group seen only a few miles away barring the road to Sirba.

The government-backed militias have been blamed for hundreds of atrocities since local, non-Arab tribes first took up arms to protest government neglect and the arming of Arab tribes three years ago. Since then, an estimated 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have fled their homes.

After the government signed a peace deal with one of the three rebel factions last May, the militias, known as the janjaweed, were supposed to be disarmed. Instead, the government appears to be using them as a proxy force to avoid accusations of cease-fire violations. But accurate reporting of militia movements, and alleged massacres, is becoming increasingly difficult. Crackdown on journalists, aid workers

Journalists able to secure a visa face a bewildering array of permits and paperwork; the Sudanese government must be informed in advance of any travel in Darfur. Officials insist on listening to interviews; they intimidate interviewees, and have attempted to confiscate notebooks.

"I can take any of [your permits] I want ... you're going to hell," one official hissed at this reporter. "Do you think this is a free country?" Last week, all permits for journalists to travel to the region were being denied.

The African Union (AU) monitoring force of nearly 7,000 soldiers is also frequently stymied in its investigative attempts. Officials say fuel is stolen, government permission for them to leave their bases is refused, and their soldiers have been killed when convoys were attacked.

During the one-day talks in Ethiopia with UN, EU, and Arab League officials Thursday, Mr. Annan pushed for a "hybrid" force of AU and UN peacekeepers to be allowed into Darfur. But early indications were that Sudan would reject this.

Even humanitarian organizations, charged with delivering food, water, and medicine to destitute Sudanese, are under attack. When Doctors Without Borders spoke out about rape cases last year, its two most senior staff were arrested. Since then, aid agencies say the situation has worsened.

"It's disgusting. They are holding their own people hostage to shut us up," complained one aid worker bitterly. "If we speak out, we get thrown out. Then who will help these people?"

DOJ_NMG_0095953

Tens of millions dollars and a Herculean effort have managed to stabilize key humanitarian indicators like the infant mortality and malnutrition rates, and aid agencies are reluctant to risk their hard-won gains by criticizing the government for atrocities.

All aid workers interviewed for this article agreed to speak only on condition of anonymity.

But it's not only the government that is piling on the pressure. Thirteen humanitarian workers have been killed since last May's peace deal, which pitted signatory and non-signatory rebel groups against each other. As the fighting intensifies along the Chadian border and in the north, all sides in this conflict want vehicles and the shiny white 4x4s used by aid groups are a tempting target.

Carjackings of both aid vehicles and commercial trucks are rampant. In a single day last month, nine vehicles were snatched. Convoys have also been attacked and employees beaten up or sexually harassed, say aid workers here.

The breakdown in security means vast swaths of northern Darfur are no-go areas for groups providing food, medicine, and clean water for tens of thousands of displaced villagers. "It's become very dangerous to work here," says another aid worker, whose organization has suffered repeated attacks. "Before, we could negotiate with the rebels for safe access, but now we don't know who controls what territory any more."

Pinned on the wall behind her was a series of maps showing humanitarian access for Darfur month by month. The inaccessible areas, colored orange, are spreading like spilled ink.

Misery Spirals In Burma As Junta Targets Minorities (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

CAMP EITUTA, Burma -- In a burgeoning encampment here on Burma's eastern frontier, Hay Nay Tha, a 30-year-old mother of three, awakens in the darkness most nights to the sound of her children's screams.

"They keep having nightmares about our journey here," she said.

That journey, Hay recalled, began when she was four months pregnant and government soldiers torched her village and forced local farmers off their land. It ended four weeks later, after her husband died of malaria en route to this camp. She and her children arrived here this summer dehydrated and exhausted. Hay soon went into early labor with a stillborn son.

"To be honest," the copper-skinned woman said, shyly gazing down at her hands, "I am having nightmares, too."

Nightmares of all kinds are rife in this camp, where new clusters of villagers arrive almost daily, a consequence of Burma's largest military offensive against its own people in more than a decade, according to aid groups and Western diplomats. The offensive has targeted minorities such as Hay, a member of the restive Karen ethnic group, which has long maintained a measure of autonomy.

According to estimates by relief groups, Burmese forces have burned down more than 200 civilian villages here in Karen state, destroyed crops and placed land mines along key jungle passages to prevent refugees from returning to their home villages. Dozens of people have died, and at least 20,000 civilians have been displaced over the past eight to 10 months.

"What is now going on in Burma are crimes against humanity," said Sunai Phasuk, head Burma consultant for New York-based Human Rights Watch. "The military government has significantly stepped up their systemic policy of violence against the ethnic Karen with this offensive. We're talking about a mounting disaster."

Burma's military leaders have historically been secretive about their actions. But observers say they are attempting to build a broad security cordon around their new capital near the inland city of Pyinmana, located only a few miles from the border of Karen state. The result has been an extraordinary use of force to clear out existing villages in the area.

Since seizing control of the country in 1988, Burma's military junta has taken a series of harsh measures to secure its grip on power, and over the past several months, it has appeared to step up its arrests of opposition figures. Win Ko, a leading member of the National League for Democracy, was arrested last month and sentenced to three years in prison after staging a petition drive to free political prisoners. The party's leader, Aung San Suu Kyi, winner of the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize, remains under house arrest.

Observers say the junta has reserved its most brutal treatment for Burma's eastern ethnic groups, including the Karenni, the Shan and the Mon, as well as the Karen, the largest minority in the region.

A fiercely independent group of approximately 3 million people, the Karen speak a separate language from most Burmese, use their own ancient writing system and have traditionally opposed the military junta. Two decades of sporadic government campaigns have already driven hundreds of thousands of Karen and other refugees into neighboring Thailand, where at least 150,000 now live in official camps and an estimated 1.5 million dwell illegally.

Although the military has long fought the Karen National Liberation Army -- a seasoned militia of about 10,000, armed with aging assault rifles -- it has mostly seemed content to stage small, periodic sieges against mountain strongholds in Karen state's northwest. These sieges have typically taken place only during Southeast Asia's dry seasons.

But this year, the government's campaign has extended through the rainy season and assumed far larger dimensions, appearing to be a final assault aimed at smashing the resistance. Over the past 10 months, sources familiar with Burmese military actions say, its forces have pushed into major Karen strongholds, building 12 new permanent army bases.

Burmese government officials did not return phone calls seeking comment from their embassy in Washington. But observers say the campaign is almost certainly tied to a desire to extend security around the new capital, which is meant to serve as a protective jungle fortress for the junta. The Burmese have already begun moving government offices there from Rangoon, the old capital, and are finishing work on a sprawling military bunker.

Economic development appears to be another motivation for the offensive, according to observers. Burma, a country that was once one of Southeast Asia's richest nations and is now among its poorest, has sought to create revenue by signing a deal with Thailand to build multiple dams on the picturesque Salween River, which runs through Karen state. As the Burmese military attempts to exert its control over the river, it has moved into other Karen strongholds.

"The new capital and the dam projects have become an incredibly destructive pretext for the Burmese military to take control of Karen state using indiscriminate force," said Jack Dunford, executive director of the Thailand Burma Border Consortium (TBBC), a U.S.-funded relief group based in Bangkok. "I fear this may be the beginning of the end there."

An increasing number of Karen civilians fleeing the violence have made their way here to Eituta, an emergency camp perched on a muddy hilltop overlooking Burma's border with Thailand. The rows of primitive bamboo huts are protected by a battalion of armed Karen soldiers.

With Eituta's population topping 1,500, and growing at a rate of about 10 percent a month, Karen authorities here are making plans for a second camp nearby.

Although the Thai government has adopted a more lenient policy on Burmese refugees in recent years, aid groups say the bureaucratic process of admitting new arrivals has been slowed by the sudden uptick in the number of Karen seeking asylum. With the new military offensive, the number of arrivals at the already over-crowded official Karen refugee camps in Thailand has jumped 60 percent, to almost 900 a month, according to the TBBC.

The situation has effectively created a precarious limbo for the displaced people at Eituta, located only two hours by foot from the nearest Burmese military outpost. Almost two-thirds of the refugees here are children younger than 12, many of whom are sick with malaria and dysentery.

Relief organizations have cut out a section of the dense jungle canopy to build a small medical clinic. But the wounds of many children here run deeper than any medicine can cure.

On a recent day at the camp, a foreign journalist with a video camera approached an ethnic Karen man and a smiling 2-year-old girl sitting on straw mats in their hut. Suddenly, the girl began screaming uncontrollably. "She thinks it's a gun," said her father, Saw Say Nay, pointing to the video camera.

Saw, a farmer, fled here with his family of four last month. Like many displaced Karen, they had been living in hiding in the jungle since the summer, when Burmese troops began constructing a base near their village of Sayztaing Gyi, about 40 miles from the new capital.

"They were going village by village, forcing men and women into labor," he said. "Then they started burning villages, so we packed what we could and escaped into the jungle. From the trees, we saw them set our homes on fire. They burned our crops. They left us with nothing."

Thin and languid from malaria, Saw said he found out there was no going back after one villager tried to return, only to lose his leg when he stepped on a freshly laid land mine.

"We don't know what to do," he said. "My heart wants to go back, but I know it is not safe for my family. I don't know if we can go to Thailand. I don't know if they will accept us. So we are here. We have nowhere else to go."

Royal Wins French Socialists' Nomination (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, November 17, 2006

Segolene Royal got a running start Thursday to her campaign to become France's first female president, decisively beating two rivals to wrap up the nomination for the main opposition Socialist Party in a single round of voting.

The win, which party officials announced with about 40 percent of votes counted, spared Royal a second round against her two rivals from the party's old guard — Former Prime Minister Laurent Fabius and former Finance Minister Dominique Strauss-Kahn.

DOJ_NMG_0095955

It also meant she can head into the April vote claiming the oft-divided opposition party is fully behind her.

"The results show rather clearly the fact that there will only be one round, and we can say that Segolene Royal is already the candidate for the Socialist Party," said Stephane Le Foll, chief of staff to the party's general secretary.

By the final tally, Royal had collected 60.62 percent of votes, while Strauss-Kahn won 20.83 percent and Fabius gained 18.54 percent, Le Foll said. About 82 percent of the 219,000 party members eligible to vote cast ballots.

Strauss-Kahn and Fabius conceded defeat, their spokesmen said.

Royal, 53, has sought to tap into broader voter disillusionment with politics after two terms under conservative President Jacques Chirac marred by corruption scandals and stagnation.

However, her unorthodox views have also alienated many people within her party, and her opponents say she won't be able to unite the divided French left.

"Tomorrow, I'll have the job of bringing them all together — including those who didn't vote for me," Royal said in the victory speech. "I am counting on them."

The Socialists, who dominated the French political scene a generation ago, have been searching for direction since former Prime Minister Lionel Jospin's embarrassing third-place finish in the last presidential vote, in 2002.

The party also has been licking its wounds since the national referendum on the European Union Constitution last year, which caused a massive rift in the party — and French voters overall rejected it.

Though a spectrum of candidates from far left to far right are gearing up to run in the presidential election, the centerpiece of the race is likely to be a battle between Royal and the front-runner on the mainstream right — Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy.

A poll published Thursday showed respondents equally split between the two. In a first round of voting, Sarkozy would edge out Royal by 34 percent to 30 percent, the poll said — but in a runoff, they would be at 50-50. The IFOP agency conducted the poll Nov. 9-11 by telephone among 948 respondents. No margin of error was given.

The Socialists, who ran the government under Jospin from 1997 to 2002, made one of their biggest marks with passage of the so-called 35-hour workweek law, which conservatives say has hurt the economy.

Critics say the Socialists have no feasible recipes for facing a globalizing economy or revitalizing growth. The party manifesto calls for expanding use of the much-maligned workweek law, re-nationalizing utility Electricite de France, and punishing companies that move jobs abroad.

But Royal's supporters say she is of a different breed — a sleek lawmaker who has shaken up the political scene in a nation disenchanted and in need of change. Many say a female president is the tonic needed.

"That would do us some good," said Socialist party member Philippe Chleq, 72, one of the 68,000 party members who joined since June, after voting. "There is so much machismo in politics, it's disgusting. She'll help change that."

Socialists Back Woman In Race To Lead France (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

PARIS, Friday, Nov. 17 — Ségolène Royal moved a step closer to becoming the first female president of France early Friday, crushing her two male rivals for the Socialist Party nomination in next April's election.

With most of the vote in, Ms. Royal, 53, a regional president and former minister, won 60.6 percent of the vote of the party's nearly 219,000 members in an unusual primary.

Her closest rival, Dominique Strauss-Kahn, 57, a former finance minister, received 20.8 percent of the vote, and Laurent Fabius, 60, a former prime minister, 18.5 percent.

The tally in France ended around 1:30 a.m. and will be complete after overseas territories finish voting.

"I am living intensely this moment of happiness," Ms. Royal said after the preliminary results were announced. Thanking the party's "grass roots" members, she added, "The fact of receiving this momentum, of being chosen in this way, this is something extraordinary. I think that the French people have written this story."

The victory helped validate Ms. Royal's standing as the only candidate capable of beating the right's frontrunner, Nicolas Sarkozy, the Interior Minister who is seeking his UMP party's nomination for the 2007 presidential election.

An Ipsos opinion poll released on Thursday found Ms. Royal and Mr. Sarkozy statistically tied if they were to face off in a second round of voting, after other candidates had been eliminated.

Ms. Royal's victory followed months of mudslinging and maneuvering in a campaign that pitted her against the party's older, more established — and male — "elephants," whom she had dared to challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0095956

Campaigning on a platform of "rupture" with the status quo, she has also capitalized on her femininity while accusing her competitors of chauvinism.

"Gazelles," she said last May, "run faster than elephants."

Responding to voters' disillusionment with traditional elitist politics, she is promising more power to the people, giving local governments more authority, subsidizing small businesses, creating affordable housing and encouraging citizens to submit their ideas online, for example.

Even her opponents agree that her looks help. Published photos of her in a turquoise bikini while on vacation last summer underscored her youthfulness and glamour, while in poll after poll, her telegenic smile and elegant profile have appealed to a French public yearning for a new style of leadership.

Ms. Royal, president of the Poitou-Charentes region in the west, has also cultivated an image as a grass-roots nurturer, taking her campaign to the countryside to listen to concerns about social issues such as educational reform and youth crime.

With a portfolio that includes stops at three second-tier ministries — Environment, School Education and Family and Childhood — Ms. Royal has been criticized as lacking the experience and gravitas to lead a country that is a nuclear power and has the world's sixth-largest economy.

Her inexperience in foreign policy issues surfaced last week when she said during the last campaign debate that Iran should never be allowed to have a civilian nuclear energy program. As her opponents quickly pointed out, Iran enjoys that right as a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

But the party members' enthusiasm for Ms. Royal seemed to trump any slips on policy issues.

"Her victory means that the Socialist Party is still under the shock of April 2002 and is looking above all for a candidate who can win," said Dominique Reynié, a professor of political science at the Institut d'Études Politiques in Paris. "Much more important than a doctrine or a program is the look of a champion."

In the April 2002 presidential election, the Socialist candidate, Prime Minister Lionel Jospin, was eliminated in the first round, trailing even the far-right National Front candidate, Jean-Marie Le Pen.

Going into the primary, Ms. Royal enjoyed a strong lead in the polls, although she had lost ground steadily in recent weeks to Mr. Strauss-Kahn, largely because of his performance in their six policy debates, three of which were televised.

Ms. Royal was helped by the withdrawal from the race in September of Mr. Jospin, a fixture in French politics for nearly three decades.

The three candidates, all deputies in the National Assembly, voted in their home districts on Thursday. Mr. Strauss-Kahn continued to campaign on Wednesday, even though his 86-year-old mother had died the day before.

The fourth of eight children, Ms. Royal was born in Dakar, Senegal, where her father was an army colonel, and earned admission to the elite École Nationale d'Administration.

It was there that she met François Hollande, her partner of 25 years and the father of her four children. The head of the Socialist Party who is believed to have harbored presidential aspirations of his own, Mr. Hollande has remained neutral.

Ms. Royal was repeatedly attacked in the campaign as naïve and inexperienced. In addition to questioning her foreign policy background, her opponents and other critics mocked her proposal to create "citizens" juries to pass judgment on the work of elected officials, calling it dangerously populist, costly and irrelevant. At one rally in Paris last month when she discussed the issue, she was booed repeatedly.

During one debate, she defended her call for a less centralized, more representative form of government, saying: "Democracy is like love. The more there is of it, the more it grows."

She has also been criticized by her rivals for playing the woman card. At a rally in Paris last Monday, she quoted Mr. Strauss-Kahn as having said after their final debate that "she would have done better to stay at home instead of reading from her recipe cards."

Asked by Europe 1 radio Wednesday whether she was a liar, Mr. Strauss-Kahn replied, "That, or she is ill informed."

While opinion polls put her far ahead as the vote approached, it had been impossible to say whether those projections would be borne out in Thursday's primary. Only party members who pay about $25 a year to register officially were allowed to vote in the primary. Their views had never been polled because the Socialist Party refused to give its membership list to polling institutes. In addition, a full third of the party's members joined this year after a campaign to register new and younger members, using the Internet as a recruiting tool.

There have been two Socialist primaries before, but they were low-key affairs and they did not follow a campaign to enroll new members or televised debates similar to those in the United States.

In January, the UMP party will choose its candidate in a primary for the first time.

DOJ_NMG_0095957

Despite Mr. Sarkozy's overwhelming lead in the polls, there are signs that 12 years might not be enough for President Jacques Chirac. In an interview in the magazine Le Nouvel Observateur, his wife, Bernadette, suggested that he might seek an unprecedented third term.

As a former president, the 73-year-old head of state has the right to sit on the country's Constitutional Council once he is no longer president.

"Yes, he'll take it up," Mrs. Chirac said of the council. "In five years' time."

Mr. Chirac himself has said he will not make his intentions known before next March.

France's Segolene Royal Wins Socialist Party's Nomination (WSJ)

By David Gauthier-villars

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

PARIS -- Segolene Royal won the French Socialist Party's nomination to run in next year's presidential elections.

After a day of voting by French Socialist party card-carrying members, "it's now certain" that Ms. Royal will win the nomination without a further run-off vote, Stephane Le Foll, chief of staff for the Socialist Party's head secretary, told reporters. Mr. Le Foll declined to give a percentage by which Ms. Royal was expected to win, but said some 75,300 votes had been counted out of a total 180,000 ballots cast.

Ms. Royal's victory takes her one step further to her ambitions of becoming France's first woman president. The 53-year-old mother of four has transformed herself from a junior politician into a serious contender for the president's job over the past year. Her nomination highlights France's deep desire for change after nearly twelve years of economic stagnation and sagging morale under the rule of current President Jacques Chirac.

"It shows Socialist militants are also ready for change," said Jean-Louis Bianco, a Socialist lawmaker as the votes were being counted at the party's headquarters in Paris. Mr. Bianco added that he expects Ms. Royals' rivals in the primaries -- Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Laurent Fabius -- to now rally behind Ms. Royal.

The center-right, ruling UMP party, led by current Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, is expected to choose its candidate early next year. Recent polls have suggested that Ms. Royal and Mr. Sarkozy would tie if the first round of the presidential election was held today, collecting between 30% and 35% of the votes each.

Socialists Pick New Face For French Presidency (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

PARIS, Nov. 17 -- Riding a wave of popular disgust with France's political status quo, SÃ©golÃ¨ne Royal on Thursday used an Internet-fueled, personality-driven campaign to capture the Socialist Party's nomination for president and boost her bid to become France's first female head of state.

Royal, 53, an unmarried mother of four and glamorous protege of French presidential icon Francois Mitterrand, capitalized on her image as a fresh-faced cyber-candidate, running an insurgent's campaign to shake up the stodgy, male-dominated world of French politics. Party officials declared her the winner as vote-counting continued early Friday.

Le Monde newspaper estimated that she captured about 61 percent of the vote in turning back challenges from two party stalwarts -- former finance minister Dominique Strauss-Kahn and ex-prime minister Laurent Fabius, who both garnered about 19 percent, Le Monde projected.

Royal will carry the Socialist banner in the crowded first round of France's presidential race on April 22, when more than a dozen contenders are likely to vie for the Elysee Palace. The top two vote-getters will run against each other in the final ballot on May 6.

Political analysts expect the final matchup to pit Royal against the current interior minister, Nicolas Sarkozy, 51, the presumptive candidate of the center-right Popular Movement party, or UMP, which has not decided how it will choose its nominee. Polls show the pair -- who are transforming French politics by borrowing U.S.-style tactics -- statistically tied in a second-round face-off.

"Voters want to go to a new generation of politicians and forget all the past," said Pierre Giacometti, the head of Ipsos polling company. "The impression is that Sarkozy and Royal are a new frontier and represent a new vision and a new political epoch in the Fifth Republic."

About 219,000 registered Socialist Party members were allowed to vote in Thursday's election, and roughly 80 percent cast ballots, the party reported. Royal's victory -- she needed more than 50 percent to win -- was a clear signal that members wanted to rally behind a single candidate and avoid a potentially divisive second round.

Even so, political analysts and opinion surveys suggest that Royal will face a tough challenge uniting the left for the first round of the general election so that it does not splinter its vote and hand a victory to the hard right. That happened to the Socialists in the last presidential contest, in 2002, when the left's vote was so divided that it suffered a humiliating first-round defeat to anti-immigration candidate Jean-Marie Le Pen and his National Front party. Le Pen, who is gearing up to run again, was crushed in the second round by the current president, the UMP's Jacques Chirac.

Chirac has not declared whether he will run, but it seems unlikely. His lackluster stewardship of France in recent years coincided with a sense of political and economic decline, a loss of international stature and a deep national malaise. In a recent poll, only 2 percent of those surveyed wanted him to run for a third term.

French disenchantment with politics-as-usual opened the door for Royal, whose primary campaign avoided deep policy debates and focused instead on her main selling points, which she referred to again and again on the campaign trail: the fact that she is a woman and polls that show she is the only candidate able to beat Sarkozy.

"I am the only one who can win against the right. I embody the profound change that people are crying out for," she declared at a campaign stop last weekend. "For the symbolic father of the nation to be a woman -- now that's a revolution."

France has never had a female president, and only one woman has served as prime minister -- Edith Cresson, whose 11-month term in the early 1990s was widely considered a disaster.

"She is, in a way, a symbol of hope, she's modern -- not the same old politicians everyone grew up with since they were babies -- and she's a woman and a mother and unapologetic about it," said Nicole Bacharan, an analyst at the Institute for Political Studies in Paris. "The discontent in the U.S. with the White House and Congress and Republicans and Democrats -- it's exactly the same here."

Although Royal has written four books and held three cabinet posts -- education, environment, and family and children -- critics disparage her credentials, and many on the left question her adherence to Socialist doctrine, calling her a populist whose candidacy represents a victory of style over substance. She was accused of cynically overplaying the gender card -- using her femininity to attract voters on the one hand, attacking her critics as chauvinists on the other. She recently began reminding audiences that when she announced her candidacy, one of her opponents, Fabius, sneered: "Who will look after the children?"

She has offered a series of headline-grabbing proposals, such as boot camp for juvenile delinquents and "citizen juries" to monitor French politicians. She has criticized one of the Socialist Party's sacred cows -- the 35-hour workweek approved when the party controlled Parliament in 1998. But she has offered few ideas for tackling France's most pressing problems -- particularly immigration, crime and unemployment.

But after she had spent months on the campaign trail, sporting bright, well-tailored suits and colorful blouses, Royal's sharp contrast with the country's traditionally dour politicians won over much of the French public. She achieved rock-star status and typically is referred to by her first name only, or its shortened form, SÃ©go. Supporters said they made a personal connection with her.

"I don't care if SÃ©golÃ¨ne has experience or not, she's the only one I can trust," said Adrien Blanc, 40, a restaurant waiter in Paris who joined the party this year.

"I've had enough of the old party elephants," said Damien Beacco, 25, employing the term commonly used to describe longtime party power brokers. "SÃ©golÃ¨ne is different. Whenever she speaks, it creates momentum and entails change, no matter how shocking her proposals may be."

In what was considered a breach of journalistic decorum and a violation of the privacy rules surrounding politicians, two glossy magazines in August ran pictures of Royal at a beach in a turquoise bikini with her partner and father of her children, Socialist Party leader Francois Hollande. The celebrity magazine VSD ran her photo alongside a JFK-like picture of Sarkozy running bare-chested on a beach, with the headline "Duel in the sun."

Analysts said the willingness of candidates to tolerate and at times court such media coverage is a sign that French politicians are increasingly reaching out to the public.

Both Royal and Sarkozy have sophisticated Internet campaigns. Royal's candidate blog and Web site are credited with attracting many of the estimated 80,000 new members who joined the Socialist Party this year.

Royal also was stung by the new campaign tactics. In an incident remarkably similar to one that dogged the failed reelection effort of Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), Royal was captured on video criticizing French schoolteachers -- a key Socialist constituency -- for not working hard enough. The video was posted on the Internet, where it was reportedly viewed thousands of times. Tape recordings also circulated of Socialists booing and heckling her at closed party meetings.

Ireland Sees Spike In Foreign Workers (WT)

By Anthony Healy

DOJ_NMG_0095959

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

DUBLIN -- First-time visitors to Ireland may be surprised to find that the comely colleen serving Guinness in the local pub is, in fact, Polish.

After several centuries of a hardscrabble life that has seen Irish men and women emigrating around the world, taking their culture and legends with them, a decade of rapid economic growth has made the land of shamrocks a primary destination for hordes of immigrants, mainly from Eastern Europe.

Foreign nationals now account for 10 percent of the population, twice as many as just two years ago, forcing the government for the first time to begin drafting a formal immigration policy to deal with the influx.

"Make no mistake, we are in competition with other economies for go-ahead people with experience or qualifications that are in short supply at home," said Michael McDowell, the minister for justice, who must find a way to balance the nation's deep-seated traditions with the "Celtic Tiger's" growing demand for skilled labor.

"Immigration policies are first and foremost about what is best for Irish society."

But recognition of the economic need for foreign workers has done nothing to ease the shock experienced by one woman on a visit to Dublin from rural Ireland. "I asked three people for directions, and not one of them spoke English," she complained.

Similar anecdotes about pubs where all the staff speak Polish are borne out by recent figures from the Central Office of Statistics.

More than 80 percent of the new immigrants are under age 44, and almost half come from states that joined the European Union in 2004. Large numbers are employed in the retail, agriculture and construction sectors, helping to fuel one of the fastest-growing economies in Europe.

The ethnic and linguistic mixing, confined a few years ago to the capital, now reaches into even the smallest and most remote towns and villages. Amid the wild scenery of Connemara in the far west of Ireland -- where John Ford filmed "The Quiet Man" -- is the Killary Adventure Center. All the bar staff and kitchen staff are Polish.

"It's good to be able to talk to each other in Polish," said Anna, who has been in Ireland for two years and intends to return to Poland "when I've saved some money." She asked that her last name not be used.

In the southeast of Ireland in Dungarvan, population 15,000, there is now a Polish Advisory Center, located just down the road from the Polskie Sklepy -- the Polish Grocer. The local movie theater recently hosted a Polish film festival.

The nation's main Internet service provider, Eircom, now provides its services in Polish, as do many large companies.

By far the largest bloc of new immigrants come from Poland and Lithuania, having received an automatic right to work in Ireland when their countries joined the European Union in 2004.

Stunned by the unexpected influx, Ireland has followed Britain in imposing tougher restrictions on citizens of Romania and Bulgaria when their nations join the EU in January.

Michael Martin, the minister for enterprise, trade and employment, has said it is time "to take stock, be cautious and concentrate on addressing the integration needs of those who have already come to live and work in Ireland."

It is not clear how the new legislation will affect the handful of Bulgarians and Romanians already living in Ireland -- people like Chris, a Bulgarian who overstayed a student visa, works in a supermarket while studying accounting, and has married an Irishman.

"It is very strange, is it not?" said Chris, who spoke only on the condition that her real name not be used. "In most countries in the world, the men chase the women, but in Ireland it is the women who chase the men."

Myanmar Is Left In Dark, An Energy-Rich Orphan (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

SITTWE, Myanmar — In the balmy waters of the Bay of Bengal, just off the coast, an Asian energy rush is on. Huge pockets of natural gas have been found. China and India are jostling to sign deals. Plans are afoot to spend billions on new ports and pipelines.

Yet onshore, in towns like this one, not a light is to be seen — not a street lamp, not a glow in a window — as women crouch by the roadside at dawn, sorting by candlelight the vegetables they will sell for two cents a bunch at the morning market.

Paraffin and wood are major sources of light and heat. People receive two hours of electricity a day from a military government that is among the world's most repressive.

But attempts at outside pressure to prod the government to address its people's needs and curb abuses have faltered, in large part because China's thirst for resources has undermined nearly a decade of American economic sanctions. Critics say that Washington's policy has handed Myanmar, formerly Burma, to China. Still, as President Bush prepares to meet with leaders at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit meeting in Vietnam on Nov. 17, one topic on his agenda will be how to keep up the pressure. He is not likely to find cooperation, not from rivals like China and Russia, or even countries like Singapore and Indonesia, which trade freely with Myanmar.

The Asian energy rush is the latest demonstration of how the hunt for oil and gas, and China's economic leverage, are reshaping international politics, often in ways that run counter to American preferences.

In many respects, with the rise of China's economic power and its unflagging support, the government here has become more entrenched than ever, people inside and outside the country say.

"What can we do about it?" said a well educated man here, when asked about the plans to sell the gas abroad in the face of the deprivation at home. "What good would it do to protest, what would we get?" People were too afraid of the 400,000-member strong army supplied by China, Russia and Ukraine to complain, he said.

In numerous encounters in Myanmar, where most speak with extreme caution to foreigners and almost always anonymously for fear of jail, people joked sardonically that China was the "big daddy" and that soon it would "own" Myanmar. "China is a good friend of the government, not of the people," one woman said. "They are like brother and brother-in-law."

The Bush administration has pledged that it will not let up on its sanctions against the government until it releases the opposition leader, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, who has been under house arrest for 11 of the past 17 years.

Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi's political party won an overwhelming victory in elections in 1990, and Washington insists that the government recognize those results, and release an estimated 1,100 political prisoners.

The Bush administration says it plans to file a Security Council resolution at the United Nations in coming weeks condemning the government for its human rights abuses, and tightening sanctions further.

The United Nations under secretary general, Ibrahim Gambari, met with the junta leader, Gen. Than Shwe, on Nov. 11 in Myanmar and urged the government to mend its ways on forced labor and political prisoners. The meeting ended inconclusively, United Nations officials said.

With so much energy and other resources at stake, and given its preference to shun outside interference in internal politics, China's leaders are seemingly unbothered by what is happening inside Myanmar.

China's National Development Reform Commission approved plans in April to build a pipeline that would carry China's Middle East oil from a deep water port off Sittwe across Myanmar to Yunnan, China's southern province. This would provide China with an alternative to the Strait of Malacca, which it now depends on for delivering its oil from the Middle East.

Though no date has been announced for work on the new pipeline across Myanmar, the military appeared to be getting ready to build the deep sea port on the island of Ramree, to the south of here, local people said.

In another sign of the importance of Myanmar to China, the chairman of the China National Offshore Oil Corporation, Fu Chengyu, said in a speech this year that the company would focus its investment in the medium term on two countries: Myanmar and Nigeria. Cnooc engineers are currently exploring for oil on Ramree, and the company has rights to other oil deposits in central Myanmar, according to Myanmar government reports.

India, thirsty for energy to fuel its own fast-growing economy, sees Myanmar as a place where it needs to contain China. In the late 1990s, democratic India switched its policy toward Myanmar from antagonism to friendship.

And Thailand, Southeast Asia's largest economy, spends about $1.2 billion a year for Myanmar's natural gas, giving the military government badly needed hard currency.

In conversations with people in a number of towns, a portrait emerged of a universally unpopular, deeply corrupt government. People told of worsening poverty, a collapsed education system and a health care system that could deal only with those who paid. Tuberculosis, malaria and AIDS were rampant, they said.

The government's budget for its AIDS program in 2004 was $22,000, according to a recent health survey by John Hopkins University Medical School.

The junta leader, Gen. Than Shwe, 73, whose early military training was in psychological warfare, was described by many here as a master manipulator of his minions. He insisted, apparently out of fear of a coup, that the capital be moved this year from Yangon, formerly Rangoon, to a new site in the jungle, Naypyidaw.

The move, costing millions of scarce dollars, was in step with the general's belief that he marched in the footsteps of the old Burmese kings — the name of the new capital means "Royal City." Then, as now, there was a fierce line between the rulers and the ruled.

For the first time, health workers said they were discovering severe malnutrition among children in urban centers, a true anomaly in a lush country that was once the world's biggest exporter of rice.

In Mandalay, the second-biggest city, almost naked children with distended stomachs scrounged on the riverfront. In one village on the Thwande River on the west coast, nomadic families were too strapped for food to offer any to visitors, a traditional courtesy in Myanmar.

DOJ_NMG_0095961

"Why is there severe malnutrition in this Garden of Eden? Because people are poor," said Frank Smithuis, a physician who has worked in Myanmar since 1994 and heads the Doctors Without Borders, Holland, medical programs. "People are going from three meals to two meals to one meal. One meal a day just isn't enough."

In the village of Leat Pan Gyunt, south of Sittwe, villagers said they could afford to send their girls to school for only three years. The local school consisted of one dirt-floored room for all grades from first to eighth. The desks were planks of wood supported on two bricks.

Afraid of protests by students, the government dispersed the University of Yangon to sites outside the capital.

At the new Magway University, the medical students were learning surgery from books and videos, without working on human corpses because the government refused to pay for formaldehyde, two people familiar with the situation said.

In contrast to the deepening poverty — Myanmar's per capita income is calculated at $175 a year, far below neighboring Bangladesh — the military leaders were amassing fortunes, people said.

The latest evidence was a video leaked to a Web site, www.irrawaddy.org, based in Thailand, of the recent opulent wedding of General Than Shwe's daughter, Thandar Shwe. The video showed the bride, with her father alongside her, decked out in a necklace of six ropes of large diamonds, her hair looped with diamonds as well.

For those educated people who want change, the path is treacherous.

"I don't want to waste myself in jail," said one woman, who had two relatives imprisoned. "They were not the same when they came out."

In a similar vein to the dissidents in Eastern Europe in the 1980s, the woman said she believed change had to come from inside the country. But unlike Poland under Soviet rule, no unions are allowed in Myanmar, and most kinds of formal associations are considered suspect.

She said she held classes at her home on how to be more confident, how to strategize. She was trying to spread her classes to Buddhist monasteries and Christian churches, she said.

"Only education can change people because people don't know anything," she said. "Only about 10 percent of the people know what is going on." Sometimes she was in such despair, she said, that she believed that the only way to win against the government was "to think like them."

"But we can't think like them," she added, "nobody thinks like them."

Not all opposition groups that work outside the country believe that Washington's hard line is serving the best interests of Myanmar or the United States.

With its policy of isolation, the Bush administration was allowing China, and to a lesser extent, India, to have a free hand in Myanmar to the exclusion of the United States, said Aung Naing Oo, who spent a year at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University and who is the author of several books on Myanmar.

"The geopolitical situation favors the Burmese military," he said. "China and India both want to support it, and the Asian nations have no teeth."

Still, on a recent trip to Vietnam, a delegation of Myanmar officials heard something that astounded them, he said. They went to find out why Vietnam had become so suddenly prosperous.

"The Vietnamese said one word: 'The Americans.' The Burmese could not believe that after fighting a war Vietnam was friendly with the United States."

The Green Leap Forward (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

A friend of mine here wakes up every morning and does his own air quality test — as many Beijing residents do: He looks out his 24th-story window and checks how far he can see. On a rare pristine day, when the wind has swept Beijing, he can see the Fragrant Mountain rising to the northwest. On a "good" pollution day, he can see the China World building four blocks away. On a bad day, he can't see the building next door.

Shortly before I arrived in Beijing, China had been host of a summit meeting of 42 African leaders. Time magazine reported that Beijing officials had "ordered half a million official cars off the roads and said 400,000 more drivers had 'volunteered' to refrain from using their vehicles" in order to clean up the air for their African guests. No sooner were they gone, however, than all the cars returned and Beijing's air went back to "unhealthy." China's Environmental Protection Administration, Time noted, recently estimated the annual number of premature deaths in China caused by air pollution at 358,000.

No, China's officials are not in denial about their environment. But they also have not fully come to grips with how big a project it will be to take this incredible locomotive of an economy and clean up the engine without stopping the train.

I would argue that the same kind of bruising effort it took for Deng Xiaoping to move China from communism to capitalism will be required to move China from its polluting model of capitalism to a sustainable one. Mao almost destroyed China with his Cultural Revolution to make it more red, more communist. Without a new cultural revolution to make China more green, more sustainable, the Chinese growth juggernaut will destroy itself.

"To reverse this kind of situation we can't just make speeches," Pan Yue, China's vice minister for environmental protection, told me. "It will only come from a shift of attitudes from the very top to the very bottom. My job is to educate and encourage this shift, so that officials don't just think about economic growth as G.D.P. growth, but also factor in environmental health."

Three big shifts will be needed. The first is addition by subtraction. China can't go on trying to solve its energy problem by building the equivalent of two 600-megawatt coal-fired power plants a week. China needs California-style virtual efficiency "power plants" — E.P.P.s. These E.P.P.s are companies formed to identify and implement ways to save energy — from better lights to better designs to more efficient appliances — in a particular region. E.P.P.s sell the kilowatt-hours they save to the power grid at a fraction of the cost the grid would have had to invest to generate that same power with a coal-fired plant. The idea is to have profit-driven companies focused on adding power — by saving it where it is not needed so there will be more capacity where it is needed — without having to build more smokestacks. China is exploring E.P.P.s.

Second, China has set ambitious environmental targets. But it has to better persuade officials at every level that meeting not only their growth targets but also their "green" targets will determine if they advance or not.

China's 10th five-year plan, which began in 2000, called for a 10 percent reduction in the sulfur dioxide that produces acid rain. When that plan concluded in 2005, air pollution in China had increased by 27 percent. The 11th five-year plan calls for a 20 percent improvement in energy consumption for every percent of G.D.P. growth and a 10 percent reduction in pollution, now from a higher base.

This time, Beijing is stipulating exactly how much each province and locality and the top 1,000 factories have to improve. So far, though, the first year has seen another increase in air pollution. Until local officials start getting fired en masse for missing their green targets, you won't see big change.

Finally, China's leaders are going to have to allow more press freedom and public participation, because the best environmental watchdogs are local newspapers and farmers. Beijing, to its credit, has begun to allow citizens to take part in environmental impact assessments and to bring environmental lawsuits. But this needs to go further.

I repeat: China's leaders do get it. But moving this place to a new sustainable model will take more than ordinary leadership. It will take a giant leader who by sheer force of will moves the whole system against all the entrenched habits and interests. It will take a green Deng Xiaoping. Nothing else will suffice. Otherwise, every day here will feel like midnight at noon.

Don't Close The Door On Free Trade In The Andes (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Sometimes it seems that our elected representatives in Washington are not all that bright. Either that or they don't always act with the best interests of the American people in mind.

Take the opposition on Capitol Hill to the pending free trade agreements between the U.S. and Peru and Colombia. The Bush administration has already signed the FTA with Peru and is expected to sign the Colombia FTA by the end of next week. But to be implemented, both pacts need to be ratified by the U.S. Congress. Right now, with the Democratic leadership opposed and some Republicans unwilling to back the president, that looks doubtful.

Just how the defeat of these two trade pacts is supposed to benefit American democracy, security or living standards is a riddle. The opposite is true: If a U.S. goal is to increase stability and prosperity abroad and to make the homefront safer and living standards higher for Americans, killing the U.S.-Peru deal is dumb. Knocking off the agreement with Colombia is even dumber.

Consider U.S. economic interests alone. Forget the fact that these two countries, with a combined population of more than 72 million people and per capita gross domestic products in 2003 of less than $2,200, would greatly benefit from more liberalized trade. Assume for a moment that Washington doesn't give a hoot about Third World hardship. Even if all this is true, and American politicians are only interested in serving Americans, ratifying these two trade agreements is still the only rational thing to do.

The U.S. economy is already relatively open to both Peruvian and Colombian imports under the Andean Trade Preferences Act. Since 1991 both countries have enjoyed duty-free access to the U.S. market for the vast majority of their products.

Since 2002 the ATP has been tied to "cooperation" in the U.S. war on drugs, which has meant an increase in violence and instability in the region in a senseless effort to end the supply of coca coming from the Andes. So our Andean friends have certainly "paid" for their preferential access to the U.S. Yet under the ATP there is no quid pro quo for trade liberalization on the part of Peru or Colombia. If the two free trade agreements are not ratified, it is likely the ATP will be renewed in the interest of the drug war.

A better U.S. policy, for all sides, would be to keep the U.S. market open to Peruvian and Colombian goods but also to open those domestic markets to American goods. That's what would happen under the FTAs. Under the U.S.-Peru agreement, 80% of U.S. exports of consumer and industrial products to Peru will be immediately duty-free once the deal is sealed and another 7% will become duty-free after five years. Nearly the entire economy will be open after 15 years. In the case of Colombia, 80% of U.S. exports of consumer and industrial products will be duty-free immediately and the rest of the duties will phase out over 10 years.

As it stands now, Peruvian and Colombian trade policies incorporate a "high level of protectionism," according to the 2006 Heritage-The Wall Street Journal Index of Economic Freedom. But both countries are already demonstrating an appetite for U.S. goods. U.S. exports to Peru, despite protectionism, are now more than $2 billion annually. In 2005, U.S. goods exports to Colombia were $5.4 billion. Inflation is low and the currencies stable in both countries and both boast young populations eager to become consumers in a globalized market. Access to this demographic is a U.S. exporter's dream.

Retail consumers are not the only market for U.S. businesses. Thomas Gales, Caterpillar Tractor's vice president for Latin America, has testified that Colombia and Peru are important destinations for his company's heavy equipment. With the elimination of import tariffs on machinery made in Caterpillar's East Peoria and Decatur, Illinois plants, he says Cat's competitiveness in the region will be further enhanced.

The American Farm Bureau Federation estimates that when the deal is fully implemented, exports to Peru (a market half the size of Colombia) could grow by $700 million annually. Both agreements also liberalize the service sectors.

If these export opportunities are not convincing enough, consider the risks to U.S. competitiveness of nixing the deals. If the U.S. doesn't negotiate free trade in these markets, the European Union, Japan and the rest of Latin America probably will.

For those who care about Latin American poverty, there are even better reasons to ratify the free-trade pacts. The most immediate beneficiaries of more trade with the U.S. will be the consumers in Peru and Colombia who will have more choice and better prices. Countries that open experience improvement in their export accounts, as access to inputs helps local producers improve competitiveness.

None of this matters to Big Labor, of course, which is out to kill both deals. Democrats on the hook to unions for the party's Election Day victory have already memorized Labor's script: Trade with Peru and Colombia cannot be allowed because those countries don't protect worker rights. Never mind that both have signed on to all International Labor Organization conventions.

Andrés Mejía-Vergnaud, of the Freedom and Progress Institute in Bogotá, points out that in the case of Colombia, opponents to the FTA are arguing against ratification because union leaders have been murdered. "But it's hard to see the connection between the killing of union leaders and the trade agreement," he says. "Remember that not only union leaders have been killed in Colombia: journalists, judges, business leaders, politicians, etc., all of us have been in danger here. It has to do with a generalized state of violence that the country has been going through, and has nothing to do with free trade. The crisis of unions in Colombia is also related to corruption and rapacity in public unionism. No wonder union leaders were once known here as the 'blue-collar oligarchy.'"

Colombia is not the only place where a Big Labor oligarchy has been known to call the shots for the rest of us. The Democratic-led Congress taking over in January is likely to experience a similar tyranny. That means that the only hope now for a step forward in U.S.-Latin American trade relations lies with Republicans, who would be wise to pass these FTAs before they leave the majority in December.

No More Delays For Kosovo (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

For the past seven years, the tiny Balkan region of Kosovo has been in limbo. Administered by the United Nations, it is not an independent state. But it is no longer a province of Serbia. That ended after Serbia's rulers tried to kill or drive out Kosovo's ethnic Albanians — and NATO went to war to save them.

Limbos are not stable. And the U.N. mediator in talks on the region, Martti Ahtisaari, was expected to announce by the end of this year that it was time to start Kosovo on the path to closely monitored independence. Instead, he put off the decision until after Serbia's parliamentary elections — scheduled for January — for fear of bolstering Serbian ultranationalists. This postponement, only the most recent of many, should be the last.

After the 1999 war there has never been a realistic possibility of rejoining Kosovo and Serbia. Kosovo was supposed to earn independence by proving its willingness to govern responsibly and to protect its ethnic Serb minority. A lot more needs to be done on both those fronts.

But the United Nations has limited patience to keep administering Kosovo, and without the stability of statehood there will be no foreign investment and the beleaguered economy will not improve. Lack of economic prospects is feeding Albanian nationalism, and until Kosovo's status is settled, anger will remain close to the surface.

Even as it moves Kosovo toward statehood, the U.N. should keep a substantial military and advisory presence there, both to ensure the rights of the Serb minority and to encourage democratic development.

Belgrade will always object to Kosovo's independence. The best chance of moderating its reaction is the promise of eventual membership in the European Union and a clear warning that Europe will be watching how it treats its new neighbor. The Kosovars should be clear that donors and everyone else will be watching just as closely to see how they treat their own Kosovar Serbs.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bye-Bye To Secret Spy Program? (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Republicans who limped back to Washington for a lame duck congressional session last week found a host of marching orders from President Bush, but perhaps none more urgent than this: Before Democrats take control of Congress in January, they must pass legislation authorizing the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program.

His plea for a legislative stamp of approval on the controversial spy effort is an "important priority in the war on terror," Bush said. The response: deafening silence. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist quickly dispatched aides to put out the word on Bush's request: Not gonna happen.

Outgoing Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter introduced yet another bill last week that he says would ease the concerns of privacy advocates while allowing the spying program to continue, but the odds of getting any last-ditch legislation through his committee, the House, and a Senate vote before Republicans cede control are formidable.

So after nearly a year of high-stakes wrangling on the Hill, heated debates over privacy and presidential authority, and a flurry of lawsuits against the administration and telecom companies for allegedly aiding the surveillance program, Congress appears to be back to square one. And with Democrats promising oversight hearings next year on how the program was hatched and whom it targets, it appears likely that the issue will be decided in court and, ultimately, the Supreme Court.

"No kings." The eavesdropping program, launched in secret after the 9/11 attacks, was revealed last December by the New York Times. The newspaper also reported that the government failed to get surveillance warrants from a secret court that monitors domestic spying. During the ensuing uproar, the president defended the program as targeting only domestic communications that originate overseas. His lawyers have argued that the president's executive wartime authority precludes his having to seek surveillance warrants. Says Todd Gaziano, director of the conservative Heritage Foundation's Center for Legal and Judicial Studies: "Every president has engaged in the equivalent of warrantless wiretapping and surveillance-the only difference is that this administration is being far more sensitive to civil liberties."

Nonetheless, some three dozen legal challenges have been filed questioning the program's legality and Bush's wartime powers claim. A slew of the cases also take aim at telecom companies for providing confidential customer data to the NSA. Under federal communications law, customer call records are protected from disclosure, though there is an effort by Bush and other conservatives to grant the companies retroactive legal immunity.

The most-watched court case is in Detroit, where U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor has ruled that the program violates U.S. citizens' privacy and free-speech rights and illegally skirts review by the special Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court. "There are no hereditary kings in America, and no powers not created by the Constitution," Taylor wrote. Administration lawyers won a stay to keep the program running and are appealing Taylor's ruling.

Oral arguments could be heard as soon as early next year. And Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, which has sued to obtain information about the spy program, said the case will set a benchmark for how other cases may proceed.

Another closely watched case is being heard in San Francisco, where AT&T has been sued for allegedly providing customer call records to the NSA. A federal judge there rejected the government's request that the case be dismissed because it might reveal state secrets. That decision has also been appealed.

On Capitol Hill, some conservatives say they'd be happy if the eavesdropping bills remain dormant-that the issue can be left to the courts to resolve. They're also content, they say, to let the Democrats take the political risk of pursuing the president on a contentious national security issue while the 2008 presidential election gathers steam. But Caroline Fredrickson, the chief lobbyist for the American Civil Liberties Union, says that may be a miscalculation. "Members of Congress are probably paying pretty close attention to what the voters said last week," she said, "and I don't think voters said they want the president's illegal program authorized." What the courts say could be another thing entirely.

9/11 Prisoner Abuse Suit Could Be Landmark (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

NEW YORK — Five years after Muslim immigrants were abused in a federal jail here, the guards who beat them and the Washington policymakers who decided to hold them for months without charges are being called to account.

Some 1,200 Middle Eastern men were arrested on suspicion of terrorism after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. No holding place was so notorious as Brooklyn's nine-story Metropolitan Detention Center. In a special unit on the top floor, detainees were smashed into walls, repeatedly stripped and searched, and often denied basic legal rights and religious privileges, according to federal investigations.

Now the federal Bureau of Prisons, which runs the jail, has revealed for the first time that 13 staff members have been disciplined, two of them fired. The warden has retired and moved to the Midwest.

And in what could turn out to be a landmark case, a lawsuit filed by two Brooklyn detainees against top Bush administration officials is moving forward in the federal courts in New York.

A judge turned down a request by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft to dismiss the lawsuit against them. The case is before an appeals court, where a panel of three judges signaled last month that they too believed it should go forward.

The suit, which also names top federal prison officials and individual guards as defendants, seeks an unspecified amount of money from the government. More significant, it hopes to hold federal law enforcement authorities responsible for their open-ended, "hold-until-cleared" policy for detainees. After Sept. 11, the FBI was in no rush to investigate the detainees, and many men were held in limbo. If the lawsuit prevails, it will create precedents that will probably bar authorities from carrying out such sweeping roundups in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0095970

The case is proceeding with just one of the detainees who sued. The government settled with the other, former Manhattan deli operator Ehab Elmaghraby, who this year accepted a federal government payout of $300,000.

But Elmaghraby, who has returned to Egypt, said he could not forgive the guards who jammed a flashlight up his rectum.

"They destroyed me. They destroyed my family," he said in a recent telephone interview. "So I want the officers to stay one week inside those cells. They would kill themselves before the week was finished."

Ashcroft and others have defended the detentions. In a new book, Ashcroft wrote: "Was it worth it to detain and charge hundreds … in order to find one or more of the key men sent to America to facilitate a second wave of attacks on the United States? I thought so then, and I think so more today."

Five investigations by the Department of Justice inspector general's office, most of them never publicized, documented wholesale abuse of the Muslim detainees at the Brooklyn detention center. In the months after the Sept. 11 attacks, 84 men were held there. None was charged in the attacks. Most were deported on immigration infractions.

One disturbing incident, repeated over and over, is particularly haunting — inmates head-slammed into a wall where the staff had taped a T-shirt with an American flag printed on it. The motto on the shirt proclaimed: "These colors don't run." In time, that spot on the wall was covered with blood.

"They told me, 'Look at our flag. You see the blood that is coming down from our flag? We're going to make you bleed every day like this,' " Elmaghraby recalled.

He said they grabbed his back and sides and rushed him head-first into the wall. "Blood came out of my mouth," he said.

The inspector general determined that many guards were "emotionally charged" in the weeks after Sept. 11. A jail lieutenant told investigators that guards carried around "a great deal of anger." Another lieutenant said prisoners purposely were handed over to teams of up to seven guards, all of them "spiked with adrenaline." That lieutenant further described some of the guards as "talking crazy" and "getting ready for battle."

In legal briefs filed this year with the U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, attorneys for Ashcroft and Mueller defended their policy, saying that Washington after Sept. 11 was "confronted with unprecedented law enforcement and security challenges." They said Ashcroft and Mueller had been working with "no clear judicial precedents in this extraordinary context."

Ashcroft in his recent book, "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice," wrote that the goal was to prevent another catastrophic attack. He was not bothered by holding detainees for long periods.

"If we can't bring them to trial," he wrote, "so be it."

Mueller also has defended the decision, but in a speech to the ACLU acknowledged that the inspector general did "a very good job of pointing out areas where we can do better." He said that clearer criteria were needed for deciding when to hold immigrants as terrorism suspects and that law enforcement should do more to speed up investigations.

Elmaghraby moved to the U.S. in 1990, married and operated a deli near Times Square in Manhattan. Nineteen days after Sept. 11, he was arrested, apparently because his landlord in Queens had applied for pilot training.

For the first three months in the jail, he said, he was denied a blanket, pillow, mattress and toilet paper. He was locked away in his bare feet.

"No shoes for a terrorist," he said he was told.

He said he was repeatedly strip-searched, dragged on the ground and punched until his teeth shattered. He said that he was displayed naked in front of a female staffer, and that guards violated him with a flashlight and pencil.

Elmaghraby, 39, broke down crying in a recent interview. "They don't treat you like a person," he said. "They treat you like an animal."

He was held for nearly a year — until August 2002. After pleading guilty to minor credit card fraud charges, he was deported to Alexandria, Egypt.

He has lost track of his wife in New York, he said, and his deli business went under. And he spent most of his $300,000 settlement to repair his stomach and esophagus, which he said were damaged because jail doctors did not properly treat him for severe indigestion and hypertension.

DOJ_NMG_0095971

The former detainee with whom the lawsuit is proceeding, Javaid Iqbal, is also 39. Iqbal, a Pakistani, came to America a dozen years ago. He married and he worked as a cable repairman on Long Island. He was arrested in November 2001, apparently after agents interviewed him in his apartment and spotted a magazine showing the twin towers collapsing.

He said he was mocked as a "Muslim terrorist and a killer." He was strip-searched, punched in the face and kicked in the back. He said guards urinated in his toilet, then turned off the water so it would not flush.

He was denied a copy of the Koran. "No prayer for terrorists," he said he was told.

Iqbal was released at the end of July 2002. He pleaded guilty to having false immigration papers and was deported to Faisalabad, Pakistan. His lawyers declined to let him be interviewed.

Guards at the detention center first denied there was any mistreatment, then slowly came forward. Finally videotapes were uncovered that showed abuse, including detainees head-butted into the T-shirt on the wall.

Traci Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said 13 staff members have been disciplined. Two were fired, two received 30-day suspensions and one was suspended for 21 days. Two more were suspended for four days, three for two days, and three were demoted.

Warden Dennis Hasty retired in April 2002. He is named as a defendant in the lawsuit but his lawyer, Michael L. Martinez, said Hasty had not been aware of the abuse and had been "appalled and upset" to learn of the allegations.

The lawsuit was filed in Brooklyn in May 2004. Last year, U.S. District Judge John Gleeson ruled against a bid by Ashcroft and Mueller for a dismissal.

The judge said the furor over Sept. 11 did not warrant such drastic measures. He rejected, he wrote, "the argument that the post-Sept. 11 context wholly extinguished … a pretrial detainee's due process rights."

Some Believe 'Truth Serums' Will Come Back (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

If there is a "truth serum" that works, it is a secret that nobody is giving up.

The debate earlier this year on interrogation techniques in the war on terrorism raised anew a question that goes back at least 2,000 years. Is there something you can give a person that will make him tell the truth?

The ancient Romans had an answer: Yes.

" In vino veritas"-- "in wine there is truth" -- is sometimes attributed to the natural philosopher Pliny the Elder. The observation made in the 1st century has been borne out over the millennia by many a remorseful inebriate. And, in truth, alcohol given as intravenous ethanol was an early form of truth serum.

In the 21st century, however, the answer appears to be: No. There is no pharmaceutical compound today whose proven effect is the consistent or predictable enhancement of truth-telling.

The modern fascination with truth-eliciting drugs began in 1916 when an obstetrician named Robert House, practicing in a town outside Dallas named Ferris, saw a strange event during a home delivery.

The woman in labor was in a state of "twilight sleep" induced by scopolamine, a compound derived from the henbane plant that blocks the action of the neurotransmitter acetylcholine. House had asked her husband for a scale to weigh the newborn. The man looked for it and returned to the bedroom saying he could not find it, whereupon his wife, still under the anesthetic, told him exactly where it was.

House became convinced that scopolamine could make anyone answer a question truthfully, and he went on to promote its forensic use.

Police departments used it -- and in a few cases judges permitted it -- throughout the 1920s and 1930s. Other drugs were also tried, most famously the barbiturates Pentothal and Amytal. But by the 1950s, most scientists had declared the very notion of truth serums invalid, and most courts had ruled testimony gained through their use inadmissible.

The emerging consensus did not stop the most notorious search for truth serum, the CIA's Project MK-ULTRA. Starting in 1953, the agency tested the behavioral effects of several drugs, including their effects on interrogation. Many people were given substances without their knowledge or consent. Frank Olson jumped from a hotel window to his death after taking the hallucinogen LSD.

The program ended in the late 1960s. Its abuses -- many revealed in congressional hearings in 1977 -- produced bad publicity for the spy agency.

Whether a search for truth serums has occurred in recent decades, and especially since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, is a matter of differing opinion.

Gordon H. Barland was a captain in the U.S. Army Combat Development Command's intelligence agency in the 1960s. Before leaving active duty in 1967 he was asked to write up "materiel objectives." He put on the wish list a drug that would aid interrogation.

He later became a research psychologist and spent 14 years working at the Department of Defense Polygraph Institute. While psychopharmacology was not his specialty, trying to catch liars was.

"I would have expected that if there was some sort of truth drug in general use I would have heard rumors of it. I never did," said Barland, who retired in 2000 and now lives in Utah. He further doubts that the government would again engage in such experiments, given the MK-ULTRA experience.

"It would be very difficult to get a project like that off the ground," he speculated.

Another psychologist who spent 20 years in military research said he also "never heard anything like that or knew of anyone who was doing that work." He spoke on the condition of anonymity because interrogation is not his specialty.

Some doubt the practicality of running, or keeping secret, such a research agenda.

"I can't imagine it," said Tara O'Toole, director of the Center for Biosecurity of the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center.

"We haven't been able as a government to create anthrax vaccine. The idea that we could develop a [truth] drug de novo strikes me as outlandish," she said. "That would be a really major research and development project that would be hard to hide."

For the record, spokesmen for the Army medical research command, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) and the CIA say there is no work underway on truth serums.

Whether such a substance could ever be used legally is a question some legal scholars believe is still open.

"In the United States, no law at either the state or national level makes the use of truth serum a crime per se," Jason R. Odeshoo wrote in the Stanford Law Review in 2004.

Information gotten through drug-aided interviews would not be allowed in a trial because of the Constitution's privilege against self-incrimination, but it might be legal to use truth serum "solely for intelligence-gathering purposes," he argued. Similarly, while the Geneva Conventions forbid its use against prisoners of war, if terrorism suspects aren't considered POWs the conventions wouldn't block it, he wrote.

Curiously, truth serum was once viewed as a way of preventing, not promoting, abusive interrogations.

The Prohibition era, which coincided with scopolamine's popularity, produced widespread graft in police departments and district attorneys' offices. Reports of "third-degree" interrogation and forced confessions were common.

"In this climate 'truth serum' was powerfully represented as a sophisticated, scientific, and non-violent alternative to unsavory police methods," wrote Alison Winter in a history of truth serum published in the Bulletin of the History of Medicine in 2005.

This ambiguous legal status, combined with advances in neuroscience, lead some to suspect there may be a second act for truth serum.

"There is a large number of neural circuits that we are on the verge of being able to manipulate -- things that govern states like fear, anxiety, terror and depression," said Mark Wheelis, a scientist at the University of California at Davis and a historian of chemical and biological warfare.

"We don't have recipes yet to control them, but the potential is clearly foreseeable," he said. "It would absolutely astonish me if we didn't identify a range of pharmaceuticals that would be of great utility to interrogators."

Recent research with the hormone oxytocin is especially provocative in this regard.

Produced by the brain, oxytocin is best known for stimulating uterine contraction during labor (when it is sometimes given under the trade name Pitocin), and for promoting milk "letdown" during breast feeding. Animal studies have shown it is also important in mate bonding and social attachment.

In a study published last year, Michael Kosfeld and Markus Heinrichs of the University of Zurich set up an experiment examining oxytocin's effects on trust.

About 130 college students were randomly given a snort of oxytocin or placebo. Half were then designated "investors" and were given money. They could keep or transfer some or all of the money to a student "trustee," whom they did not know and could not see.

The act of transferring money tripled its value, creating a big payoff for the trustee receiving it. That person could then keep it all or acknowledge the investor's trust by returning some portion.

The investors getting oxytocin on average transferred more money than those getting placebos, and twice as many -- 45 percent vs. 21 percent -- showed maximal trust and transferred it all. Interestingly, oxytocin had no effect on how much money trustees shared back with their investors, suggesting that the hormone acted specifically to promote trust in situations where there was risk and uncertainty.

Paul J. Zak, a neuroscientist at Claremont Graduate University in California, helped supervise the Swiss experiment. He later went to a meeting called by DARPA and presented the findings. When he was finished, a military scientist asked him: "How do I use this stuff tomorrow?"

Zak said he dodged the question. He observed that classic interrogation techniques, in which one person acts as the "good cop" and creates a bond with the prisoner, probably already makes use of the brain's own oxytocin. He added that, "we are just showing you the neurophysiology behind it."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Marshals Kept Off Plane At Reagan (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

A team of federal air marshals was prevented from protecting a recent flight from Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport because a gate agent erroneously said they did not have the correct paperwork, say marshals familiar with the incident.

Officials with Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority (MWAA) were called in to remove the marshals from US Airways Flight 3464 departing Nov. 8 for Bradley International Airport in Windsor Locks, Conn.

"Right now we know, obviously, that federal air marshals were denied boarding," said Federal Air Marshal Service (FAMS) spokesman Conan Bruce.

Marshals knowledgeable about this case and others told The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity that the gate agent demanded paperwork which is required of other law-enforcement officials, but not from federal air marshals who are on duty to protect the plane from a terrorist attack.

The flight arrived late, and passengers were immediately boarded while marshals showed their identification to the gate agent and head flight attendant. They asked to brief the captain then boarded the plane.

The marshals were first rousted from their seats to report to the jet bridge, where the gate agent demanded paperwork intended for off-duty law-enforcement officers carrying weapons. The marshals told the gate agent that they were on mission status and the paperwork was not required, and they returned to their seats.

The marshals were called to the jet bridge a second time to speak with the captain, and the marshals then returned to their seats.

Minutes later, the marshals were called again to the jet bridge a third time, where MWAA officers ordered the marshals to exit the plane.

Even the intervention of higher-ups in the Homeland Security Department could not persuade the airline to allow the armed law-enforcement agents aboard, and the plane departed unprotected an hour and a half late, the sources said.

DOJ_NMG_0095974

Calls for comment to Republic Airlines, which owns US Airways, were not returned.

Air Marshal Director Dana Brown has pledged to rewrite the boarding rules, which marshals say are defined differently by airlines and often exposes their undercover identities.

Mr. Bruce said the agency is working with the airline to review the incident, "get the facts and find out what happened."

Asked whether similar situations have occurred in which airlines barred marshals from boarding, Mr. Bruce said "I'm sure it has in the past five years; it isn't the first incident."

"I would not say it's a regular occurrence. After we expanded the program and added so many thousands of marshals, it was a learning process for the airlines and us. I would not say it was a regular occurrence, maybe early on, but not a regular occurrence now," Mr. Bruce said.

"It is important to point out we work hand in hand with the airlines. It's a cooperative effort; that's why we have a liaison division," Mr. Bruce said. "We'll figure it out, we'll review it, but I don't want to speculate until we have all the facts."

Marshals say this isn't the first time they have encountered animosity from airlines and the flight crews whom they protect.

"There were hundreds of incidents like this," one air marshal said of the period shortly after the September 11 terrorist attacks. "Air marshals finally stopped filing reports because the air marshal usually ends up being investigated for not being able to cooperate."

Union Wants To Organize Airport Screeners (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's largest federal labor union will push to organize airport security screeners after a finding by a United Nations agency that the screeners should have union representation.

The 600,000-member American Federation of Government Employees says it could improve workplace conditions. The Transportation Security Administration has one of the highest attrition and injury rates in the federal government, which aggravates staffing shortages that make airport security lines longer. The AFGE plans to lobby Congress' new Democratic leaders to let TSA screeners unionize.

The TSA says unionization could hinder managers from quickly moving screeners to new assignments as security threats arise.

The nation's 45,000 screeners have been barred from collective bargaining since the TSA was formed after the 9/11 attacks to safeguard aviation.

The U.N. International Labor Organization's finding says that policy "may impede unduly upon the rights of these federal employees" and urges the TSA to "engage in collective bargaining" with screeners. The Geneva-based agency released its finding this month in response to a complaint filed in 2003 by the AFGE. The union lost a lawsuit seeking to represent TSA screeners.

The finding carries no legal obligation but reflects that the TSA is not following the United Nations' "core labor standards," says Hans von Rohland, an International Labor Organization spokesman.

"Now we have the rationale that this is not just a union whining," AFGE lawyer Mark Roth says. "This is a formal finding of a violation."

The finding will encourage Congress to let screeners unionize, he says.

When Democrats take control of the House of Representatives and Senate in January, "we certainly have a much more receptive Congress," union lobbyist Charity Wilson says.

Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., says union representation would provide "basic worker protections that will ensure screeners are treated like professionals." Lowey proposed in July to let screeners unionize, but her measure was defeated on a 14-15 vote in her House Homeland Security Committee.

Lowey hopes to add the measure to a broad legislative effort to strengthen domestic security that Democrats will push in January.

"I feel good about it for next year," Lowey says.

DOJ_NMG_0095975

TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe says unionization "would limit our ability to make decisions rapidly in the interests of national security and in response to risk."

Most federal labor unions are barred from negotiating wages and benefits, which are set by Congress. They can help set workplace conditions and file grievances heard by neutral parties.

"We will bargain safety conditions, health conditions, fair rotations of work and assignments, so people have a job they want to stay in and are not treated arbitrarily," Roth says.

Travelers Say We're Bordering On Hostile (WP)

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Looking for reasons why America's popularity in the world has declined? The U.S. travel industry blames security.

A plurality of international travelers rated the U.S. visa and immigration entry system the "world's worst," according to data released today that was commissioned by a tourism business lobby.

Interviews with 2,011 non-U.S. residents who had traveled beyond their home continents in the past 18 months found that 39 percent rated the United States the least traveler-friendly, more than twice the percentage that gave bottom grades to the Middle East (16 percent), Asia (12 percent) or Africa (12 percent). The rating was based on the ease of obtaining travel documents and the respectfulness of immigration officials.

The questions were somewhat self-serving, and researchers drew more than a fifth of the participants from countries with mixed relations with the United States, such as China and Venezuela.

The findings come as the United States has stepped up requirements for foreign visitors, such as fingerprinting and tightened screening procedures at ports of entry. One-third of the travelers said they would not visit here again because of rude treatment at airports by security officials toward non-U.S. passport holders. Also cited was a fear of detention for simple mistakes or misstatements.

Discover America Partnership paid for the data. The group includes the Travel Industry Association and major lodging, theme park, restaurant and rental car companies, which want the government to promote travel and alter security programs in the name of "public diplomacy."

Visitors Decry U.S. Entry Process (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Visa Rules, Other Mandates Remain Unpopular Abroad, Travel-Industry Poll Finds

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice promised nearly a year ago to put a friendlier face on the American travel experience to help improve the U.S. image overseas. So far, foreign travelers aren't getting that impression, according to a survey by a group that seeks to pressure the government to take steps to boost travel to the U.S.

Funded by a multimillion-dollar travel-industry campaign called the Discover America Partnership, the survey found that foreigners, by a 2-1 margin, view the U.S. as offering the world's worst experience when it comes to obtaining a visa and entering the country. The Middle East, Asia and Africa all scored far better than the U.S.

The survey results, which are being released today, underscore concerns within the U.S. travel industry that the Bush administration hasn't done enough since the 2001 terrorist attacks to speed up the visa process and to improve travelers' experience at entry stations upon their arrival. Travel to the U.S. from countries other than Mexico and Canada is still down about 17% from its high in 2000, the group said. A European study found that world-wide business travel to the U.S. fell 10% in 2005 over the previous year.

The partnership argues that traveling in the U.S. makes people feel more positive about the country, thus enhancing America's long-term security. But many parts of the U.S. government continue to view travelers largely as a potential menace, the group says. "Policy makers first need to decide that they actually want more travelers to come to the U.S.," said Geoffrey Freeman, who directs the partnership. "Once they decide that, policy changes to make it happen could flow rather easily. The question is whether we have the will."

People's negative experiences appear to be heavily focused on obtaining a visa and then getting past immigration and customs' officials. Of those who had traveled in the U.S., the poll found, 63% said they had a more-favorable view of the place as a result, and 72% said that once they got past the airport, the travel experience was "great."

An array of large U.S. companies and groups, including Loews Corp., Marriott International Inc. and the Travel Industry Association, formed the partnership in September. About 50 million people came to the U.S. last year. The group wants to see that number increase to 60 million by 2010.

Ms. Rice in January announced an initiative to streamline the visa-issuing process and to turn two major airports, in Washington and Houston, into model welcoming centers with the help of the U.S. travel industry. The latter project has made almost no headway, but State Department officials say they have made substantial progress on the visa front.

The U.S. has hired 570 consular officials over the last five years and says it has substantially cut the wait time for visas in high-demand places like India and China. Visa wait times range from several days in Paris to nearly a month in Shanghai, according to the State Department's most recent figures. State Department officials also say they have made significant strides in the issuing of student visas, the number of which are up 17% in the year ending in September over the previous year.

Despite improvements, the survey found that significant numbers of those polled harbored low expectations of U.S. travel bureaucracy.

Of the 2,011 travelers interviewed overseas, 36% said they wouldn't come to the U.S. for fear of being detained by officials "for hours or worse" at the airport. Forty percent said they had tried to get a visa within the last two years but abandoned the effort. Just over half said the U.S. visa process in their country was "unreasonably inconvenient." Of those surveyed, 29% said they had been to the U.S. in the last 18 months, while over half had been to the U.S. at least once in the last five.

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Review Sees Three Options In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The Pentagon's closely guarded review of how to improve the situation in Iraq has outlined three basic options: Send in more troops, shrink the force but stay longer, or pull out, according to senior defense officials.

Insiders have dubbed the options "Go Big," "Go Long" and "Go Home." The group conducting the review is likely to recommend a combination of a small, short-term increase in U.S. troops and a long-term commitment to stepped-up training and advising of Iraqi forces, the officials said.

The military's study, commissioned by Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, comes at a time when escalating violence is causing Iraq policy to be reconsidered by both the White House and the congressionally chartered, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Pace's effort will feed into the White House review, but military officials have made it clear they are operating independently.

The Pentagon group's proceedings are so secret that officials asked to help it have not even been told its title or mandate. But in recent days the circle of those with knowledge of its deliberations has widened beyond a narrow group working for the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"Go Big," the first option, originally contemplated a large increase in U.S. troops in Iraq to try to break the cycle of sectarian and insurgent violence. A classic counterinsurgency campaign, though, would require several hundred thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers as well as heavily armed Iraqi police. That option has been all but rejected by the study group, which concluded that there are not enough troops in the U.S. military and not enough effective Iraqi forces, said sources who have been informally briefed on the review.

The sources insisted on anonymity because no one at the Pentagon has been permitted to discuss the review with outsiders. The review group is led by three high-profile colonels -- H.R. McMaster and Peter Mansoor of the Army, and Thomas C. Greenwood of the Marine Corps. None of them would comment for this article.

Spokesmen for the chairman and vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff did not return calls or respond to e-mails seeking comment.

"Go Home," the third option, calls for a swift withdrawal of U.S. troops. It was rejected by the Pentagon group as likely to push Iraq directly into a full-blown and bloody civil war.

The group has devised a hybrid plan that combines part of the first option with the second one -- "Go Long" -- and calls for cutting the U.S. combat presence in favor of a long-term expansion of the training and advisory efforts. Under this mixture of options, which is gaining favor inside the military, the U.S. presence in Iraq, currently about 140,000 troops, would be boosted by 20,000 to 30,000 for a short period, the officials said.

The purpose of the temporary but notable increase, they said, would be twofold: To do as much as possible to curtail sectarian violence, and also to signal to the Iraqi government and public that the shift to a "Go Long" option that aims to eventually cut the U.S. presence is not a disguised form of withdrawal.

Even so, there is concern that such a radical shift in the U.S. posture in Iraq could further damage the standing of its government, which U.S. officials worry is already shaky. Under the hybrid plan, the short increase in U.S. troop levels would be followed by a long-term plan to radically cut the presence, perhaps to 60,000 troops.

That combination plan, which one defense official called "Go Big But Short While Transitioning to Go Long," could backfire if Iraqis suspect it is really a way for the United States to moonwalk out of Iraq -- that is, to imitate singer Michael Jackson's trademark move of appearing to move forward while actually sliding backward. "If we commit to that concept, we have to accept upfront that it might result in the opposite of what we want," the official said.

The Pentagon official said this short-term boost could be achieved through three steps: extending the tours of duty of some units already in Iraq, sending other units there earlier than planned and activating some Army Reserve units.

The group concluded that such a step might be necessary because it is concerned that the continuing violence is undercutting the Iraqi government's credibility. "Folks increasingly realize that if violence can't be contained, the spiral downward will continue, the national government will lose the effectiveness it has . . . . and then all bets will be off," the official said.

Also, it would take months to prepare and implement the expansion of the program to train and advise Iraqi forces, he noted. The military will have to find those additional advisers, prepare them for the deployment, get infrastructure in place to house and feed them, order and ship equipment for them to use, and recruit additional Iraqis for them to train.

"The 'Go Long' approach is one that can work if there is sufficient strategic patience, resources appropriated and [if] leadership executes effectively," a military intelligence official said.

Another potential obstacle to the "Go Long" option is that it runs counter to the impulse of many congressional Democrats to find a way to get out of Iraq quickly. Planners envision taking five to 10 more years to create a stable and competent Iraqi army. Because it doesn't lead to a swift exit, some Democrats could criticize this option as a disguised version of "staying the course."

On the other hand, the hybrid version of "Go Long" may be remarkably close to the recommendation that the Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.). That group's findings, expected to be issued next month, are said to focus on changing the emphasis of U.S. military operations from combating the insurgency to training Iraqis, and also to find ways to increase security in Baghdad and bring neighboring countries into talks about stabilizing Iraq.

The Pentagon group has given a thumbs-down to what it considered variants of withdrawal, such as pulling U.S. units out of the cities and keeping them in isolated enclaves, where they would not interact with the Iraqi population but would be available to combat major insurgent offensives and also to protect the government against coups.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East, expressed a similar view last week when he told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he believes that immediate troop withdrawals would increase the violence in Iraq.

US Troop Levels In Iraq May Rise, Then Decline (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095978

WASHINGTON

It's being dubbed by some as the "last big push" option, and it appears increasingly to be what President Bush favors on Iraq.

Despite growing expectations of a troop withdrawal from Iraq in the wake of Democratic gains in Congress, the White House appears to be leaning in a different direction: at least a temporary rise in US troop levels.

The numbers would not be huge, perhaps 20,000 on top of the 144,000 US soldiers already fighting the war. But the idea would be to stabilize Baghdad - a priority that has proved dishearteningly elusive since September - and to allow for a major diplomatic push aimed at drawing Iraq's neighbors into resolving the spiraling violence.

Implicit in the perspective of the officials and experts who see this as a kind of military "Hail Mary" pass is the assumption that a phased reduction of US troops would begin next fall - whether or not Iraq had been brought back from the brink of all-out civil war.

Some experts who have favored increasing the number of US troops in the past say conditions have deteriorated to such a degree that before any steps are taken, the United States must first differentiate between a knee-jerk act of desperation and something that can really improve the situation in Iraq.

"Before we go to even 20,000 more troops, we'd better determine how we can sustain these numbers and whether or not it can make any difference in getting the Iraqi government to do what has to be done," says Harlan Ullman, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington.

Speculation over a temporary surge in troops has been fueled in part by sources close to administration deliberations on Iraq strategy. A troop increase has been one option on the table as the administration, faced with growing consensus that the current approach in Iraq is not working, has weighed new directions.

The Iraq Study Group - the congressionally appointed commission co-chaired by former secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic congressional leader Lee Hamilton - looks favorably on the troop spike option, according to experts who have worked with the commission. This inclination is especially true, observers say, if a troop increase were carried out in tandem with a major diplomatic push to enlist Iraq's neighbors in helping to stabilize the country and assist in its reconstruction.

Statements from Bush and Cheney

But the most explicit evidence that the White House may be moving in this direction comes from Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Their recent rhetoric appears to rule out the idea of a rapid reduction in troop levels, while maintaining an insistence on achieving "victory" in Iraq.

In Vietnam for an Asian economic summit, Bush said Friday, "We'll succeed [in Iraq] unless we quit," adding that he was assuring regional leaders gathered with him that "we'll get the job done."

And speaking Friday in Washington, Mr. Cheney suggested the midterm election results would not sway administration policy. "To get out [of Iraq] before the job is done would convince the terrorists once again that free nations will change our policies, forsake our friends, and abandon our interests whenever we are confronted with violence and blackmail," he said in a speech to the Federalist Society.

At the same time, the Pentagon on Friday issued deployment orders to maintain the current level of troops in Iraq through 2007 - with the door left open to "surging" more troops into the country as conditions and strategy dictate.

An increase is logistically possible, though at a growing cost to the troops, military experts say. Some of the soldiers slated for deployment in 2007 will be undertaking a third tour to Iraq when the expectation had been for only one.

"Just to keep the level of 144,000, we're having to extend two brigades beyond a year. So we're already talking about major hardship for these soldiers," says Lawrence Korb, an Iraq policy expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "Any increase, even a relatively small one like what they're talking about, would compound that strain."

Supporters of a troop increase say it would allow for a serious push for security in Baghdad, giving the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki breathing room to make the political decisions necessary to relaunch a "national reconciliation" drive. More US troops and money would also be put into stepped-up training of Iraqi security forces.

But critics say an increase in US troops could reduce the pressure on the Maliki government for crucial political decisions, even while inflaming Iraqi public opinion that is increasingly hostile to the US presence.

"We've already increased troop levels, and things haven't gotten any better," says Mr. Korb, who served in the Pentagon under the Reagan administration. He notes that US troop levels dipped to nearly 100,000 earlier this year before sectarian violence began ratcheting up. Too late?

Others who have supported sending in more troops in the past say the time when it could make a difference has probably passed. "I have made the argument for more troops for some time, but I no longer do because I think it's too late," says Mr. Ullman of CSIS.

The additional US troops with the right skills to potentially make a difference in Baghdad and with training Iraqi forces aren't simply sitting around somewhere at the ready, he says. Preparing them would take six months to a year, he adds.

But beyond that, Ullman says the Maliki government is beholden to political powers sustained by dozens of militias. "That's not something the US military is in a position to do anything about," he says.

Korb says sending in more troops risks signaling to the Iraqi army that it is under no increasing pressure to take on more of the burden - a point made in congressional testimony last week by Gen. John Abizaid, commander of US forces in the Middle East.

Some observers say any increase in troops would fly in the face of public opinion as expressed in the midterm elections. Polls released last week show support for Bush's handling of Iraq falling to new lows.

ARMY GIVES RUMSFELD DOCTRINE A REWRITE (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

The '07 manual puts greater value on maintaining stability than on swift action.

FT. LEAVENWORTH, KAN. — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld may be leaving under a cloud of criticism over his handling of the Iraq war, but his invasion plan — emphasizing speed over massive troop numbers — has consistently been held up as a resounding success.

Yet with Iraq near chaos 3 1/2 years later, a key Army manual now is being rewritten in a way that rejects the Rumsfeld doctrine and counsels against using it again.

The draft version of the Army's Full Spectrum Operations field manual argues that in addition to defeating the enemy, military units must focus on providing security for the population — even during major combat.

"The big idea here is that stability tasks have to be a consideration at every level and every operation," said Clinton J. Ancker III, head of the Army's Combined Arms Doctrine Directorate and an author of the guide.

Officers use the field manual, the authoritative guidebook on how to conduct ground operations, to develop tactics for military endeavors including war, counterinsurgency and peacekeeping. When completed, the manual will be taught to officers at all levels.

Before the war, Rumsfeld prodded Gen. Tommy Franks and other officers to design an invasion plan to fit his beliefs about how modern militaries should fight. When Saddam Hussein's regime collapsed and Baghdad seemed to fall in just 21 days, Rumsfeld and his emphasis on speed over mass got the credit.

But after the initial military success, the Pentagon was criticized for not doing enough to plan for postwar stability. And Rumsfeld drew objections for his dismissive attitude toward the disorder and looting in Iraq, particularly when he said, just days after the fall of Baghdad, that "stuff happens" in democracies.

The old manual emphasized that stability operations usually follow combat. The draft version of the 2007 ground operations manual instructs commanders that they cannot wait for offensive operations to end before providing security and services for the population, and stresses a combination of offense, defense and stability operations.

"Army forces must defeat enemies and simultaneously shape the civil situation through stability or civil support operations," says the manual, the contents of which were described to the Los Angeles Times by its authors. Scheduled to be completed and made public next year, the guidebook does not explicitly criticize the invasion, and in fact notes how the Iraqi military forces collapsed in the face of the swift American attack. Nevertheless, some of the ideas the guide embraces contrast sharply with Rumsfeld's invasion blueprint.

"Iraq is the hardest test case you can dream up," said manual coauthor Michael D. Burke, who works at the doctrine directorate. "There is a lot of value in overwhelming your enemy and ending intensive combat."

But he added: "In Iraq, military operations were the catalyst for collapsing the Baathist regime and leaving a complete power vacuum."

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman declined to comment on the new doctrine, citing the manual's draft status. But he pointed to a November 2005 directive that established "nation-building" as one of the military's core missions. Though it said that such efforts were best performed by civilians, the directive arguably set the stage for the Army's more thorough examination of its role in stability operations.

The new manual does not contradict Rumsfeld's belief that a smaller American force can defeat a larger enemy military, but it does say that dealing with the collapse of a government is likely to require more troops than the military action itself.

And when civil authority collapses in the face of an American assault, U.S. commanders must ensure the population is protected and fed, even if the offensive operations have not concluded, the manual says. That means, Ancker said, the Army can be fast or it can be small, but it cannot be both and also lay the groundwork for winning the peace.

Rumsfeld's critics generally have pointed to summer 2003 as the period when the most important misstep was made in Iraq. American forces were drawn down, and the military did not react quickly to confront a rising insurgency.

The draft manual says the seeds of an insurgency can be planted early on, even during initial military operations. And the guide's authors say the missteps that gave rise to the insurgency may have occurred during the march to Baghdad.

"There is a period of time in the immediate aftermath of any fight where the population will rely on the [American] military to keep them safe and provide essential services," Ancker said.

The concept, according to Ancker, is akin to what battlefield medics call the "golden hour" — the short period in which patients can be saved if their wounds are properly treated. During an offensive operation, if a military does not try to at least bandage the wounds of a society, the effort can suffer even if the battle is won. After an urban battle, commanders must try to provide basic services and security, the manual says.

"If we do not plan to account for those tasks in the immediate aftermath of a fight," Ancker said, "then there is a period of time somebody else can step in and use that failure as a lever to create disaffected parts of the population, and that can turn into … an insurgency."

Under the new guidebook, if a unit does not have the forces to conduct stability operations after an offensive mission, the commander must request more manpower.

"When possible, the commander should consider and attempt to relieve the suffering of the local population," the manual says.

"If his resources and mission dictates that he cannot do this then he is obligated, morally and legally, to inform his higher headquarters so they can provide resources to ensure civil security and minimal essential services."

Older doctrine divided the Army's duties into war and other missions, like peacekeeping. The old manual — completed in 2001 after the military's experience in Bosnia and Somalia — said the Army needed to be ready to conduct offensive operations even during stability missions. The 2007 manual, written during the Iraq experience, argues that even when on offense, the Army needs to be ready to conduct stability operations.

Previous manuals have argued that if a force is trained for major war, it also will be able to handle counterinsurgency or peacekeeping. The new guidebook will note that units must be ready to do both, but it also will say training for a primarily offensive force should differ from training for stability operations.

"Operational experience demonstrates that forces trained exclusively for offensive and defensive operations are not as proficient at stability operations as those units that train specifically for stability," the guide says, alluding to lessons learned in Iraq.

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who as commander of the Combined Arms Center at Ft. Leavenworth oversees the doctrine directorate, argued in a speech in September at the nonpartisan Brookings Institution think tank that the 2007 guide should have wide influence on Army doctrine.

"It will ripple throughout everything that we do, because this is the capstone manual from which all others take their lead," Petraeus said.

Some think the manual focuses too much on major combat operations, like invasions, and not enough on counterinsurgency. Others think the emphasis on stability threatens to focus the Army too much on the "soft stuff."

Ft. Leavenworth will host a conference in January to discuss the manual, and to make sure the document strikes the right balance and embraces the lessons learned in Iraq.

"We cannot move away from fighting and winning wars," Ancker said. "But the combat side is not adequate to ensure the peace."

Rebuilding In Iraq Tops 4,000 Projects (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

When and if the smoke ever clears in Iraq, Pentagon officials say the world finally will see a minor miracle.

"Most Americans don't understand something equivalent to the Marshall Plan has been accomplished in Iraq," said Dean G. Popps, principal assistant secretary of the Army for acquisitions, logistics and technology.

The Army is the program manager for $20 billion in U.S. taxpayer money that flowed to Iraq after the 2003 invasion to spur a building boom of more than 4,000 projects.

Amid constant deadly threats from bloodthirsty insurgents, and without a viable Iraqi private contracting sector, the Army Corps of Engineers has supervised the construction of electric grids, health care centers, schools, water and sewage treatment facilities, police stations, academies and border posts.

Not counting the deteriorating security situation, no facet of the Iraq war has received more negative press than the U.S.- and Iraqi-financed reconstruction. The Washington Times, along with other newspapers, has published a series of articles on setbacks and corruption. But, the Pentagon contends there is another storyline.

"It's quite a heroic story maligned often by the news media," Mr. Popps said during an interview in his E-Ring Pentagon office. A nearby multicolored map designates hundreds of projects started and completed, from Mosul to Basra.

Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, has issued a steady stream of reports revealing fraud and mismanagement. Perhaps his most damaging finding was that nearly a quarter of $37 billion in United Nations-secured oil money -- not U.S. taxpayer funds -- shipped to Iraq cannot be traced and was likely stolen.

But Mr. Bowen has said fraud involving U.S. money, while serious, is not widespread and that the huge majority of projects proceeded as required. And, a Bowen report to Congress last summer seemed to back up Mr. Popps' message of progress.

"Although the story of Iraq reconstruction has been punctuated by shortfalls and deficiencies, the infrastructure overview provided [in] this quarterly report presents a picture of significant progress achieved through a substantial U.S. investment of time, talent and tax dollars in Iraq's relief and reconstruction."

Mr. Popps said it is first important to understand what the rebuilding team inherited. U.S. intelligence knew little about the actual state of Iraq's energy infrastructure and social service network. When the Army Corps of Engineers got on the ground, there was shock:

•The three regional sewage treatments plants in greater Baghdad did not work; raw waste poured into the Tigris River and downstream through villages. Sadr City, the impoverished Shi'ite slum repressed by the ruling Sunni Ba'ath Party, lacked any sewage system. "Some slam the Americans because there is sewage in Sadr City," said an incredulous Mr. Popps. "Please."

•Few towns had a central supply of clean water.

•The electrical grid suffered under 1950s technology and disrepair. Saddam Hussein starved the rest of the country of power to give the capital of 6 million about 20 hours a day.

•The country lacked any primary health care facilities; hospitals and schools were run down and lacked supplies. New hospitals had not been built in 20 years. More than half the public health centers remained closed. Of 13,000 schools, more than 10,000 needed significant renovations.

The Pentagon in 2003 summoned American firms to get reconstruction started in the absence of Iraqi ministries that could supervise and a private sector that was in shambles under Saddam's totalitarian rule.

DOJ_NMG_0095982

"The ministries were jammed with people who did nothing," Mr. Popps said. "They sat around and smoked and drank tea and held 'worry beads.' It was an economy based on incompetence and corruption."

Today, the Pentagon is handing out a score sheet:

•Six new primary care facilities, with 66 more under construction; 11 hospitals renovated; more than 800 schools fixed up; more than 300 police stations and facilities and 248 border control forts.

•Added 407,000 cubic meters per day of water treatment; a new sewage-treatment system for Basra; work on Baghdad's three plants continues; oil production exceeds the 2002 level of 2 million barrels a day by 500,000.

•The Ministry of Electricity now sends power to Baghdad for four to eight hours a day, and 10 to 12 for the rest of the country. Iraqis are now free to buy consumer items such as generators, which provide some homes with power around-the-clock.

Mr. Popps said all this was accomplished despite a concerted effort by terrorists to bomb construction sites and kill workers. Thursday's kidnapping of private contractors south of Baghdad illustrates the problem. The State Department was forced to increase spending on security, up to $5 billion of the $20 billion, or risk losing more projects to saboteurs.

The Army Corps has ferried reporters to what it considers successful sites in an effort to get a few positive stories on reconstruction. But rarely do any materialize, Mr. Popps said.

"What has hurt the public perception of reconstruction is incomplete leaks to the media that there is a problem with a particular project," he said. "What is sexy to reporters is a police station that has urine in the ceiling. That's what the press prefers to talk about rather than the great successes we have made."

The "urine" reference was contained in the latest bad news story about reconstruction in Iraq. Mr. Bowen reported in September he was reviewing all projects done by the California-based Parsons Corp. in the aftermath of finding serious plumbing problems at the $75 million Baghdad Police College. Mr. Bowen has criticized Parsons, which uses local Iraqi contractors, on other projects, including primary health care buildings.

The company has cited the violent environment as part of the problem. A Pentagon spokesman said the company made all repairs by an Oct. 6 target at no government cost.

There are two key money amounts devoted to reconstruction: One is $37 billion in cash the U.N. turned over to Iraq in 2003. The second is $36 billion appropriated by Congress, $20 billion of which was the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund. The remaining $16 billion is evenly divided for building the Iraqi security forces and for various military projects, some controlled by U.S. commanders.

In late September, Iraq rebuilders received some praise from Mr. Bowen. He made one of his periodic appearances before the House Government Reform Committee, where Chairman Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, said there was some good news out of the war-wrecked country.

"You said accurately in your opening statement that not everything is wrong in Iraq, and that's true," Mr. Bowen responded. "A fair reading of our full report demonstrably underscores that fact. Indeed, 70 percent of the projects we've visited and 80 percent of the money allocated to them indicate that those projects, from a construction perspective, have met what the contract anticipated."

Victory In Iraq Impossible, Says Kissinger (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent, And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Henry Kissinger, the former US secretary of state who has advised the Bush administration on the war in Iraq, on Sunday said he no longer believed a military victory was possible in the conflict.

“If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control . . . I don’t believe that is possible,” Mr Kissinger told BBC television.

His dire assessment of the war, and view that the US should engage Iraq’s neighbours in seeking a diplomatic solution, reinforced calls by Democratic lawmakers in Washington for the White House to speak to Iran and Syria to help stem the tide of violence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0095983

Mr Kissinger's remarks came as Walid Muallem, Syria's foreign minister, became the most senior Syrian politician to visit Baghdad since the US-led invasion.

Mr Muallem said violence in Iraq would be reduced if a timetable was set for the withdrawal of US forces.

But interviews with senior lawmakers on US talk shows on Sunday underscored the wide divide that exists not only on the question of whether engaging Syria and Iran would be fruitful, but whether the White House needed to boost US troop deployment in the short term or begin the process of bringing troops home.

Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, suggested on ABC's This Week that he would consider calling for American troops to leave Iraq if the White House did not agree to send additional forces to secure the country – a proposition President George W. Bush has previously rejected. Mr McCain said US troops were "fighting and dying for a failed policy", but added that he would "exhaust every possibility" to fix the situation before calling for troops to abandon Iraq, because the consequences of losing the war were "severe".

Another senator, Democrat Carl Levin, who will take on the chairmanship of the armed services committee, countered on CNN's Late Edition that he supported a phased withdrawal of troops to put a "pressure point on the neighbours who do not want Iraq to disintegrate".

The depth of the sectarian violence in Iraq was underscored by the news that Ammar al-Saffar, the deputy health minister, was kidnapped from his Baghdad home just one day after another Shia politician, Ali al-Adhadh, was killed. A Sunni insurgent group claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing that killed 22 people in Hilla, the mainly Shia neighbourhood south of Baghdad, in retaliation for a mass kidnapping from a Sunni-run education institute last week.

Separately, the New York-based Human Rights Watch said in a statement due to be released on Monday that the just-concluded trial of Saddam Hussein and members of his regime was marred by so many flaws that the verdict was unsound. "The court's conduct, as documented in this report, reflects a basic lack of understanding of fundamental fair trial principles, and how to uphold them in the conduct of a relatively complex trial. The result is a trial that did not meet key fair trial standards," the report concluded.

Mr Hussein and two other members of his regime were sentenced to death on November 5, following a year-long trial on charges related to a campaign of reprisals against the Shia village of Dujail.

Among the flaws listed in the 97-page report was the presentation of evidence that was not given in advance of the trial to the defence and testimony from absent witnesses that was read into the record without giving the defence a chance to challenge those witnesses. Administrative problems included lack of planning for the security of defence counsels, three of whom were assassinated.

In addition, the HRW report argued that the evidence had big gaps, in particular its failure to show Mr Hussein's regime worked.

Kissinger: Iraq Military Win Impossible (AP)

By Tariq Panja

AP, November 20, 2006

Military victory is no longer possible in Iraq, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said in a television interview broadcast Sunday.

Kissinger presented a bleak vision of Iraq, saying the U.S. government must enter into dialogue with Iraq's regional neighbors — including Iran — if progress is to be made in the region.

"If you mean by 'military victory' an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," he told the British Broadcasting Corp.

But Kissinger, an architect of the Vietnam war who has advised President Bush about Iraq, warned against a rapid withdrawal of coalition troops, saying it could destabilize Iraq's neighbors and cause a long-lasting conflict.

"A dramatic collapse of Iraq — whatever we think about how the situation was created — would have disastrous consequences for which we would pay for many years and which would bring us back, one way or another, into the region," he said.

Kissinger, whose views have been sought by the Iraqi Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker III, called for an international conference bringing together the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, Iraq's neighbors — including Iran — and regional powers like India and Pakistan to work out a way forward for the region.

"I think we have to redefine the course, but I don't think that the alternative is between military victory, as defined previously, or total withdrawal," he said.

Kissinger Foresees No Military Win In Iraq (WP)

LONDON, Nov. 19 -- Military victory is no longer possible in Iraq, former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger told the British Broadcasting Corp. on Sunday.

Kissinger presented a bleak vision, saying the U.S. government must enter into dialogue with Iraq's neighbors -- including Iran -- if progress is to be made.

"If you mean by 'military victory' an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," he said.

Syrian Foreign Minister, In Baghdad, Calls For Timetable On U.S. Troop Withdrawal (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Monday, Nov. 20 — Syria's foreign minister said Sunday during a visit here that his government was prepared to help stabilize Iraq, and he called for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops, saying that it would help reduce the violence.

His trip, the first to Baghdad by a senior Syrian official since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, came on another day of widespread violence in Iraq. A suicide car bombing killed 17 people and wounded 49 in the southern Shiite city of Hilla, and the deputy health minister was kidnapped from his home in the capital.

In recent weeks, Iraqi and some Western officials have promoted the idea of actively involving Iraq's neighbors, especially Syria and Iran, in the search for a solution to the soaring sectarian violence in Iraq.

President Bush has refused to open high-level talks with Syria and Iran, countries he has accused of providing financing and weapons to militias in Iraq. But as his administration conducts a broad reassessment of its policy in Iraq, the president has come under increasing pressure to drop his opposition.

James A. Baker III, the Republican co-chairman of a bipartisan group studying policy options in Iraq, has met several times with Syrian officials to discuss how they might cooperate with the United States, according to the Syrian ambassador to Washington.

In an interview with the BBC broadcast Sunday, former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger endorsed the idea of involving Syria and Iran in the discussion of Iraq's future, suggesting that they be included in an international conference.

"At some early point, an international conference should be called that involves neighbors, perhaps the permanent members of the Security Council and countries that have a major interest in the outcome, like India and Pakistan," said Mr. Kissinger, who sometimes advises the Bush administration on Iraq policy, and who has been consulted by Mr. Baker's Iraq Study Group. "I believe America has to be in some dialogue with Iran."

Elaborating on his argument for a change in course, Mr. Kissinger said that a clear-cut military victory was no longer achievable. At the same time, he argued that withdrawing American forces might lead to a civil war more violent than the fighting that occurred in the former Yugoslavia.

"If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," Mr. Kissinger said.

"If we were to withdraw all the forces without any international understanding and without any even partial solution of some of the problems, the civil war in Iraq will take on even more violent forms," he said.

Syria's foreign minister, Walid al-Moallem, promised Sunday to cooperate with Iraqi officials in an effort to curb violence. Iraqi and American officials have accused Syria of not doing enough to prevent the flow of foreign fighters and munitions across the Syria-Iraq border.

At a brief news conference with Iraq's foreign minister, Hoshiyar Zebari, Mr. Moallem said he condemned "all the terrorism taking place in Iraq."

He added, "The security and stability of Iraq is vital for the security and stability of Syria."

But Mr. Moallem also urged a timetable for a pullout of American forces, saying it "would contribute to reducing the violence in Iraq." The Bush administration has steadfastly refused to put a timetable in place.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, said in an interview last week that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had been "working hard" to bring Iraq's neighboring countries into the discussions on how to achieve stability in Iraq.

Mr. Rubaie said: "He's reaching out to them, sending envoys. He's sending a very clear message that unless Iraq is stable and secure, nobody's going to be secure."

Mr. Moallem said Sunday that his visit to Iraq was not related to any pressure by Western officials. "I came here to please the people of Iraq and the people of Syria," he said.

In the Hilla car bombing, the deadliest attack of the day in Iraq, a man driving a minibus loaded with explosives pulled alongside a group of day laborers who had gathered on a street corner to wait for employment offers.

As the men eagerly swarmed the van, the driver pushed a detonator and blew up the vehicle.

By nightfall, the police had captured three men suspected of involvement in the attack, including one Iraqi and two Egyptians, according to Maj. Gen. Qais al-Mamouri, the police chief in the town of Babil, near Hilla.

The men confessed and said the suicide bomber was Syrian, the general said.

The kidnapping of the deputy health minister, Ammar al-Saffar, occurred Sunday evening when heavily armed gunmen dressed in the uniforms of Iraqi security forces stormed his house in northern Baghdad and took him away in a convoy of vehicles, officials said.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry, Mohammad al-Askari, said that the kidnappers had been wearing the uniforms of the national police and were not members of the armed forces, but a police official said that the gunmen had been wearing Iraqi Army uniforms.

Calls seeking comments from the spokesmen for the government and from the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police force, were not answered.

The kidnapping appeared to have sectarian overtones. Mr. Saffar is Shiite and a member of Mr. Maliki's Dawa Party. The Health Ministry has been widely accused by Sunni Arab leaders of favoring Shiites and even harboring Shiite death squads that single out Sunnis.

Five days ago gunmen wearing police uniforms and suspected of being members of a Shiite militia kidnapped dozens of people from the Ministry of Higher Education, which is overseen by a Sunni Arab minister and has long been viewed by Shiites as a Sunni-dominated institution.

The Iraqi police in the southern city of Basra said they had rounded up 200 suspected insurgents during a search for four American security contractors and an Austrian who were kidnapped Thursday when their truck convoy was ambushed near Safwan.

Maj. Gen. Ali al-Musawi, a police commander in Basra, said the search for the captives was continuing.

Three car bombs were detonated almost simultaneously in a bus depot in a predominantly Shiite neighborhood of eastern Baghdad, killing at least 10 people, wounding another 45 and destroying vehicles and shops in the area, witnesses and officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0095986

A group of witnesses and residents who gathered at the site soon afterward blamed Sunni Arab insurgents for the attacks. They directed their ire at the country's Sunni leaders. "Let them come here and see what their followers are doing," one of them shouted.

Other attacks reported by the police in Baghdad, Diyala Province, Kirkuk and the northern town of Hawija killed a total of at least 44 people and wounded at least 71. The police in Diyala also reported killing 14 insurgents.

The American command reported early Monday that a soldier from the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed when his vehicle struck a bomb in southeastern Baghdad on Saturday.

Syria Vows To Help Quell Violence In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 19 -- Syria's foreign minister, in a rare visit to Baghdad by a Syrian official, on Sunday pledged cooperation in stemming the sectarian violence that threatens Iraq, even as scores of people were killed or found dead across the country.

One of the deadliest attacks occurred in the southern Shiite Muslim city of Hilla, where a suicide bomber killed 22 day laborers after luring them to his minivan with the promise of work. An attack near the northern city of Kirkuk killed three children who were lured to a booby-trapped doll.

The Iraqi and U.S. governments have accused Syria of contributing to the violence by allowing fighters to cross into Iraq to join the insurgency. Foreign Minister Waleed al-Muallem's visit, the first by such a high-ranking Syrian official since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, was seen as a step toward smoothing those relations. But he also called on the Bush administration to set a timetable for withdrawing troops.

"Syria's intensions toward Iraq are good in all times, and on that principle we are looking forward to a good relationship between Iraq and Syria that takes history and common interests into consideration," Muallem said during a news conference with Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari.

Syria and Iraq have been adversaries since the 1980s, when Syria sided with Iran in its war against Iraq.

"This visit will be the starting point to solve all of our problems," Zebari said.

Those problems were apparent Sunday.

At least 111 people were killed or found dead Sunday, the Associated Press reported. Fifty-six bodies, many of them showing signs of torture, were dumped in three cities.

In the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, unknown gunmen shot and killed three members of a family. A roadside bomb and two car bombs exploded one after the other near a bus station in Mashtal, a mostly Shiite area of southeastern Baghdad, killing 11.

Gunmen kidnapped one of Iraq's deputy health ministers, Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite, from his home in northern Baghdad, just a day after a prominent Shiite politician was gunned down. Iraqi army and police said the gunmen wore police uniforms. Last week, dozens of people were kidnapped at a Ministry of Higher Education office, also by men in police uniforms.

Some prominent U.S. officials say that engaging in talks with adversaries such as Syria and Iran is key to curbing the violence. The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton, is expected to recommend such action in its report, set to come out next month.

U.S. officials have resisted talks with Iran because they believe the Tehran government has fomented tension in Iraq and because they are worried about its growing influence in the region.

U.S. officials also say Syria's borders have become an entry point into Iraq for Sunni Arab insurgents. Muallem denied that assertion.

"We are making all efforts to secure the borders, but that does not come from one side only," he said. "America has not been able to stamp out its borders with Mexico, so they started to build a wall between them, and that tells us how it is difficult to control the borders."

According to an Iraqi general in Hilla, an Iraqi and two Egyptians arrested in the suicide bombing told officials that the bomber was Syrian.

Elsewhere, security forces detained 200 suspected insurgents in southern Iraq in their search for five private security contractors, including four Americans, who were kidnapped near the Kuwait border.

Officials announced Sunday that forces killed two suspected terrorists in airstrikes near Baghdad on Saturday and eight in a raid in Ramadi. In Tikrit, nearly 50 insurgents were killed and 20 captured during a five-day mission, officials said. Six Iraqi soldiers and two coalition forces soldiers were killed while clearing roads of improvised explosive devices.

Special correspondents Saad Sarhan and Waleed Saffar and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Syria Urges Timeline In Iraq (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — Syria's foreign minister called Sunday for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq, and his counterpart in Baghdad demanded that Damascus take action against insurgent financiers and organizers hiding there.

It was the highest-level meeting between the neighboring countries since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

"We think that the presence of a timetable for withdrawal of foreign troops will assist in reducing the violence and creating security," said Walid Moallem, the most senior Syrian official to visit Iraq since the war started.

President Bush has rejected proposed timelines to leave Iraq.

In a news conference in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, Moallem denied suggestions that Syria had been pressured by the U.S. to meet with Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari.

The visit followed news reports that James A. Baker III, the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan U.S. panel, had contacted Syrian officials for help in stopping the violence in Iraq.

In Washington, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) on Sunday reiterated his call for a short-term increase in troops for Iraq.

The Republican presidential hopeful told ABC's "This Week" that the move might cause a "terrible strain" on the U.S. military, but said "there's only one thing worse and that is defeat … and we've been losing."

McCain added that U.S. troops were "fighting and dying for a failed policy" and needed reinforcements to ensure victory.

"The consequences of failure are catastrophic," he said. "It will spread to the region. You will see Iran more emboldened. Eventually, you could see Iran pose a greater threat to the state of Israel."

The political developments came as violence continued across Iraq.

A Marine was killed in Al Anbar province Sunday, the U.S. military said. And Iraqi special forces today, aided by U.S. advisors, raided a Sadr City mosque compound thought to be harboring kidnappers, the military said. There were no casualties reported. Three people were arrested.

On Sunday, at least 45 bodies were discovered in various areas of Baghdad, and three explosions killed at least 11 people and injured 32 in the Baghdad neighborhood of Mashtal, where an Iraqi police colonel and his guard were slain earlier.

And in two separate kidnappings in the capital, Shiite Muslim Deputy Health Minister Ammar Safar and Sunni Arab criminal court Judge Mudhaffar Ubaidi disappeared Sunday.

Additional attacks occurred across Iraq.

In Hawija, 35 miles southwest of Kirkuk, insurgents put an explosive in a toy and left it near a house. The toy exploded when children approached, killing three and injuring at least one.

In the southern city of Hillah, at least 17 people were killed and 49 injured when a suicide bomber lured laborers into his minivan and detonated explosives.

Violence also hit Kirkuk, where a man set off his explosives belt during a funeral, killing three people and injuring at least 24.

"I was walking with my friends near the funeral and we felt a big explosion," said Mustafa Iden, 33. "We rushed to the explosion site and saw bodies of people torn apart. There were body parts all over."

There was still no word on the fate of five private security guards — four Americans and one Austrian — kidnapped Thursday in southern Iraq by gunmen in Iraqi police uniforms.

DOJ_NMG_0095988

In Washington, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said he planned to introduce legislation that would reinstate the military draft, which was eliminated in 1973 near the end of the Vietnam War.

And former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, in a British Broadcasting Corp. television interview broadcast Sunday, said that "a clear military victory" was no longer possible in Iraq.

"If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," Kissinger said.

With the ongoing violence in Iraq, Washington is considering a diplomatic push for greater cooperation with Iraq's neighbors, including Syria and Iran.

U.S. and Iraqi leaders say Syria and Iran have undermined security in Iraq by allowing the cross-border flow of weapons and militants.

"There is even money smuggled by the families of the former regime in Syria," said Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi government spokesman. "These are unimaginable sums and they are being used to fund terrorism in Iraq. These activities are clear and evident in Syria, and they are countenanced by the government."

Zebari said that he discussed with Moallem the possibility of reestablishing full diplomatic relations and that he looked forward to meeting again.

Zebari also said that he hoped the meeting would create regional momentum to help Iraq establish greater security.

"We don't expect to solve all of our problems at one time or with one visit," he said. "We wanted to make a starting point to open the way in solving all our disputes in good faith.

"This visit will send a good message to all the regional players that they should seriously support Iraq's security and stability."

Syria Calls For U.S. Timetable In Iraq (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, November 20, 2006

Syria's foreign minister called Sunday for a timetable for the withdrawal of American forces to help end Iraq's sectarian bloodbath, in a groundbreaking diplomatic mission to Iraq that comes amid increasing calls for the U.S. to seek cooperation from Syria and Iran. At least 112 people were killed nationwide, following a week that had already seen hundreds of deaths.

Walid Moallem, the highest level Syrian official to visit since the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein, denounced terrorism in Iraq even as Washington mulled its own overture to Damascus for help in ending Iraq's violence.

Syria and Iraq share a long and porous desert border and both Baghdad and Washington have accused Damascus of not doing enough to stop the flow of foreign Arab fighters.

Moallem spoke at the end of a day that saw suspected Sunni Muslim bombers kill at least 33 Shiites and the kidnapping of a deputy health minister — believed the senior-most government official abducted in Iraq. Many Sunni attackers are believed to have infiltrated from Syria.

A suicide bomber in the predominantly Shiite city of Hillah south of Baghdad lured men to his KIA minivan with promises of a day's work as laborers, then blew it up, killing at least 22 and wounding 44, police said.

Babil province police Capt. Muthana Khalid said three suspected terrorists, two Egyptians and an Iraqi, were arrested on suspicion of planning the suicide attack with the bomber, a Syrian.

Within hours, a roadside bomb and two car bombs exploded one after another near a bus station in Mashtal, a mostly Shiite area of southeastern Baghdad, killing 11 and wounding 51, police said.

Besides the victims of the bombings in Hillah and Baghdad, at least 23 other people were killed nationwide. In addition, the bodies of 56 murder victims, many of them tortured, were dumped in three Iraqi cities, 45 of them in Baghdad alone.

Also Sunday, gunmen kidnapped Iraq's deputy health minister from his home in northern Baghdad, the Iraqi army and police reported. They said the gunmen wore police uniforms and arrived in seven vehicles to abduct Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite.

Al-Saffar was snatched nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. That ministry is predominantly Sunni.

In the deep south of Iraq, security forces searching for five private security contractors, four Americans and an Austrian who were kidnapped near the Kuwait border, detained about 200 suspected insurgents, police said Sunday. Police Maj. Gen. Ali al-Moussawi said none of the hostages was found.

Family members identified one of the American captives as Jonathon Cote, 23, a native of Getzville, N.Y. He worked as a security guard for Crescent Security Group, his stepmother said. Family members spoke to The Associated Press anonymously out of fear for Cote's safety. A second captive was identified late last week as Paul Reuben, 39, a former police officer from a Minneapolis, Minn., suburb.

In one of the most significant diplomatic breakthrough since the ouster of Saddam, a restoration of contacts between Damascus and Baghdad was seen as a means of convincing Damascus to exert tighter control over its border.

The frontier has been a major crossing point for Sunni Arab fighters who infiltrated to join the insurgency that has been responsible for the deaths of most U.S. soldiers since the American led invasion in 2003.

Fighters for Al-Qaida in Iraqi and allied terror groups, who also have crossed from Syria, have killed hundreds of Americans as well as tens of thousands of Iraqis in bombings, drive-by shootings and mortar attacks.

Syria broke diplomatic ties with Iraq in 1982, accusing Iraq of inciting riots by the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Syria. Damascus also sided with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war. Trade ties were restored in 1997.

In addition to Baghdad and Washington's complaints about poor border control, the two countries have blasted Syria for supporting the insurgency by allowing Saddam loyalists to take refuge in Damascus to organize financing and arms shipments. Syria denies the charges.

A U.S. blue ribbon panel on Iraq, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democrat Rep. Lee Hamilton, will soon release recommendations on how to avoid the collapse of an increasingly violent and chaotic Iraq.

The proposals were expected to include openings to Syrian and Iran in a bid to internationalize efforts to clamp the sectarian conflict.

Iran is believed to be financing and arming Shiite militias in Iraq who have engaged insurgents and Sunni civilians in civil-war style conflict in Baghdad and surround cities and towns. Many of the Shiite militia fighters were trained by Iran's elite Revolutionary Guard.

Even as diplomacy gained some traction, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who negotiated an end to the Vietnam War more than 30 years ago, said a conventional victory was no longer an option for Washington.

"If you mean, by 'military victory,' an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," he told the BBC's Sunday AM program.

Kissinger has also said Iran and Syria need to be drawn into efforts to curb violence.

By luring workers to his bomb in Hillah, the suicide attacker used a technique has been employed repeatedly in poor Shiite regions throughout Iraq where unemployment is especially high and men often must hire themselves out daily to feed their families. Sunday is a working day in mostly Muslim Iraq.

"The sudden explosion shook the whole area and shattered the windows of a store where I was standing," said Muhsin Hadi Alwan, 33, one of the wounded jobseekers. "The ground was covered with the remains of people and blood, and survivors ran in all directions."

"How will I feed the six members of my family when I return home without work and without money?" Alwan asked.

The U.S. military announced that five-days of joint operations with Iraqi forces in the region between Tikrit and Kirkuk killed nearly 50 Sunni insurgent fighters and led to the capture of 20. The announcement detailed the discovery of huge arms caches, usable portions of which were turned over to the Iraqi army to equip its soldiers. The military did not say when the operation began or ended nor precisely where it took place.

DOJ_NMG_0095990

U.S. and Iraqi forces also killed 12 insurgents, detained 11 and freed eight Iraqi hostages during raids in Baqouba and two villages near Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad, police said. Iraqi forces also killed a local al-Qaida in Iraq leader and his son in a village 60 miles north of Baghdad.

Syrian Foreign Minister Visits Baghdad (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — As kidnappings and suicide bombings continued in Iraq on Sunday, Syria's foreign minister made a groundbreaking visit to Baghdad.

Walid Moallem, the highest-level Syrian official to visit since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, denounced terrorism and called for a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

His arrival was a significant breakthrough from a country that broke diplomatic ties with Iraq in 1982. It comes as a U.S. blue-ribbon panel studying Iraq, led by former secretary of State James Baker, is working on recommendations on avoiding the collapse of the country. Among the expected proposals is engaging in talks with Syria and Iran in a bid to internationalize efforts to clamp down on the sectarian conflict.

The U.S. and Iraqi governments have accused Syria of maintaining poor control of the border it shares with Iraq. The border has become a major crossing point for Sunni Arab fighters joining the insurgency that has been responsible for the most deaths of U.S. servicemembers since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Elsewhere in Iraq, gunmen kidnapped Iraq's deputy health minister from his home in northern Baghdad, the Iraqi army and police reported Sunday.

They said the gunmen wore police uniforms and arrived in seven vehicles to abduct Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite. He is one of the most senior government officials to be kidnapped.

Al-Saffar was snatched nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from the predominantly-Sunni Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. In the deep south of Iraq, meanwhile, security forces searching for five private security contractors kidnapped near the Kuwait border detained about 200 suspected insurgents, police said Sunday. Police Maj. Gen. Ali al-Moussawi said none of the hostages — four Americans and an Austrian — was found.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Michael McClellan said Sunday that U.S. officials believe the five hostages are still being held by their captors.

In other developments:

•The Iraqi court that sentenced former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein to hang this month was guilty of shortcomings so serious that a fair trial for the former president was all but impossible, according to a 97-page report on the trial released today by New York-based Human Rights Watch. The report is based on interviews with judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Saddam and seven others went on trial a year ago for crimes against humanity over the killing of 148 people from Dujail following an attempt there on Saddam's life in 1982. The report said the judiciary lacked the expertise for such a complex trial and urged the government to let experienced international jurists take part in future trials.

•A suicide bomber in a minivan lured day laborers to his vehicle with promises of jobs Sunday morning, then blew it up, killing 22 people and wounding 44 in the mainly Shiite southern city of Hillah, Babil province police Capt. Muthanna Khalid said. He said three suspected terrorists — two Egyptians and an Iraqi — were arrested on suspicion of planning the suicide attack with the bomber, a Syrian.

•The U.S. military announced that five days of joint operations with Iraqi forces between Tikrit and Kirkuk killed nearly 50 Sunni insurgents and led to the capture of 20. The announcement detailed the discovery of large arms caches, usable portions of which were turned over to the Iraqi army.

McCain: Many More Troops Needed In Iraq (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095991

WASHINGTON — Sen. John McCain, a prominent Republican presidential contender for the 2008 elections, said Sunday that the United States must send an overwhelming number of troops to stabilize Iraq or face the possibility of more terrorist attacks — in the region and on American soil.

"I believe the consequences of failure are catastrophic. It will spread to the region. We left Vietnam. It was over. We just had to heal the wounds of war," said McCain, R-Ariz., who spent 5½ years in Vietnam as a prisoner of war. "We leave this place, (with) chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict."

McCain's comments on ABC's This Week came as former secretary of State Henry Kissinger told the British Broadcasting Corp. that military victory in Iraq is not possible, "if you mean by 'military victory' an Iraqi government that … gets the civil war and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support."

Kissinger, an architect of the Vietnam War who has advised President Bush on Iraq, also warned against a rapid withdrawal of coalition troops, saying it could cause a long-lasting conflict.

Meanwhile, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., speaking on CBS' Face the Nation, said he will introduce a bill next year that would require men and woman to serve in the armed forces or in alternative service.

Rangel said as early as 2003 that a draft for those turning 18 is needed to meet military requirements and to eliminate what he said is a disproportionate role minorities and lower-income families shoulder in the military.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq… (if) members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," said Rangel, in line to be the next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The U.S. military has strained to maintain a level of about 141,000 troops since the March 2003 invasion.

Democrats poised to take control of the House and Senate after this month's midterm congressional elections are pressing for a substantial reduction of U.S. troops in Iraq and a timetable for their withdrawal.

"We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction" of troops, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, told CNN's Late Edition. "If you don't do that, they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way."

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, has said it would be unrealistic to raise troop levels as proposed by McCain and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

McCain said it was time to use decisive force with a clear exit strategy: "You've got to ask yourself some questions. One, 'Are we winning?' And I think the answer is no. The other is, 'What are the consequences of defeat? Can we still win?' Yes, I believe we can. It'll be tough, but we need to do it."

McCain Says More Troops Needed In Iraq (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin

AP, November 20, 2006

Without additional troops to ensure victory in Iraq, the U.S. could find itself more vulnerable to terrorist attacks at home, Sen. John McCain said Sunday.

Taking the opposite tack, newly empowered Democrats pressed their case for a phased withdrawal of American forces. They hoped a blue-ribbon advisory panel would propose a way ahead for Iraq, while making clear the U.S. military mission shouldn't last indefinitely.

McCain, a front-running GOP presidential hopeful for 2008, said the U.S. must send an overwhelming number of troops to stabilize Iraq or face more attacks — in the region and possibly on American soil.

"I believe the consequences of failure are catastrophic," said McCain, R-Ariz. "It will spread to the region. You will see Iran more emboldened. Eventually, you could see Iran pose a greater threat to the state of Israel."

With about 141,000 U.S. troops in Iraq more than 3 1/2 years into the war, the American military has strained to provide enough forces while allowing for adequate rest and retraining between deployments.

DOJ_NMG_0095992

But McCain, who spent 5 1/2 years as a prisoner of war after his Navy plane was shot down in 1967, recalled the Vietnam War's lessons. "We left Vietnam. It was over. We just had to heal the wounds of war," he said. "We leave this place, chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict, in my view, a lot more."

McCain said he based his judgment partly on the writings of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the al-Qaida leader in Iraq who was killed in a U.S. air raid, and of Osama bin Laden.

"The consequences of failure are so severe that I will exhaust every possibility to try to fix this situation. Because it's not the end when American troops leave. The battleground shifts, and we'll be fighting them again," McCain said. "You read Zarqawi, and you read bin Laden. ... It's not just Iraq that they're interested in. It's the region, and then us."

Sen. Joseph Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he hoped a special commission considering options for the way ahead in Iraq would assert that U.S. troop commitments are not open-ended; propose a clear political road map for Iraq; and recommend engaging Iraq's neighbors in a political solution.

"We are past the point of adding more troops. We are past the point of vague policy prescriptions. It is not an answer just to stay. Nor is it an answer — though it may become a necessity — just to go with no concern for what follows," Biden, D-Del., wrote in Sunday's Washington Post.

"The fundamental question we must answer is whether, as we begin to leave Iraq, there are still concrete steps we can take to avoid leaving chaos behind," said Biden, who plans to run for president in 2008.

Democrats poised to take control of the House and Senate are pressing for a substantial reduction of U.S. troops in Iraq and a timetable for their withdrawal, as a way of forcing the Iraq government to rely more on itself.

"We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction of our troops," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Because if you don't do that, they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way. And it is that assumption on their part that takes them off the hook."

Incoming House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., agreed. "As a practical matter, there are no troops to increase with," he said. "Our objective was to remove Saddam Hussein and create an environment in which a democracy could be established. That has been done."

But Hoyer said Democrats would continue funding the existing troop levels, for the time being.

"That's not an option, of not supporting our troops in the field and making sure they're as safe as we can make them," he said. "Very frankly, their lack of numbers exposes them on a daily basis to danger and death, unfortunately. But clearly, we're going to have discussions going forward as to how we change this policy and change it in the short term, not the long term."

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, told the Senate Armed Services Committee last week he believes troop levels should remain steady for now. He said it was possible to add 20,000 troops for a short time, but it would be unrealistic to raise troop levels as proposed by McCain and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

Abizaid said the American military in Iraq is stretched too thin already, and sending over a bigger, more permanent presence would undercut efforts to force Iraqis to take on more responsibility.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said he thinks U.S. generals have been put "in a a very, very difficult position."

"What I don't have confidence in is the policy. And General Abizaid is giving us a diagnosis that is based on the current policy. But that policy has to change, and it can change," said Kerry, who is considering a White House bid in 2008.

Kerry spoke on "Fox News Sunday," while McCain and Hoyer appeared on ABC's "This Week." Levin spoke on CNN's "Late Edition." Graham appeared on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

McCain Says Troops Dying For `Failed' Iraq Policy (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson

Bloomberg, November 20, 2006

Nov. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Senator John McCain said U.S. troops are ``fighting and dying for a failed policy'' in Iraq and must get enough reinforcements to ensure a military victory.

DOJ_NMG_0095993

McCain said that while deploying more troops to Iraq would put a ``terrible strain" on the U.S. military, ``there's only one thing worse, and that is defeat."

``And we've been losing," the Arizona Republican said on ABC's ``This Week" program.

McCain, a 70-year-old Vietnam veteran who is exploring a bid for the presidency in 2008, said a U.S. failure in Iraq would have ``catastrophic" consequences, emboldening terrorists and spreading instability in the region. McCain didn't say how many more troops should be sent in. Previously he has called for an additional 20,000 personnel.

The U.S. has about 141,000 military personnel in Iraq and General John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, told McCain at a Senate Armed Service Committee hearing last week that there is no immediate need for more troops even as violence -- and U.S. military deaths -- has been rising.

U.S. policy in Iraq may be at a crossroads with Democrats winning a majority in Congress Nov. 7 in part because of public dissatisfaction with President George W. Bush's management of the war and a bipartisan commission getting ready recommendations on a future course in the conflict. Bush has rejected setting any deadlines for the U.S. presence in Iraq.

Democratic Majority

While McCain has been urging deployment of more troops to stabilize Iraq, leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress are calling for the U.S. to begin withdrawing at least some personnel over the next four to six months to pressure the Iraqi government into taking more responsibility for their country's security.

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will become chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said McCain's approach would ``get us in deeper into Iraq."

``That sends exactly the wrong message to the Iraqis, that somehow or other, there's a military solution," Levin said on CNN's ``Late Edition," adding later: ``So no, not more troops; fewer troops."

Failed Government

Representative Steny Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who was elected last week to the No. 2 House post in the next session of the Congress, said the situation in Iraq may be past the of point of resolution through more force.

The government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki has failed to do what's needed to end sectarian violence, Hoyer said in a separate interview on ABC. ``If you have a failed government, our continuing to prop up that failed government will not ultimately succeed," he said.

In addition, ``there are no troops to increase with," he said.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who negotiated the end to the Vietnam War, told the British Broadcasting Company that a decisive military victory in Iraq is unlikely and that the U.S. course must be redefined.

``If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," Kissinger said in an interview broadcast today.

Alternatives

``But I don't believe that the alternative is between military victory as it had been defined previously, or total withdrawal," said Kissinger, who served in the administrations of Republican Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford.

McCain said he disagreed.

``You can't have a political solution unless you have a military solution," McCain said. ``There's never been one in history."

Republican Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina also disagreed with Kissinger, and backed McCain on the need for more troops.

``We've been playing whack-a-mole, as John McCain says it, where you clear one area but you can't hold it because you go to the next area to suppress a surge in violence," Graham said on CBS's ``Face the Nation" program. ``We need a larger troop presence in Iraq to bring about security."

Increased Violence

There were about 180 attacks a day against Iraqi government and U.S. targets during October, Lieutenant General Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Nov. 15. There were 99 U.S. military personnel killed in combat during the month, the highest monthly death toll in two years. More than 3,200 Americans have died in Iraq since the U.S. invasion, with 2,481 killed in action, according to Defense Department figures.

Bombings and sectarian battles have continued, with the latest coming this morning. At least 53 people were killed in bombings and shooting across Iraq and the country's deputy health minister was kidnapped from his home in Baghdad, Agence France- Presse reported.

Maliki on Nov. 17 asked the United Nations Security Council to extend the mandate of U.S.-led military forces in Iraq through 2007, citing a need for protection from terrorists.

Graham, who has been to Iraq four times, was asked on CBS if he believes the situation in Iraq has gotten worse. ``Absolutely," he replied.

``The first time I went there, I walked around town and bought rugs. The fourth time I went, about a year ago, I had to be in a tank," Graham said.

Rep. Rangel Will Seek To Reinstate Draft (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin

AP, November 20, 2006

Americans would have to sign up for a new military draft after turning 18 under a bill the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee says he will introduce next year.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said Sunday he sees his idea as a way to deter politicians from launching wars.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," Rangel said.

Rangel, a veteran of the Korean War who has unsuccessfully sponsored legislation on conscription in the past, has said the all-volunteer military disproportionately puts the burden of war on minorities and lower-income families.

Rangel said he will propose a measure early next year. While he said he is serious about the proposal, there is little evident support among the public or lawmakers for it.

In 2003, Rangel proposed a measure covering people age 18 to 26. It was defeated 402-2 the following year. This year, he offered a plan to mandate military service for men and women between age 18 and 42; it went nowhere in the Republican-led Congress.

Democrats will control the House and Senate come January because of their victories in the Nov. 7 election.

At a time when some lawmakers are urging the military to send more troops to Iraq, "I don't see how anyone can support the war and not support the draft," said Rangel, who also proposed a draft in January 2003, before the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "I think to do so is hypocritical."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican who is a colonel in the U.S. Air Force Standby Reserve, said he agreed that the U.S. does not have enough people in the military.

"I think we can do this with an all-voluntary service, all-voluntary Army, Air Force, Marine Corps and Navy. And if we can't, then we'll look for some other option," said Graham, who is assigned as a reserve judge to the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals.

Rangel, the next chairman of the House tax-writing committee, said he worried the military was being strained by its overseas commitments.

"If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft," Rangel said.

He said having a draft would not necessarily mean everyone called to duty would have to serve. Instead, "young people (would) commit themselves to a couple of years in service to this great republic, whether it's our seaports, our airports, in schools, in hospitals," with a promise of educational benefits at the end of service.

Graham said he believes the all-voluntary military "represents the country pretty well in terms of ethnic makeup, economic background."

DOJ_NMG_0095995

Repeated polls have shown that about seven in 10 Americans oppose reinstatement of the draft and officials say they do not expect to restart conscription.

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told Congress in June 2005 that "there isn't a chance in the world that the draft will be brought back."

Yet the prospect of the long global fight against terrorism and the continuing U.S. commitment to stabilizing Iraq have kept the idea in the public's mind.

The military drafted conscripts during the Civil War, both world wars and between 1948 and 1973. An agency independent of the Defense Department, the Selective Service System, keeps an updated registry of men age 18-25 — now about 16 million — from which to supply untrained draftees that would supplement the professional all-volunteer armed forces.

Rangel and Graham appeared on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

Amid Uproar Over War, Rangel Renews Call For Draft (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The incoming Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee said yesterday that he will push to renew the military draft, as lawmakers in both parties sharpened their criticisms of the situation in Iraq and struggled for consensus and solutions.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a likely presidential contender, leveled one of his harshest assessments yet, saying U.S. troops are "fighting and dying for a failed policy." He renewed his call for more U.S. troops in Iraq and said it is immoral to keep them fighting at the current deployment levels.

And Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee, repeated yesterday his view that troop withdrawals must begin within four to six months.

The varying proposals underscored the extent to which key policymakers remain at odds two weeks after voters registered deep discontent over the war and restored Democrats to power in Congress.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) has long advocated returning to the draft, but his efforts drew little attention during the 12 years that House Democrats were in the minority. Starting in January, however, he will chair the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. Yesterday he said "you bet your life" he will renew his drive for a draft.

"I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session," Rangel said on CBS's "Face the Nation." He portrayed the draft, suspended since 1973, as a means of spreading military obligations more equitably and prompting political leaders to think twice before starting wars.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," said Rangel, a Korean War veteran. "If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft."

Rangel has drawn modest support for his draft proposal in recent years and it has been unclear whether its prospects might improve in the 110th Congress.

Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who will be the Senate majority leader, agrees that the U.S. military is stretched too thin and that "the burden of meeting the nation's security has not been shared equally by all segments of our society," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. But Reid "believes that these problems are best addressed by making needed adjustments in the all-volunteer force," Manley said.

On ABC's "This Week," McCain reiterated his argument that the United States faces a catastrophic setback in Iraq unless it deploys more troops to reduce sectarian violence and stabilize the country. "We have to have additional forces, or we will be playing whack-a-mole," he said.

McCain said in a speech Thursday that it is immoral to keep troops fighting merely to "delay our defeat for a few months or a year." Asked yesterday by ABC's George Stephanopoulos, "Isn't it currently immoral to keep Marines and soldiers, other service people, in Iraq?" McCain replied: "Yes, it is." But the war still can be won with renewed effort and resources, he said.

Lawmakers are anxiously awaiting recommendations next month from the Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). If the group does not advocate sending more troops to Iraq, McCain said, he would support a troop withdrawal "if, at the point, I think that we have exhausted every option and that we are doomed to failure. I don't know if it'll be at that point [in December] or not."

Although not asked directly about the draft, McCain said, "We've got the best military we've ever had in our all-volunteer force."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) agreed with McCain, saying on "Face the Nation" that more troops should be sent to Iraq and that a military draft is not necessary.

Levin, on CNN's "Late Edition," said the United States must start withdrawing from Iraq to pressure Iraqis to assume control of their nation.

"We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction of our troops," Levin said. Otherwise, he said, "they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way. . . which takes them off the hook."

On the presidential front, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) said on "Fox News Sunday" that he is considering another presidential bid in 2008 despite widespread criticism of what he called "a botched joke" that some received as denigrating troops in Iraq.

And Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) -- who won a contest for House majority leader over a candidate backed by incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) -- said he is confident there will not be retaliation against his supporters.

"We're going to talk about that," Hoyer said on "This Week." "But I'm sure that's not going to happen."

In a secret-ballot election by House Democrats on Thursday, Hoyer defeated Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), 149 to 86.

Bill On Draft To Resurface As Calls For Troops Rise (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

The incoming Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means panel says he will introduce a bill to reinstitute a military draft in order to provide the U.S. with more troops, while Sen. John McCain continued his call for increase of troop levels in Iraq.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York first called for a draft in January 2003, when Democrats were the minority party in both houses of Congress. Now that his party controls Capitol Hill, he was asked yesterday on CBS' "Face the Nation" if he was still serious about the proposal.

"You bet your life. Underscore 'serious,' " he said.

"I don't see how anyone can support the [Iraq] war and not support the draft," said Mr. Rangel, alluding to Mr. McCain's call for increased troop levels in Iraq and to the need to combat threats elsewhere in the world. "If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft."

Mr. Rangel said his bill, which he will introduce again early next year, would allow Americans turning 18 to choose between several forms of national service, including airport security, or jobs in schools and hospitals.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said in his own "Face the Nation" appearance that military conscription was unnecessary.

"I think we can do this with an all-voluntary service, all-voluntary Army, Air Force, Marine Corps and Navy. And if we can't, then we'll look for some other option," said Mr. Graham, who also serves as a reserve judge to the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0095997

Repeated polls have shown that about seven in 10 Americans oppose reinstatement of military conscription, and the Pentagon has long opposed any draft. Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told Congress in June 2005 that "there isn't a chance in the world that the draft will be brought back."

Meanwhile, Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, continued to call for increased U.S. military presence in Iraq to stabilize the country and prevent what he described as a dire threat to U.S. national security.

"You've got to ask yourself some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no," he said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." "The other is, what are the consequences of defeat?"

"I believe the consequences of failure are catastrophic. It will spread to the region. You will see Iran more emboldened," said Mr. McCain, who last week formed an exploratory committee in advance of a likely 2008 presidential campaign. "We leave this place, chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict. In my view, a lot more."

Mr. McCain said he based his judgment partly on the writings of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the al Qaeda in Iraq leader who was killed in a U.S. air raid in June, and of Osama bin Laden.

"The consequences of failure are so severe that I will exhaust every possibility to try to fix this situation. Because it's not the end when American troops leave. The battleground shifts, and we'll be fighting them again," Mr. McCain said. "You read Zarqawi, and you read bin Laden. ... It's not just Iraq that they're interested in. It's the region, and then us."

But Mr. Rangel, a Korean War veteran, said he hoped his military-draft bill would discourage lawmakers from voting to authorize future military conflicts.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," he said.

Mr. McCain, a Vietnam War veteran, also has two sons in military service. His son Jack is currently in the U.S. Naval Academy, while another son, James, enlisted in the Marine Corps this year.

Incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said there are insufficient troops available for Mr. McCain's suggestion.

"As a practical matter, there are no troops to increase with," the Maryland Democrat said during his appearance on "This Week." "Our objective was to remove Saddam Hussein and create an environment in which a democracy could be established. That has been done."

Mr. Hoyer added that Democrats will continue to fund the war despite their doubts.

"That's not an option, of not supporting our troops in the field and making sure they're as safe as we can make them," he said.

Who Lost Iraq? (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

On April 9, 2003, the world watched as U.S. marines and Iraqi citizens toppled an imposing statue of Saddam Hussein in Baghdad's Firdos Square. Three and a half years later, the promise of democracy in Iraq seems a cruel joke, and the administration in Washington that launched the invasion seems utterly bereft of clues as to how to sort out the mess. "The fall of the statue," says a former White House National Security Council staff member, "is where the story diverges from the White House's expectations."

President Bush's acceptance of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation was intended to signal a change in course on Iraq. But many national security experts say that Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security adviser at the time of the invasion, and the National Security Council share much of the blame for the problems in Iraq. "She did not perceive, and the National Security Council did not assess, what is in the United States' interests and what is in the interests of our enemies," says retired Lt. Gen. William Odom, an outspoken critic of the war who served as military assistant to Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser. "Once you make that basic mistake, there isn't any way to make the war come out good. It's all over."

With her ardent support for the invasion, Odom and others say, Rice was unable to play the traditional role of national security adviser-impartial broker in the rough-and-tumble of interagency government. That was further complicated by the fact that Rumsfeld all but ignored the input of other agencies, then never took responsibility for postwar reconstruction, leaving Rice to try to manage the Iraq rebuilding effort from the White House. "The people who took responsibility for the rebuilding of Iraq-that is, the office of the secretary of defense-expressed no interest in solving problems as problems appeared," says Franklin Miller, one of Rice's principal aides handling the reconstruction effort. "They never brought any issues to the table, and they never took any taskings away."

The problems were compounded, former NSC staff members say, by conflicting information provided by virtually everyone involved in the Iraq effort, including military generals who often gave NSC staffers information at odds with what soldiers on the ground and lower-level military and civilian officials were reporting. "The internal whitewashing was as great as the external whitewashing," says a former senior NSC staff member. "We wasted two years, spinning the situation, using smoke and mirrors to say, 'Hey, it's not as it's being reported. Everything is OK.'"

"Knocking heads." This is the story of how Rice, a veteran White House insider with close personal ties to the president, failed to pull together the administration's fractious postwar efforts and why her successor, Stephen Hadley, has yet to navigate or even identify a way out of Iraq. "Hadley's NSC," says a former senior NSC staff member, "has become a rubber stamp for the Defense Department." Bush has tasked Hadley, Rice, now secretary of state, and other advisers to come up with a solution for Iraq, even as the congressionally directed Iraq Study Group, cochaired by James Baker, the former secretary of state, is racing to finish up its own report. Completing the trifecta is a report to be issued next month by the Pentagon on U.S. military strategy in Iraq.

Escaping Washington, But Not Escaping Iraq (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, November 27, 2006

In one of the last strongholds of communism, George W. Bush worshiped in a wooden pew at a hybrid Catholic-evangelical service--"a moment," he later called it, "to converse with God in a church here in Hanoi." Earlier, his presidential motorcade had sped beneath a hammer and sickle formed from red and yellow lightbulbs, a reminder that the world does not change as fast as he would like. The reluctant traveler dropped into the capital of his least favorite analogy as part of a sweep through Southeast Asia that allowed him to look commanding, even regal, at a time when postelection Washington is buzzing about the onrushing twilight of his presidency. "Happy to find a receptive audience," he slyly told fawning musicians in Singapore, an earlier stop, after he answered their entreaties to tap out a tune on their Asian xylophone, with surprisingly melodic results.

Bush had come to Hanoi, once the capital of godless North Vietnam, for an annual international forum, the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting. Attendance at such summits is perhaps the part of the presidency he will miss least, press conferences excepted. And this time, he had more to fret about than staged intimacy and flabby bloviating. What about a nation that overwhelmingly backs its President when he sends troops into battle, then sours on the idea when swaths of society decide that intervention was a mistake? That was the U.S. in 1968, and it's the country Bush could wind up leading if the public decides that comparing Iraq with Vietnam is no longer so rash and ignorant a thing to do as Bush's aides have been insisting it is for the past three years.

Fifteen years ago, in the flush of his Gulf War triumph, President George H.W. Bush crowed to state legislators, "By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all." But now, as Washington's wise men look for a way out of a situation in Iraq, the symptoms of that malady seem to be reappearing. Asked in the Rose Garden in June if he saw a parallel between Iraq and Vietnam, the President replied curtly, "No." But he is now embracing the inevitable, and he answered yes last week when asked roughly the same question at the Sheraton Hanoi. "One lesson is, is that we tend to want there to be instant success in the world," he said. "And the task in Iraq is going to take a while."

So is the modernization of Hanoi, where the streets are strung with drooping skeins of hundreds of electrical wires, some of them powering a single home that has run a line into the tangle. The streets are also clogged with schools of motor scooters, with most of the riders free of helmets but laden with comically massive loads--a quartet of big-screen TV sets, exquisitely balanced piles of lumber, pyramids of water bottles.

Although Bush plans to visit the thriving stock exchange in Ho Chi Minh City--formerly Saigon--this country is still officially the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. As protocol demanded, he met with the General Secretary of the Communist Party and was photographed with a massive bust of the revolutionary leader Ho Chi Minh. The President said one of the most poignant moments of the trip was passing the lake that Senator John McCain, as a Navy pilot, was pulled from after his plane was hit while on a bombing run. "He suffered a lot as a result of his imprisonment," Bush said, "and yet we passed the place where he was, literally, saved, in one way, by the people pulling him out." In fact, McCain was met onshore by a large, hostile crowd, which hit, kicked and even bayoneted him. Aides admitted later that the President's telling, although accurate, was incomplete.

Behind the scenes, Bush mused to aides that he loved what he was seeing and regretted he would never be able to come to a place like this as a normal tourist. Instead he pursued a fairly restricted itinerary, visiting the U.S. military's Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command and skipping the Turtle Temple and the stir-fried camel. Asked at a briefing why the President wasn't out more among the people, National Security Adviser Steve Hadley said the motorcade routes through the heart of the city meant that the President was "in the midst of the Vietnamese people all the time" and added that Bush "has been doing a lot of waving." His hosts seemed to want to reciprocate. When CNN International began airing a taped package using footage from the Vietnam War to suggest similarities between Iraq and Vietnam, the local feed was obscured by an overlay of music and a Vietnamese flag. For at least a few days, a graying President could enjoy Vietnam instead of wrestling its ghost.

The Fogginess Of War (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

When publicly assessing the Iraq war, U.S. military leaders are often at pains to point out that the enemy has a vote, by its actions, and that vote tends to change conditions on the ground. But last week, it was Republicans licking their wounds from an election trouncing and Democrats flush with a new mandate who repeatedly reminded the top military commander for the Middle East that the American people have voted and, by their actions, expect to see a new course in Iraq.

What course exactly? Washington is buzzing with possibilities-a number of which were swatted down by Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command, in testimony last week before the House and Senate Armed Services committees. The most popular option, a sizable troop withdrawal in the next six months, would inflame sectarian violence, he warned. Partitioning the country along ethnic-religious lines, he said, is "not viable" and would create a Sunni state that would be little more than an al Qaeda safe haven. And though Abizaid did not rule out temporary troop surges to reinforce efforts to tamp down the turmoil-even as 2,200 Marines were being dispatched to the volatile Anbar province from ships stationed offshore in the Persian Gulf-he added that more troops could ultimately undermine the credibility of the fledgling Iraqi government. Just how weak the government is was highlighted by last Tuesday's brazen mass kidnapping of dozens of employees from the Sunni-run Ministry of Higher Education by gunmen wearing old and new national police uniforms.

"Whole different mission." Such is the stark reality facing the 18,500 soldiers from the 1st Cavalry Division as they depart Fort Hood, Texas, to take over security responsibilities in Baghdad. Much has changed on the ground since many of his soldiers were there before, says Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, who commanded the 4th Infantry Division during a previous tour in Iraq from 2003-04-and who next month becomes the No. 2 commander of American forces there. "It's a whole different mission," he tells U.S. News from his Fort Hood headquarters chockablock with packing boxes. "As a division commander then, I was much more focused on toppling a regime. Now we know that it's about getting confidence in the Iraq government so that it becomes credible. It's much more complex and we've got to understand that."

Key to that credibility is security in Baghdad-the "No. 1" priority for U.S. troops, says Odierno. On that front, "there is progress," he says, "but it's baby steps." To get the city under control, he adds, the Iraqi government must stand up its security forces, "and we've got to help them." Abizaid's testimony emphasized the need for more U.S. military training teams to be embedded within the Iraqi security forces as a vital part of any American exit strategy. U.S. military officials estimate that they may boost numbers from a dozen per Iraqi battalion (which can range from 200 to 700 soldiers), to some 60 U.S. military trainers. In addition, says Odierno, "You might have a division where you have a very large [U.S. transition team] that travels around, spending a couple of days with different battalions." He adds, "We have to continue to analyze what are the real capabilities in these teams."

U.S. And Iran Haggle Over Iraq (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, John Barry

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Over a dinner of savory kebab, they talked of the trips they've taken, and their favorite places. James Baker, the longtime confidant of the Bush family, spoke nostalgically of his visits to Iran before 1979, the year the Islamic revolution and hostage crisis put an end to diplomatic ties. Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, politely aired past grievances, complaining that U.S. administrations dating back to George H.W. Bush—when Baker was secretary of State—had failed to take Iran seriously. Zarif said the Americans never showed appreciation for Tehran's help in freeing U.S. hostages in Lebanon in the early '90s—and, more recently, for countering the Taliban in Afghanistan, according to two participants at the meeting who agreed to describe it on the condition of anonymity. Zarif's not-so-subtle message: Iran isn't giving anything for free anymore. Tehran is interested only in a broader deal that links the U.S. desire for help in Iraq with Iran's desire to be allowed to enrich uranium, among other issues.

Baker, known for his deft bargaining skills, refused to bite on that point even as he supped heartily. (The dinner took place Oct. 5 at the Iran envoy's Manhattan townhouse.) He said that the only issue he had come to talk about was Iraq. Baker argued that a failed state next door would hurt Iran more than America—which, after all, can always just leave the region. (Through a spokesperson, Baker declined to comment on this account.) Despite the friendly ambience, Zarif suspected in the end that Baker was "trying to buy Iran's cooperation on Iraq at a very cheap price."

Iran is now raising that price—dramatically. Tehran knows that George W. Bush faces new political pressure from an incoming Democratic Congress to withdraw from Iraq sooner rather than later. Tehran also hears, through the media, that the forthcoming report by the Iraq Study Group (co-chaired by Baker and Lee Hamilton) is expected to recommend fuller engagement with Iran and Syria. Even Tony Blair, Bush's most loyal ally, is urging the president to broaden the dialogue with these two countries and make the Israeli-Palestinian dispute part of it. A rough draft of the Baker report delivers a similar recommendation, according to a description of it given to NEWSWEEK by a group member.

Both the Iranians and Syrians are clearly feeling cocky. Negotiations to halt Iran's nuclear program remain stalemated, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad declared last week that "many countries have agreed to live with an Iran that has mastered enrichment." One key nation that Tehran thinks it can count on is Russia, which wants to protect its huge investments in Iran and is resisting tough sanctions in the U.N. Security Council. "The Iranians," says a European diplomat involved in the talks, "are behaving as if they are already a nuclear power." Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, meanwhile, is enjoying the resumption of what Syrian Embassy spokesman Ahmed Salkini calls "unofficial contacts" from Washington.

Some U.S. officials are now hinting that Washington may have to blink before Tehran does. All last week, following up on a two-day White House meeting over Veterans Day weekend, national-security adviser Stephen Hadley and key officials thrashed over new approaches to Iraq in anticipation of the Baker-Hamilton report and fresh Democratic initiatives. U.S. officials say the president is still intent on forcing Iran to back down on its nuclear program, using financial sanctions or even stronger means. But according to a senior U.S. official who would discuss such sensitive topics only if he was not identified, some inside the administration believe it may be too late to stop Tehran. Should diplomacy fail, Washington might have to accept Iran as a "virtual nuclear-weapons state" if Bush gets help on Iraq and other issues, this official says. That means Tehran might be permitted to develop the technology for making nuclear fuel—and potentially a bomb—as long as it holds to its pledge to limit its program to peaceful purposes. But this is still seen as a remote fallback position.

There are public signals that Washington is edging closer to Tehran's terms for talks. In congressional testimony last week, CIA Director Michael Hayden seemed to contradict the official Bush-administration line of refusing to link Iraq and the nuclear issue. "Talking to Iran about Iraq cannot be isolated, I believe, from the broader nuclear question," Hayden said. (CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield later contended that Hayden's statement "was totally consistent" with current administration policy; he said Hayden was referring to Iran's unwillingness to discuss Iraq without talking about the nuclear issue.) State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegas also said forthrightly last week that "the timing and conditions" for talks with Iran are "under review."

But even if Washington does cut a deal, can Tehran stop the sectarian killing? On Capitol Hill, Hayden said an "Iranian hand is stoking violence" in Iraq. But the private view of U.S. intelligence agencies is that Tehran is "torn" over how much it wants to stir up trouble, says an official familiar with classified intelligence briefings on Iran who would discuss the issue only anonymously. The Iranians, he says, "don't want complete chaos." If both sides share that fear, then perhaps James Baker can get help at the right price after all.

How Iraq Will Impact 2008 Race (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

For a moment, at least, John McCain and Hillary Clinton shared a common cause. It was one week after the midterm elections. They were back in the Senate, back in their seats on the Armed Services Committee, back to venting about Iraq. The target was Gen. John Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command in the Mideast. McCain chafed at Abizaid's assertion that there were encouraging signs in the troubled conflict. Is "it encouraging," McCain wondered, "that people dressed in police uniforms are able to come in and kidnap 150 people and leave with them ... through checkpoints?" Clinton was also quick to pounce. "The situation in Iraq is not improving," she told Abizaid. "Hope is not a strategy."

Hope is no strategy: a lesson Clinton and other potential presidential candidates are quickly coming to learn. As the Bush presidency approaches its seventh year and the war continues, Iraq is no longer just George W. Bush's problem. Washington waits for a miracle pill from James Baker and Lee Hamilton's Iraq Study Group. But leaders in both parties know that a truly happy solution to the conflict is nowhere in sight—and may never be.

That could mean trouble for the 2008 front runners, Clinton and McCain. The Arizona senator stands apart from the political pack in calling for an increased U.S. presence in Iraq—arguing that the military should invest as many as 100,000 more troops on the ground to adequately secure the country. Clinton, meanwhile, has angered many in her party's antiwar wing by refusing to repudiate her initial vote to go to war—but has yet to fully articulate how exactly she would clean up the Iraq mess. Both senators were present at the conflict's creation and, if history is a guide, voters may well yearn for a fresh set of eyes to see it through to its conclusion. But, in the nascent presidential campaign, few would-be candidates have stepped forward with their own strategies for ending the war. Baker and Hamilton may offer contenders a road map to follow, but for now, candidates are still groping for a comfortable position on the way ahead in Iraq. A user's guide to the candidates' positions on the war, and who they talk to on the subject:

JOHN MCCAIN

McCain was an early administration ally on Iraq, arguing that removing Saddam Hussein was vital to the broader war on terror. But even as he advocated for intervention, he was kibitzing with Republican war critics like Bush 41 national-security adviser Brent Scowcroft, who worried that the Iraqi adventure would prove destabilizing. After the invasion, McCain began a relentless drumbeat for more U.S. troops.

McCain is that rare Republican with sympathy for both his party's realist and idealist wings. A child of the military establishment and a former prisoner of war, he is well-acquainted with the human costs of war and chats frequently with "realist" war critics like Scowcroft and Colin Powell. But he also consults with intellectuals like Bill Kristol, the influential neocon thinker, and continues to speak of Iraq's potential for transforming the Middle East. If McCain does make a White House run, his foreign policy would be coordinated by Randy Scheunemann, an analyst at the conservative think tank Project for the New American Century who founded the bipartisan Committee for the Liberation of Iraq, an independent group that advocated for regime change.

HILLARY CLINTON

From her first hours in the Senate, Clinton was careful to work on her national-security credentials, joining the Armed Services Committee and positioning herself as a strong friend of the military. She voted for the Iraq war and never expressed regret over doing so, even as the war became increasingly unpopular with her party's base. But by persistently criticizing the Bush administration's handling of the war, she has so far managed to avoid the wrath of the antiwar activists that dogged Joe Lieberman in 2006.

But now that she's in the majority, and seriously eying a run at the White House, what would she do about Iraq? She has so far advocated the creation of an oil trust—granting a share in oil profits to all Iraqis. She's backed a phased redeployment of troops—though she hasn't said how many troops would be redeployed or where they would go—and championed engagement with Syria and Iran. But she has yet to offer a comprehensive plan of her own. "It's for the president of the United States to present a plan to the American people," said her spokesman, Philippe Reines.

Clinton has developed a close working relationship with Rhode Island Sen. Jack Reed, a West Point graduate and the Senate Democrats' point man on Iraq. She also talks to veterans of her husband's foreign-policy team such as former U.N. ambassador Richard Holbrooke, a shortlist candidate for secretary of State in any Democratic administration. Indeed, some Democrats think the very vastness of Clinton's network has constrained her from articulating a clear plan for ending the conflict. "It's like the Kerry campaign," says a veteran of that presidential effort, who now works on foreign policy in the Senate and requested anonymity discussing the politics of national security. "It's hard to get anything past the bottleneck of has-beens and wanna-bes."

BARACK OBAMA

One of Obama's chief assets as a potential challenger to Clinton: consistency on Iraq. He's said that he and the former First Lady had "differing assessments" of the need to go to war in the first place—and, indeed, as a state senator in the fall of 2002, he spoke out passionately against the war while Clinton was voting for it. He has resisted taking a strong position on an exit strategy for Iraq, saying simply, "I'm not a military man." Obama has called on Senate foreign-policy aide Mark Lippert and human-rights expert Samantha Power in formulating positions on international affairs.

RUDY GIULIANI

Long mistrusted bythe right for his stands on abortion and gay rights, Giuliani has tried to shore up his conservative credentials with a vociferous defense of Bush's Iraq policy. He's said withdrawing troops would be akin to the Union pulling out halfway through the U.S. Civil War—and called on America to "do whatever it takes" to win. His staunch defense of the war has helped win brownie points with the White House. But aides say his commitment to the Iraq cause is genuine. He is influenced, friends say, by a crop of A-list advisers at Stanford's hawkish Hoover Institution—among them former secretary of State George P. Shultz, Reagan national-security adviser Richard Allen and Reagan policy adviser Martin Anderson.

MITT ROMNEY

More than any other top-tier candidate, Romney, the retiring governor of Massachusetts, can legitimately claim he's had nothing to do with the mess in Iraq. But as he travels the country selling himself as the strongest potential challenger to McCain, Romney has had to scramble to make up for his lack of foreign-policy bona fides. In May he traveled to Iraq and borrowed a White House talking point, warning that the U.S. couldn't "cut and run." In September, he conferred with L. Paul Bremer, the former U.S. viceroy in Iraq, about the war. Aides say Romney is still in the early stages of educating himself about the conflict and has no plans to offer concrete strategies soon.

JOHN EDWARDS

Support for the Iraq war caused Edwards trouble in the 2004 Democratic primary. So in the spring of 2005, the former North Carolina senator asked aides to begin rethinking his policy on the war. The result: a Washington Post op-ed saying "I was wrong" and calling for a drawdown in troops and increased engagement with Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East. At the time, some close to Edwards worried that the former vice presidential candidate was taking too firm a stance on a rapidly shifting war. But now, with many Democrats making the case for phased withdrawal, Team Edwards feels the rest of the party is coming around to his view. Edwards has focused on expanding his own foreign-policy credentials, but consults with such Clinton-era thinkers as Holbrooke and Strobe Talbott. Edwards's Iraq repudiation may help him emerge as the antiwar alternative to Clinton's stubborn hawk.

SAM BROWNBACK

A conservative Catholic, the Kansas senator's chief appeal will lie with religious Republicans who like his views on social issues. But Brownback has long been an Iraq hawk, cosponsoring the 1998 Senate bill that made "regime change" U.S. policy in dealing with Saddam Hussein. After Saddam was toppled, Brownback encouraged similar regime change in Iran, declaring, "We'll never have true stability in the region as long as Iran remains in power." Brownback's chief foreign-policy interest, however, is aiding Africa, a cause on which he's worked with other conservative Christians as well as liberals like Madeleine Albright and Columbia economist Jeffrey Sachs.

JOE BIDEN

The Democrats' biggest long shot happens to be the author of the party's most comprehensive Iraq plan. Earlier this year, he and former Council on Foreign Relations president Leslie Gelb produced a plan calling for the division of Iraq into three autonomous states. The incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Biden is plugged into the group of retired generals who voiced their opposition to Rumsfeld's management of the war earlier this year.

Democrats, Beware The Curse Of D Street (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Incoming Democrats: Alert! Do not, repeat, not, buy a home on the 100 block of D Street SE on Capitol Hill. It may be jinxed.

How else to explain how this solidly Republican enclave -- once home to as many as six GOP House members -- is no more? A few weeks ago, a "for sale" sign went up at the townhouse belonging to Porter Goss, a former House member from Florida who moved over to the CIA a couple of years ago. Then Rep. Mark Foley felt obliged to quit before the election and his district fell to the Democrats.

Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (Conn.) lost on Nov. 7. Ditto her next-door neighbor, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (Fla.). Two doors down, Rep. Chris Chocola (Ind.) met a similar fate. And across the street Rep. Jim Ryun (Kan.) lost his race.

Painters were spotted Friday touching up Chocola's place in preparation for an open house yesterday.

Democrats who insist on buying one of these fine homes -- even before local and federal health officials finish investigating whether these homes have "loser building" syndrome -- at least should lowball.

Talk about mean streets.Republicans Need Not Apply

Speaking of Democrats moving into town, job seekers' resumes are flooding Democratic offices, vying for hundreds and hundreds of Hill jobs opening up. On the House side alone, there are perhaps 400 committee jobs flipping to the Dems, plus 150 or so positions on the personal staffs of the new Democratic members.

The picture on the Senate side is murkier, but the committee switches could net the Democrats about 150 jobs, and the six new Democratic members are likely to employ perhaps a couple of hundred folks on their personal staffs. And there'll be other Senate and House jobs to be had.

Meanwhile, as the Washington door revolves, hundreds of GOP resumes are floating down to K Street.Invasion Critic May Head to Baghdad Post

Within the administration, career Foreign Service officer Ryan Crocker, an Arabist who is ambassador to Pakistan, is being talked about to head to beautiful downtown Baghdad if Zalmay Khalilzad goes to any of the jobs he's supposed to be offered.

Crocker, a former ambassador to Syria, Lebanon and Kuwait, was one of the few people at the legendary Coalition Provisional Authority who actually knew anything about Iraq. The State Department sent him over there as an aide to Presidential Medal of Freedom recipient L. Paul Bremer, though Crocker thought the invasion a truly bad idea for all the obvious regional and international reasons.

As noted in our colleague Karen DeYoung's book about Colin Powell, "Soldier," Crocker co-wrote a memo in December 2002 to then-Secretary of State Powell warning of disaster if the United States invaded Iraq. The memo, titled "The Perfect Storm," detailed all the things that were likely to explode if the United States took over Iraq -- sectarian violence, a power vacuum, and so on.

Set Out the Blue China

The Democratic wins will alter the social scene in many ways, from large to small to meaningless. Washington Life Magazine's September issue had a list of the "100 Most Invited" to various events.

DOJ_NMG_0096004

President Bush and Laura Bush topped the list, followed by Vice President Cheney and Lynne Cheney, though neither of them are big on the local scene, the magazine reported. Third on the list were Sen. George Allen and his wife, Susan Allen.

Something tells us that's likely to have changed already.Another Undecided Election Contest

Cycle Of Revenge Fuels A Pattern Of Iraqi Killings (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 19 — As Iraq sinks deeper into war, a new pattern of revenge has become the driver of violence in the capital.

In a cycle that has been tracked by the American military since May and June, after months of apparently random sectarian violence the pattern has become one of attack and counterattack, with Sunni militants staging what commanders call "spectacular" strikes and Shiite militias retaliating with abductions and murders of Sunnis.

Militias come to funerals and offer to carry out revenge attacks. Gunmen execute blindfolded people in full public view. Mortars are lobbed between Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods. Sometimes the killers seem to be seeking specific people who were involved in earlier attacks, but many victims lose their lives simply to even out the sectarian toll.

"The problem is that every time there's a sensational event, that starts the whole sectarian cycle again," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief spokesman for the American command in Iraq. "If we could stop the cyclical nature of this in Baghdad, we could really change the dynamics here."

General Caldwell said that a recent and intensive series of American raids against Al Qaeda cells, as well as against Shiite militias that have struck back at Sunnis, had seriously damaged some of their networks. But American commanders have made similar claims on several occasions in the course of the war only to have the killing resume later at a higher level.

Scores of survivors and witnesses have noted the emerging cycle of revenge in interviews, describing highly personal attacks that involve a bullet in the head far more often than a bomb. In the past eight days, at least 715 Iraqis have been killed or have been found dead, according to The Associated Press. The death toll has reached 1,320 already this month, higher than the 1,216 who died in October, according to The A.P.'s count.

The sectarian violence that exploded after the bombing of a major Shiite shrine in Samarra in February has firmly locked into this new cycle of revenge, in which Sunnis and Shiites in many Baghdad neighborhoods are now openly at war.

Iraqis are hardening against one another as the deaths chip away at any remaining trust between the sects and radicalize even larger portions of their fringes. The killings are sometimes as brutal as they were under Saddam Hussein's rule: bodies are found with drill holes, acid burns and broken bones. The bodies are dumped in sewage areas and trash pits.

The hatred evident on both sides presents new challenges to the American military, which must face this increasingly complex Iraqi landscape in which larger numbers of people are involved in killing.

"We shouldn't talk in a false way, that we are all brothers," said Faaz, a young Shiite graduate student, who follows Abu Dera, a militant leader, and who, like most people here, would not give his full name. "We have to admit there is a wound. It is a vicious, destructive war."

New words for the culture of killing have popped up. Sakaka: death squad member. Tali: lamb, or a Sunni victim. Batta: car used by Shiite militias.

In Naariya, a neighborhood in southeastern Baghdad, the pattern began in a flash of gunfire on a sunny September morning, when eight friends were killed while putting up a poster of a Shiite cleric. In the following days, Sunni men in the area began to disappear. The bodies of at least 20 were found in Shiite areas, three of their families said in interviews.

Some of the men were taken in front of their families, forced into cars with guns pointed at their heads. Others simply disappeared. Families counted 20 to 40 dead, including, in one family, a grandfather, his son and his 14-year-old grandson. Americans tracking the Sunni deaths verified 17, according to residents they questioned.

DOJ_NMG_0096005

An uneasy suspicion fell over the neighborhood. The police station, largely infiltrated by the Shiite militia called the Mahdi Army, did not even have a record of the disappearances. Muhammad Faisal, the brother of one of the slain Shiites, said he did not believe the reports of the Sunni deaths. The funerals for the eight Shiites drew large crowds. The Sunni ones did not.

"Where were their funerals?" he said, sitting in his tiny room in the neighborhood, holding his dead brother's 5-month-old baby. "We didn't see their numbers."

He was arrested by the Americans for questioning in connection with the killings and later released.

The kidnappings seemed calculated to wipe away any remaining trust. Sunnis started to leave the neighborhood — about 50 families, according to a rough count by Sunni residents and a police official. Some time later, the word spread through mosques that it was safe to return.

Hamid Salman al-Dulaimy, 65, was happy to go back after having to sleep on couches. But several hours after he reinstalled himself at home, gunmen arrived in four cars, pointed guns at the heads of two of his sons and asked for identification cards. They took Mr. Dulaimy and his brother. Their bodies were found in a Shiite area several days later.

"You said we could come back here," one of the sons, Zaid, recalled saying to the gunmen.

Zaid Dulaimy was taken several days after he was interviewed. He is still missing.

In some cases, the force behind the cycle of revenge has its roots in Iraq's tribes, the network of communities that form the fabric of society here. With the world around them turning increasingly chaotic and the government largely impotent, Iraqis are retreating to the safety of their tribes — and the militias to which their members belong.

"This fighting, killing Sunnis and Shias, this is deep in the history of these tribes," said Husham al-Madfai, an architect and history buff. "They call it revenge. This is in the history of the country, in the blood of the people."

The killing is an ugly thing, not something Iraqis speak about openly. But its traces are everywhere, even in public places. Arkan lives in Ur, a neighborhood in northeast Baghdad that borders the area where the Shiite militant Abu Dera lives. He has seen at least four killings of Sunnis, and one failed one, an Egyptian man who was left for dead.

In January, the authorities in Ur found 18 bodies; in June, 30; and in August, 90; according to the local police authorities.

The intensity of executions in Ur jumped several days after the shooting deaths of Shiite pilgrims in August. One man in the area where the Sunnis were killed, a construction materials market, said he saw 14 killings in the days that followed.

In Sugel Uleh, a market area in Sadr City where a Sunni bomb gouged out a large crater this summer, Shiite gunmen shot dead at least eight men in its center. The attacks were carried out during funerals for some of the Shiites killed in the bombing, a witness said.

It is a long way between the pain of loss and the cold steel of killing, but militias, which move freely through the country's lawlessness, shorten the path.

Two sedans of Mahdi militiamen arrived at a funeral this spring of a man who was killed along with five of his friends in a Sunni area, on their way back from a fish restaurant. According to an account by a relative, the militiamen called the mourning family out to the street and opened the sedans' trunks. People were inside, the relative said. The men offered to kill them. The family refused.

For those who do not agree to killings, militias offer other things. Arkan began receiving $50 a month from the Mahdi Army after his father, a truck driver, died from wounds suffered in a sectarian attack in September.

Arkan said his family advised him against trying to seek revenge; it is dangerous business and he is the only working member in the family. Still, he has known others who have.

"There are many people like this," he said. "They bring a normal Sunni and say, 'This is revenge for my brother.' Some say it's enough, killing two or three. Some continue."

An increasingly common tool for retaliatory attacks is the mortar. In the three days that followed the death sentence for Mr. Hussein, a source of bitterness for Sunni Arabs, 10 different strikes around the capital killed at least 15 Iraqis and wounded 87, including three Shiite boys who were watching a soccer game in Sadr City.

General Caldwell said the military's raids had reduced the mortar attacks and put pressure on the militias, because killings appear to be carried out more quickly now by the looks of the bodies.

DOJ_NMG_0096006

Jamal, a nephew of the Shiite killed with his five friends, said Shiites, long oppressed under Mr. Hussein, had simply had enough. "You can't expect people with all this tragedy in all these years not to have any reaction."

When Jamal first saw his uncle's broken body stuffed in the trunk of a car, he was overcome by anger.

"The feeling of revenge overwhelmed me," he said, in a house in Sadr City. "I said to myself, 'I will kill all the Sunnis.' "

He said he did not resort to the killing of strangers, as some Iraqis have begun to do, but reached out for tribal and militia connections to track down the killers.

"On the surface, people say they trust," said a policeman in Naariya, who asked that his name not be used because he could be killed. "Inside, they don't trust each other at all."

A Shiite government employee said: "My family, they are not aggressive, but it's the feeling inside, the hatred. They believe Sunnis are doing all of this."

As the capital becomes more violent, many of those who refuse to give in to it leave. Hassan Jabr, a Shiite whose 12-year-old son was kidnapped and murdered this spring, moved to Jordan in the fall with his wife and one remaining son. He said he was forever changed when he saw his son's body in the morgue.

Before he left, he was waiting to register the death certificate in a government ministry, when he struck up a conversation with a man in his 20s whose only brother had been killed. The man said he had killed three Sunnis to avenge the death, Mr. Jabr said.

The man was surprised at Mr. Jabr's restraint. "Are you a coward?" Mr. Jabr said the man asked. "Why don't you take revenge?"

Upstate N.Y. Man Kidnapped In Iraq (AP)

By Valerie Bauman

AP, November 20, 2006

A former soldier from western New York is among the four Americans and one Austrian who were kidnapped in southern Iraq last week, family members said Sunday.

Jonathon Cote, 23, a native of Getzville, N.Y., a suburb of Buffalo, was working as a guard for Crescent Security Group when he was captured Thursday, his stepmother said. Family members spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity out of fear for Cote's safety.

"The waiting is very tiring, and stressful," his stepmother said. "Your mind goes from very optimistic, good thoughts to thoughts that maybe something good is not going to happen."

Before working for Crescent, Cote spent four years in the Army and served in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was stationed at Fort Bragg with the 82nd Airborne Division before receiving an honorable discharge, and has been in Iraq since June.

The five contract employees went missing when a truck convoy being escorted by Crescent was ambushed near Safwan, a largely Sunni Arab city of 200,000 people on the Kuwait border. Suspected militiamen dressed in Iraqi police uniforms seized 19 of the convoy's trucks, the five security guards and nine foreign drivers who were later released.

Another of the contractors is Paul Reuben, 39, a former police officer in the Minneapolis suburb of St. Louis Park, Minn., who is described by friends and family as an "easygoing, fun-loving type of guy" who was ready to come home.

His twin brother, Patrick Reuben, told the Star Tribune that Paul Reuben had been in Iraq for about two years working for Crescent and intended to come home after earning enough money to buy a house and a Hummer.

Suzanne Reuben said that her most recent contact with her brother was a few weeks ago, when they exchanged instant messages by computer. He told her he hope to be home by the day after Thanksgiving.

Islamic Companies, a previously unknown group, claimed responsibility for the kidnapping, according to an Iranian-run Arabic-language satellite news station, which said the group demanded the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq and the release of all prisoners being held there.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Michael McClellan said on Sunday that U.S. officials believe the five hostages are still being held captive.

Report: Flaws In Hussein Trial Impair Verdict (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan
The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 19 -- The trial of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, in which he was sentenced this month to death by hanging, was marred by flaws so serious that they undermined the trial's fairness and called into question the verdict, an international human rights watchdog group said in a report to be released Monday.

From the outset, the Iraqi High Tribunal's independence and perceived impartiality was weakened by actions of the Iraqi government, Human Rights Watch said in the 97-page, 10-month-long analysis of the trial, which condemned Hussein and seven co-defendants for the torture and execution of 148 people in the hamlet of Dujail more than two decades ago.

The report, based on courtroom observations and dozens of interviews with judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers, is the first significant challenge to what the Iraqi government and its U.S. patrons assert was a fair, if messy, trial.

The report asserts that there was failure to disclose key evidence to Hussein's attorneys and that there were violations of basic rights of the defendants to confront witnesses. The chief judge's outbursts in court undermined his impartiality, it said. There were also gaps in the evidence that weakened the prosecution's case and "put in doubt whether all the elements of the crimes charged were established," the report said.

"The tribunal squandered an important opportunity to deliver credible justice to the people of Iraq," Nehal Bhuta, the report's author, said in a statement. "And its imposition of the death penalty after an unfair trial is indefensible."

On Sunday, two U.S. advisers to the tribunal denounced the report as "misguided" and said that the trial was conducted properly and that a credible justice was delivered. They said the report did not take into account the tribunal's written judgment on the trial, expected to be completed, they said, as early as Monday.

"To question the overall integrity of the justice without reading the judgment is premature, at best," said one of the advisers, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program at Human Rights Watch, said such claims were "irrelevant" because the report does not speak to the quality of the judgment.

"What is done in a very careful, specific way underscores the major procedural flaws in the conduct of the proceedings that undermined the verdict of the trial," Dicker said in a telephone interview.

The Dujail trial was the first of its kind to be conducted against a former leader in his own country by his own people, and the first since the World War II Allies prosecuted the Nazi leadership at Nuremberg to try nearly an entire senior leadership for crimes against humanity.

Along with Hussein, two co-defendants were also sentenced to death by hanging, four received prison terms ranging from 15 years to life and one defendant was acquitted. The verdicts and sentences are under appeal. If Hussein's death sentence is upheld, Iraqi law requires him to be executed within 30 days.

But the trial's shortcomings, the report asserts, also "call into question subsequent proceedings at the tribunal."

The chief judge, Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman, lost his temper many times during sessions and exchanged insults with the defendants, the report said. He also had made "erratic and often unexplained decisions limiting the rights of defense counsel to question witnesses."

The U.S. advisers said Abdel-Rahman was simply trying to take control of a court that Hussein and his defense team mocked. Hussein boycotted proceedings or often wagged his finger, shouting. His co-defendants appeared in their underwear.

The prosecution, the report asserted, engaged in "trial by ambush," in which important documents were not handed to the defense in advance. As an example, the report cited an instance when 23 prosecution witness statements were read into the court record without any of the witnesses being made available for questioning by defense counsel.

The U.S. advisers said the prosecution followed proper procedures.

DOJ_NMG_0096008

The former chief judge, Rizgar Mohammed Amin, resigned after members of Iraq's parliament denounced him as "weak" and too lenient toward the defendants, the report said. There was heavy pressure to side against Hussein, it said.

"The attitude of the cabinet towards the court and the trial is one of a consumer who pays money for a product," one judge said in the report. "They give money, and they demand results. The government treats the court like a factory."

The report added that the judges lacked the experience to conduct such a complex trial and urged Iraq's government to allow international judicial experts to take part in future proceedings.

"For justice to be done, the trial has to be fair. There were large, large shortfalls in the fairness," Dicker said. The trial, he said, "certainly fails as a reference point historically for what happened and who was responsible in the way the Nuremberg trials did."

General Discusses Goals Of His Return To Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

FORT HOOD, Tex., Nov. 13 — Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who returns to Iraq next month to take charge of the day-to-day fight as commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, says he departs for Baghdad with a clearer, perhaps even diminished, set of expectations of what the military can be expected to accomplish now, more than three years after the invasion.

“You have to define win, and I think everybody has a different perspective on winning,” General Odierno said during an interview at the Army’s III Corps headquarters here.

“I would argue that with Saddam Hussein no longer in power in Iraq, that is a partial win,” he said. “I think what we need is an Iraqi government that is legitimate in the eyes of the Iraqi population, an Iraq that is able to protect itself and not be a safe haven for terror. That’s what I think winning is.”

As a bugle sounded across Fort Hood with the call to lower the flag at dusk, General Odierno paused, and added, “Notice I left out a few things, such as a democracy in the sense that we see a democracy in the United States. We have to allow them to shape their own democracy, the type of democracy that fits them and their country.”

It has become a truism of the war in Iraq that there can be no military victory without a political solution, which requires the coordinated efforts of the entire United States government and of the Iraqi one, as well.

“The longer we stay in Iraq, the less of a military fight it becomes,” the general said. “We have to understand that.”

General Odierno has spent the past several months preparing for his new command, assigning his staff several histories of counterinsurgency efforts in Malaya, Algeria and Vietnam; meeting with academic experts on the Middle East and Islamist terrorism; and holding sessions with officers from the other armed services and from the Iraqi ground forces, with whom he will be working.

He outwardly carries the lessons — and the private, internal scars — from his first tour, at both the professional and personal levels.

General Odierno commanded the Fourth Infantry Division as insurgents carried out three-quarters of their attacks nationwide in his area of north-central Iraq, which included Saddam Hussein’s volatile home region of Tikrit.

It also was on his watch that a Special Operations task force and conventional troops under his command captured Mr. Hussein, producing a briefly shining moment in which the counterinsurgency effort appeared to be gaining traction.

But insurgency, terrorism and factional violence verging on civil war have continued.

He has felt criticism from some officers, especially among marines, that made it into the public debate via op-ed columns and books by noted military affairs writers, including “Cobra II,” by Michael R. Gordon of The New York Times and Bernard E. Trainer; and “Fiasco,” by Thomas E. Ricks of The Washington Post.

The Fourth Infantry Division focused too much on traditional combat operations in 2003 and 2004, the critics argued, saying that those efforts, with an emphasis on capturing and killing adversary fighters rather than on rebuilding the country and winning the confidence of Iraqis, actually fueled the insurgency.

“It is too simplistic to say that all we were interested in was the hard-core task,” General Odierno said. “It simply is not true. We worked very hard to take the balanced approach.”

He expressed satisfaction with his division in bringing down the number of attacks in the Tikrit area of operations, which once accounted for three-quarters of attacks in Iraq and accounted for one-third at the end of his tour. (The focus of the insurgency shifted to the Anbar region, west of Baghdad.) He also cites his division's efforts in creating three new provisional governments through the first democratic-style caucuses.

The war became unusually, and intensely, personal for General Odierno when his son, Capt. Anthony Odierno, lost much of his left arm during a counter-insurgency mission in Baghdad in the summer of 2004.

The general succeeds the current corps commander, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the author of an influential essay warning that success in Iraq cannot be achieved solely by training local security forces or through combat operations. General Chiarelli wrote that the military must work to provide essential city services, create jobs and promote local governmental control. He also began the new operation this autumn to secure Baghdad.

After leaving Iraq in early 2004, General Odierno spent 18 months as an assistant to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs, most of that as an adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The experience, he said, gave him "a really good understanding of the interagency process.

"Maybe too good," he said. "I have a pretty clear understanding of what thought processes occur where and at what time, and how we get to certain decisions."

In what has become the overarching policy of the Bush administration, he also pledged to focus on increasing the capacity of Iraqi security forces, in particular the police, and on combating sectarian militias responsible for a growing percentage of attacks.

"A lot of the militias can be reconciled, and we have to figure out ways to reconcile with them," he said. "And there are splinter, radical groups that cannot be reconciled. They have other agendas, and they will have to be dealt with in a different way."

Decisions about how many troops that will require will be made by higher-ranking generals, and he did not hint what advice he might give them as their top field commander.

Asked to describe the Iraq he would like to see at the end of his 12-month tour, General Odierno said: "Bottom line? Full restoration of civil authority in Baghdad. Sectarian violence reduced. Extra-governmental armed groups diminished, and their influence diminished. And the government of Iraq viewed as a legitimate institution in the eyes of the Iraqi people.

"Those are the goals we have set for ourselves," he concluded. "Will we attain those? I don't know."

Lost After Translation (NYT)

By Basim Mardan

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

THE United States Marines entered Mosul from the north. I lived in the northern suburbs, so I saw the first American flag. When the Humvees stopped, I shook hands with the marines, and I told them: "You are mostly welcome here. Why don't you come to my house and drink some cold water?" They offered me a job.

I was the first or second translator to work with the coalition forces in my city, the first or second Iraqi to set foot on the American base in Mosul. The Marines paid me $150 a month, which was better than the $2 I was making as a librarian. So I didn't see weapons in their hands, I saw flowers, and I took them all as friends. I loved what I was doing because I thought it was a good thing for my country.

My family was nervous. They told me things would change. I needed the American money to get married, but my fiancée said, "We don't need to get married now — just quit." But I wanted to work with the military forever; I loved it.

The unit I worked with was training and equipping the Iraqi police, teaching them about human rights. I translated textbooks from an American police academy into Arabic. The Americans taught Iraqi officials to exercise their authority without taking bribes or humiliating employees.

Iraqis needed this education, and the unit I worked with was awesome. At one point, they did two or three patrols to clean up garbage from the streets. In our culture, cleaning garbage is a low-level job, but when we saw a captain and a general doing it, that gave us a very great feeling. I threw away my helmet, took a shovel and started working, cleaning up garbage.

But even as we cleaned the city of garbage, we forgot another kind of garbage that was accumulating. The way the Army reacted to the insurgency was not perfect. The Americans did many foolish things. When I saw the pictures from Abu Ghraib, I thought, we are teaching Iraqi policemen not to do that — do the Americans really do that?

I grew sad, and I didn't know what to believe, because the people I worked with were great. I'd told the officers at our camp's detention center, "You are treating those prisoners better than their own mothers." It's not normal in our culture for a policeman to come and feed a sick prisoner who is so dangerous that you have to keep him chained.

But I did it myself. I was very kind to Iraqi people, to my own people, and I think Americans taught me that — the American Army that I was working with, not the American Army that was in Abu Ghraib.

In the second year, when we were processing the release of prisoners from Abu Ghraib, I read out a list of names of prisoners who needed to collect their documents. One of them said to me, "You are all going to be killed." I thought he was referring to the Americans, until he said, "No, I mean you."

I didn't translate this for the soldiers who were with me. I was thinking, "This person just got out of prison, and I don't want to be the reason that he goes back to prison."

About a month later, a message was fixed to my door, full of verses from the Koran and threats and curses. They gave me about one week to quit what I was doing.

A week later, a CD was fixed on my door, picturing one of my best friends, Nabi Abul-Ahad. It was a video of them beheading him, with the message that I would be next.

I was kicked out of the house. My family didn't want me there any more. They said, "You're going to get us all killed." I had to leave my wife, who was pregnant. Baghdad was a real hell, so I hid in Najjaf.

After my wife gave birth to our son, her father told her, "If your husband doesn't come to Mosul now, even if he's going to get killed, then you are not his wife anymore." This can happen in our society. I didn't want to lose my wife or my son, so I went back to Mosul.

In Mosul, I had to stay hidden. I walked for about three hours in the dark, after curfew, when anybody can shoot at you, including the Americans, just to see my wife and my newborn son. Then I went back to my family's house and hid for three months.

The American Army, or whoever's in charge, has badly disappointed the translators. When I told them I was under threat, they said I could come and live on the base. I told them I had just been married, and my wife was pregnant, and my family needed me. They said I could live on the base and they would drop me by my house to visit my family at night.

Imagine if somebody saw me dropped by an American convoy near my house. The house would be burning the second I was inside. These were not logical solutions.

They could have helped my family move to Kurdistan, helped find me a job with the government there. Or, if I'd escaped to Jordan, they could tell the American Embassy there: "This is a translator who has been working for the United States Army. He's just like an American soldier. Treat him well."

But I'm not going to be ungrateful to the people who were fighting and dying for my country. I have friends in the American Army who died in front of my eyes.

I remember one of them, a dear friend to me who died stopping a car bomb. He was a hero. He was guarding the police academy in Mosul, which was full of new recruits being trained by the Americans.

My heart broke when I saw this: an American, coming from another continent, who died to protect Iraqi policemen. This was a good message, and I would never say that those people exploited me or exploited my thinking.

The system did. Not them.

Fear Of Freedom (NYT)

By Waddah Ali

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

UNDER Saddam Hussein, if you were not a member of the Baath party, you wouldn't get rations, you'd be forbidden to carry on studying, you wouldn't be on the earth but in the sea.

DOJ_NMG_0096011

I was invited to join the party in 1976, when I was doing my compulsory military service after earning my first degree at Mosul University. The colonel in control of my camp wanted to sit for an examination, and he asked me to join the party and translate the Oxford Companion to Military History into Arabic for him.

I'm very ambitious. I wanted to carry on with my studies. And so I joined the party, and when I finished my military service I was appointed to the university. They never appoint anyone unless you're a party member, it doesn't matter if you're Plato or Aristotle.

In 1982, when Iraq and Iran were at war, they asked me if I wanted a promotion within the party. To get this, I would have to go with some other comrades and execute deserters from the war. I told them I was not an executioner.

They put me in prison. Through family contacts, I got out after one month. They expelled me from teaching and transferred me to clerical work.

I tried to escape Iraq for Turkey in 1995. But the Kurds in northern Iraq demanded money I didn't have, and I decided to go back to Mosul, where I had a 300-meter plot of land given to me by Saddam Hussein.

Saddam Hussein gave everybody a plot of land. He was the most generous president, but also the most severe. He was a god, and gods are arbitrary.

In Mosul, men in a black Cadillac stopped me, blindfolded me and drove me to Baghdad, to Hakmiya Prison. After three months of solitary confinement, torture and electric shocks, I was accused of spying for Turkey. When I went in, my weight was 242 pounds. I came out only 121 pounds. I was divided in half by the torture.

After a year in prison, I came home. We were impoverished. My wife and children were living with her father in Karbala — they are Shiites — and my salary wasn't even enough for transportation to visit them. After a long time, I was reappointed to a university near there. I had been there for three months when the Americans came.

Nobody in Karbala dared to work as a translator for the American soldiers, so I was pushed into the first ranks, translating between the military commanders and the governor every day on TV. I found myself riding a rocket of fame and prestige, but no money. Just $20 a week, and a stigma in the eyes of others.

I translated conferences and debates with the Karbala city council. I even translated for L. Paul Bremer, the American viceroy, when he came. Before he arrived, the colonel I worked for told me, "Waddah, don't tell anybody he's coming." They trusted me, and I was worthy of their trust.

I tried to solve problems. Once, when students had a sit-in demonstration against the Americans, I told them: "Be quiet, be careful in your way of dealing with them. If you're impolite, suppose they are impolite, too — you could be killed."

Many times when I went to my father-in-law's house I was shot at from afar. Among the Shiites there are many hard-liners who support Iran and hate America. They didn't know that by marriage, I'm a Shiite like them. They said, this guy's a Sunni, serving the Americans.

The Americans gave me a pistol to defend myself. It was a war spoil, an Iraqi intelligence-style pistol. But it created some troubles between me and the American in charge of intelligence. One day he told me, "Waddah, give me the card for the weapon," the identity card allowing me to carry the weapon. I told him I didn't have it. I didn't trust him very much. He was young, proud and haughty. He frisked me, searching for the card, right in front of the president of the university, and he found the card in my pocket. He said, "You lied to me?"

I decided to quit working for the Americans. Not long after this, a child relative of mine was kidnapped on her way home from school. I sold my wife's gold, and I sold the plot of land Saddam Hussein gave me, for the ransom. Every one of my friends was looking for her. Finally the kidnappers telephoned my brother, he gave them $50,000, and she was released. This is what the insurgents do to finance their terror.

HISTORY is an idea to you; to us it is our life. I'm a typical Iraqi. I love my country. I love my food, my way of life, I love the carpets, the mud of the Euphrates, Iraqi poetry, everything: this is my culture. If I feel proud, I recite my poets, and the rhythm comes back, and no other rhythm can supersede or remove it.

What made Saddam Hussein powerful? Information. Whenever a person checked into a hotel, a paper with his full name and a copy of his passport was given to the security quarters. Iraq was a castle; a bird could not go in without being checked. If you caused offense, you could be put in prison for good. If you were lucky you would be tried one day; if not, then we have a word in Arabic that means you rot, as food rots.

America did well to liberate Iraq. But Iraqis were used to tyranny and afraid of freedom. The Americans entered Iraq without a psychological program for dealing with this fact. Iraqis had been programmed according to another system of thought and feeling. America should have considered that.

Republic Of Dreams (NYT)

By Omar Ghanim Fathi

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

WHEN I was a student, we read many books about Western culture, democracy and the Greek philosophers. We saw movies set in America, where people were able to speak their minds, and we figured that democracy would be the salvation for us and our country.

Our dreams were romantic and rosy. The bitterness and ugliness of the reality we have faced since was nothing we could have imagined.

In Saddam Hussein's time, in order to be accepted you had to tell the government that you were a Baathist; you had to tell people in your social environment that you were religious; and in fact you had to be somewhere in the middle.

I was a moderate liberal. In my imaginary republic, there was space for everybody — Baathists, socialists, liberals — as long as you didn't hurt people or persecute them or impose your style of thinking or living on others.

When the Americans invaded, I was ready to shake hands with the devil himself to remove Saddam Hussein from power. I didn't think the Americans would be able to give us liberty or democracy, but I thought they would give us the space to build that imaginary republic. I didn't go to work for the Americans, but I published articles in a newspaper they established in Mosul. It was called New Hope. It told the people what the American forces were doing day by day in Mosul, and there was space where Iraqis could write opinions.

I wrote nine articles for that newspaper. One of them won a competition for the best essay on democracy and liberty in Iraq. It was a big competition, and I won. What I said, simply, was that liberty is just like your own spirit, your own soul: nobody can give it to you, but anybody can take it away from you. My photo appeared in the paper with the article.

I was a lecturer at an institute, and I started receiving threats from my students — directly, face to face: "You deserve to die." And my boss said, "You've been a traitor to your religion and your country." Insurgents slid threatening letters under my door. My mother was terrified. I'm her only son.

The terrorists do not necessarily attack you personally. They attack sisters, kidnap sons, mothers. We are in a war against dishonorable enemies. The only thing that I had, the only weapon to defend myself, was my pen and my words, but the solution for them was not discussion, not disagreeing with me, but shooting me.

They shot dead a salesman who came to our door, because they mistook him for me. We sold the house and went to live with my sister.

Some time later, a friend offered me a job with an Iraqi organization called Development and Democratic Dialogue. Three or four days after I started working there, my friend was kidnapped while giving a lecture at a university. Before he died I'd told him, "Don't give a lecture in the same place twice." But that's what he did. We were like soldiers without weapons: you go and give lectures, but you don't know what's going to happen to you when the lecture is finished.

I think the Americans, as we Iraqis understand them, are two entities. There's the Army in Iraq and the politicians in Washington. The American policy people wanted to give us democracy and liberty the same way you give me a shirt, so I can wear it right away. But the general opinion in my country, especially among extremists, is that America went into Iraq only for one reason: to terminate Islam and Muslims. Those who aren't so extreme say that America invaded Iraq only to steal the oil.

The American Army, on the other hand, we know for sure is not an abstract entity; it is a bunch of people, every one of them different from the others. They are under very, very intense pressure. People hate them, people are attacking them, and of course this pressure can lead to many mistakes. They destroyed everything and thought they could rebuild from scratch. Maybe this could have worked if people loved Americans or understood what they were doing. But people already hated America.

America should have removed Saddam Hussein and the closest circle around him and appointed a strong government right away. It would have been another dictatorship, but a different kind. It could have imposed martial law, then done the job that the Americans were not able to do, which was to cut power away from the old system by removing those people who might become terrorists in the future.

After four to eight years, we could have had an election, and the new government could have started working on the basis of the new Constitution. Then Iraqi society could have taken baby steps down the long road to democracy and liberty. As it was, the Iraqi people, who had no experience with civilian government or democratic systems, misused these things.

Now the problems of Iraq will not be solved without a long and very bloody civil war. The fragments that will emerge should practice democracy by choosing their own leaders, away from the influence of the Americans — even if those leaders are terrorists. But the people will not enjoy the democracy and liberty that was already given to them, because they refused it.

Afghan Army To Strike Taliban In Winter (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, November 20, 2006

The U.S.-backed Afghan army will step up counter-Taliban offensives this winter, which could see heavy fighting during a period traditionally used by Afghan fighters for rest and resupply, a U.S. general said here Sunday.

U.S. Army Brig. Gen. Douglas Pritt, who oversees the U.S.-led effort to train the Afghan military, said Afghan forces have tripled the number of forward bases to more than 60 and plan to spend the winter harassing Taliban and gathering intelligence from combat outposts deep inside rebel strongholds.

"They're much better equipped for winter operations than the Taliban. I'm hoping for a lot of snow this winter," Pritt said during a visit to The Associated Press bureau in Dubai.

Pritt said most Afghan troops that have emerged from training still cannot operate independently, but he noted that five battalions of Afghan National Army troops, numbering 300 to 600 soldiers each, were nearly ready to mount offensives on their own.

But even those top battalions will continue to operate in tandem with U.S. and NATO troops, he said.

Afghanistan's winters normally bring months of rain and snow, turning dusty roads into impassable muck and rendering most warfare impossible. The country has traditionally seen winter breaks in its decades of conflict, where fighters return home to families or hunker down on bases until fighting resumes in spring.

Snowfall is already hampering Taliban supply lines, making it tougher for the rebels to resupply, Pritt said. The Afghan National Army, backed by U.S. and NATO airlifts, are less restricted by cold and mud.

Afghan troops are being readied for "extended patrols" in the combat zones of the east and south that border Pakistan.

"We want to be in the right places," he said. "If the Taliban is trying to rearm, refit and wait out the winter, then we'll know they're there."

The Afghan National Army remains hamstrung by desertion rates of around 15 percent, Pritt said, little different from its rate in May. The previous year, the desertion rate peaked above 25 percent, according to U.S. military figures.

Afghan soldiers recently received a raise for their tiny salaries, from $70 to $100 a month, Pritt said, a decision that followed the revelation that AWOL soldiers could earn $70 a month as day laborers without facing combat.

The general said his goal was to bring the desertion rate below 10 percent, a figure that has already been reached in one Afghan corps.

U.S. and Afghan officials have said soldiers abscond for several reasons, including a reluctance to fight alongside foreigners against countrymen and a need to bring money to families in remote villages or help at harvest time.

The Afghan army's screening process has blocked the type of insurgent infiltrators that have hampered the Iraqi military. Pritt said only three Taliban have thus far been found in the ranks.

"They were trying to get information that was inappropriate for their job descriptions," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0096014

The American force training Afghan troops — chiefly made up of U.S. Army National Guardsmen — is expected to rise from 2,900 now to around 3,600 by April, to comply with an Afghan government directive to increase recruiting to 2,000 Afghan soldiers per month, Pritt said.

Overall, he said 5,200 foreign trainers would be working with the Afghan army, which the government wants to increase from its current 35,000 troops to 50,000 or perhaps 70,000.

"We believe this is the main effort in Afghanistan," Pritt said.

In Afghanistan's South, Mixed Signals For Help (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

KABUL -- Clutching scarves nervously around their faces, the women whispered details of Taliban atrocities taking place in their native Helmand province: A translator's body found in a sack, carved into pieces. A police officer taken hostage, blinded and garroted with wire. A woman shot and hanged by her thumbs.

"All of our lives are in danger now. Our schools are shut, and anyone who works for the government is branded as an infidel," said Ma Gul, 52, a teacher who traveled to the capital this week with 20 other women from Greshk, a town in Helmand 300 miles south, to demand better protection and the removal of weak regional officials.

Gul's woes echo across this country's four southern provinces, where the Taliban insurgency is on a fierce rebound five years after U.S. and Afghan forces toppled the Islamic militia from power in Kabul. Months of aggressive ground combat and NATO airstrikes have failed to halt continuous violence in the south, as well as some sporadic attacks in other parts of the country.

According to a new report by a commission of Afghan and foreign officials, insurgent and terrorist attacks nationwide have increased fourfold in the past year, reaching 600 incidents per month by September and causing 3,700 deaths since January.

The report was issued by a group called the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, set up in February under U.N. auspices to promote and measure Afghan government performance. It said the violence threatens to reverse recent economic and political gains across the nation, and has led to a partial or total withdrawal of foreign aid in some provinces.

In Helmand, a vast and arid region where much of the worst fighting has taken place and thousands of people have fled their homes, residents and elders have been sending urgent but contradictory signals about how to restore peace.

While the delegation of women recounted Taliban abuses, a group of visiting elders from another Helmand district described local Taliban fighters as "brothers" and said their worst problem was the devastation from months of bombing by foreign military forces. If the authorities would allow tribal leaders to administer their district, they said, they would guarantee no further Taliban attacks.

"This bombing has destroyed hundreds of shops and many vineyards, but it has not driven the Taliban away," said Mohammed Rahim, a bearded farmer from Helmand's Nau Zad district. "We know the local Taliban; they are fighting against corruption and abuses. Once we have our own administration and the bombing stops, we trust they will obey us and the central government."

As a result of the mixed messages from victims of the conflict, and the growing public resentment over civilian casualties from bombing, NATO and Afghan officials now confront a strategic question: whether to keep pressing to forcibly defeat the Taliban, or begin accepting its presence in areas where tribal elders promise to rein in the militia.

Much of the south is still at war, with attacks and armed clashes occurring daily in Kandahar, Zabol and Uruzgan provinces. But in Helmand's Musa Qala district, NATO has cautiously agreed to test the tribal approach. Under a deal brokered in September by the provincial governor, NATO agreed to pull back British forces from Musa Qala, and local elders pledged that Taliban attacks would cease.

So far, reports from the isolated region, which is also a major center of opium smuggling, are confusing and contradictory. Some residents and visitors say the district is effectively under Taliban control, and a recent BBC video report showed squads of armed insurgents patrolling Musa Qala in fast pickup trucks, much as they did during the era of repressive Taliban rule that ended in 2001.

But both NATO and senior Afghan officials say they are largely satisfied with the arrangement, which they said has brought fighting to a halt and allowed foreign troops to focus on creating a central zone for security and development around Helmand's capital city, rather than manning scattered outposts and chasing after bands of insurgents.

"Musa Qala has proved to be a very good deal," said Maj. Luke Knittig, a U.S. Army officer and the chief NATO spokesman in Kabul. "After the agreement, there were 34 days of calm, which led us to believe the elders had made good on their word." However, he added: "We have our eyes closely on Musa Qala. If we see it being used as a launching pad for attacks, we will go back and address that."

President Hamid Karzai defended the pact last week against criticism that it has been a major concession to the Taliban. Speaking on Radio Free Europe, he said he had complete trust in the region's elders and in their promise not to allow any "saboteurs" in Musa Qala. However, Karzai also expressed concern about reports that a local Islamic cleric was humiliated by Taliban fighters and that a senior tribal leader had disappeared.

Karzai's embrace of the agreement stands in marked contrast to the skepticism he and other Afghan officials have shown toward two similar peace deals reached this fall between the government of Pakistan and tribal leaders in districts abutting the Afghan border. Those districts are widely believed to serve as havens for Islamic extremists and al-Qaeda fugitives who train insurgents and send them across the border to fight against Afghan and NATO forces.

Some observers here worry that the Musa Qala deal is not only setting a tone of conciliation toward the insurgency, but that it also means Karzai and his foreign defenders are falling back on Afghanistan's tribal system of jergas, or informal consensual agreements, at the expense of modern democratic institutions.

"This is the wrong way to solve things," said Noorulhaq Olemi, a member of parliament who chairs its security and defense committee. "Our problem is that we have a weak government. We need a better national army and police. We need reconciliation with the people, not with terrorists. If we go back to the tribal system and jergas, we could end up with the country divided into pieces."

Although Helmand residents disagree on the issue of negotiating with the Taliban, many express common anger and disillusionment with regional authorities. Both the Greshk women and the Nau Zad elders said that many police and civilian officials in Helmand are abusive and corrupt, and that this problem is creating local support for the Taliban.

The diplomats and academics on the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board agreed, stating in their report that the factors driving the insurgency in the south include poor government services, corrupt officials and lack of law enforcement. In Helmand especially, they added, the "scourge of the narcotics industry" has significantly helped fuel the insurgency.

"When there is an absence in basic service delivery by the government, people inevitably look to alternative sources," the report said. "Only by eliminating corruption can the government diminish the freedom of operation that insurgents and drug traffickers now enjoy."

To the women from Greshk, who include government teachers and professionals, the Musa Qala agreement is a frightening example of authority caving in to powerful miscreants. One member of the delegation said the Taliban and its criminal allies had already built a plane runway and a heroin laboratory in Musa Qala.

But to the elders from Nau Zad, mostly poor farmers whose homes and livelihoods have been savaged by months of fighting, Musa Qala represents a model for peace that they desperately hope can be replicated in their district.

"Some people call it a Taliban agreement, but that is wrong," said Mohammed Anwar, a member of parliament from Nau Zad who hosted the visiting elders in Kabul. "The foreign Taliban are terrorists, but the local Taliban are the sons of Afghanistan. They will speak with us and live under the flag with us. If the government cannot bring security and stop this terrible bombing, they should let the elders try."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

State Bars Push Back On Privilege Waivers (LAW)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096016

State bar associations are jumping into the roiling debate over the attorney-client privilege-waiver issue triggered by the U.S. Department of Justice's Thompson Memorandum.

Several states have recently convened task forces to fight the 2003 directive penned by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, which, among other things, instructs prosecutors to trade leniency for waivers of the attorney-client privilege during corporate investigations.

The states are lobbying the federal government to change Justice Department policies and practices that give incentives to corporate defendants who waive attorney-client privilege and pressure companies not to pay the legal fees of current or former employees facing corporate criminal investigations. In some cases, states are mulling changes to their own rules of professional conduct to sidestep Thompson-style waivers.

New task forces in Florida, Illinois and Michigan join ongoing efforts in Arkansas, Maryland, New York and Boston.

'CULTURE OF WAIVER'

Samuel Damren, a litigator in the Detroit office of Dykema Gossett, heads Michigan's task force. He hopes that his group will recommend changing the state's rules of professional conduct to prohibit government attorneys practicing in Michigan from requesting that companies waive their attorney-client privilege to prove they are cooperating with the government probe.

Damren said his approach is part of the legal community's pushback against the perceived "culture of waiver" that many attorneys worry is eroding attorney-client privilege. "If the prosecutors and regulators aren't going to change the rules, it's not just in their hands, it's in the hands of the bar," Damren said.

An Arkansas Bar Association task force is recommending that its House of Delegates ask the Arkansas Supreme Court to adopt rule changes allowing for selective waiver, or disclosure of some information to a government agency without revoking the attorney-client privilege, and barring discovery of attorney communications with experts.

The 72,000-member New York State Bar Association is informally discussing whether to push for changes to the rules of professional conduct to curtail waivers. But state Bar President Mark H. Alcott said he's unsure if such a rule would work in practice, since the client ultimately has the right to waive and could succumb to pressure from the government.

The Bar's chief strategy is lobbying the federal government to change policies that pressure companies to waive attorney-client privilege, said Alcott, a senior litigation partner with New York's Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison.

Florida Bar President Henry M. Coxe III of Bedell, Dittmar, DeVault, Pillans & Coxe in Jacksonville was inspired by hearing about the New York Bar efforts at an American Bar Association gathering. "It struck me that Florida wasn't in that mix and we should be," he said.

The Florida Bar task force, which was formed in September, is looking into the extent of compelled or coerced waivers in Florida, and the circumstances under which waivers were granted. But Coxe said it's too early to project what recommendations might emerge.

A special committee of the Illinois State Bar Association met for the first time on Oct. 30, in response to the American Bar Association's appeal to state bar groups to examine the issue, said Chairman J. Timothy Eaton of Chicago's Shefsky & Froelich.

The committee has yet to decide on its scope, but it will inspect the waiver-seeking activities of the state's attorney general and its impact on the local bar. Recommending that the Illinois Supreme Court change the rules of professional conduct is another possibility, Eaton said.

In June, the Boston Bar Association penned a letter to its local U.S. Attorney about the office's written waiver-review process. The bar association requested that a supervisor in the U.S. Attorney's Office approve all prosecutor requests for waiver of the corporate attorney-client privilege or work-product protection and that the office only grant limited waivers.

A company's willingness to cooperate in investigations is not a "litmus test" and is only one of several factors the Justice Department considers when charging a company, said DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The DOJ is still "reviewing the specific concerns and suggestions" of bar associations and other groups, Roehrkasse said.

SEC Contacts Ford Over Disclosures (WSJ)

By Tony Cooke And John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

DETROIT -- Ford Motor Co. said it has received an informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission related to disclosures detailing its recent restatements of earnings because of accounting errors.

The company also restated financial results for the first and second quarters of 2006, deepening its loss for the two periods and finalizing the financial corrections it has said it needed to make.

On Nov. 14, Ford restated the bulk of the affected earnings, which span from 2001 to the third quarter of 2006. The restatements are necessary because Ford failed to sufficiently comply with certain rules related to its accounting for transactions used to hedge against interest-rate risk.

Ford on Friday said it has been contacted by the SEC's divisions of corporation finance and enforcement regarding the amended restatements for the entirety of 2005, the third quarter of 2006 and another filing discussing the restatements. Ford said it is "voluntarily cooperating" with the "informal inquiries," which also relate to disclosures made by Ford Motor Credit Co.

It is unclear whether the SEC will also inquire into the first- and second-quarter restatements issued Friday. Ford spokeswoman Becky Sanch declined to comment further on Friday's SEC filing regarding the informal inquiry. When Ford first said it would restate earnings, company officials expressed disappointment over the restatements and said the issues were related to "a very complicated accounting standard."

SEC officials couldn't be reached. The SEC doesn't typically comment on inquiries that haven't been made public and has in the past declined to comment on inquiries that are ongoing.

Other companies, including auto supplier Delphi Corp., have had to delay earnings in an effort to evaluate how past earnings statements complied with the rules, known as SFAS 133 for accounting for derivative instruments and hedging activities.

In last month's statement announcing the company's need to restate earnings, Ford Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said the company's "overall hedging strategy is sound."

Ford first said it needed to restate earnings on Oct. 23 when it released preliminary financial results for the third quarter. The company had said initially it lost $5.8 billion during that period, but later pared the loss to $5.2 billion because of inaccurate accounting.

Friday, Ford revised its first-quarter loss to $1.42 billion from the previously stated $1.19 billion and revised its second-quarter loss to $317 million from $254 million. The move widens the reported net loss to $1.74 billion from $1.44 billion for the first six months of the year. The company expects to post further losses in the fourth quarter.

The company's restatements aren't expected to affect cash flow.

The first and second quarter were revised for reasons similar to those in the previous restatements issued Tuesday, Ms. Sanch said. The company's restatements for previous years had changed a net loss to a net profit in 2002, but reduced the company's stated income during the next three years through 2005.

Ford shares closed Friday at $8.89 each, down 1.6%.

Outside Audit Restatement Blame: Basic Mistakes (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Public companies continue to restate financial results at a record pace. Ask executives why and they will likely cite complex accounting rules or hypersensitive auditors.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has come to a different conclusion: A majority of restatements are due to basic mistakes with nuts-and-bolts accounting.

Research by the SEC's Office of the Chief Accountant found about 55% of recent restatements were due to companies misapplying basic accounting rules or to problems with records that meant they didn't have the correct data to get the accounting right, said SEC Deputy Chief Accountant Scott Taub.

He expressed surprise so many restatements were "just from flat-out errors." Mr. Taub outlined the study's results during a presentation in New York on Friday at the annual conference of Financial Executives International, a professional group.

"Internal-control structures are missing things, corporate-finance staffs are missing things and auditors are missing things," he said. "All of these things are not working as well as we'd like them to."

The findings come as the SEC, along with the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, an accounting-firm regulator, have been working to ease internal-control rules designed to ensure companies avoid accounting mistakes or fraud. Companies, especially smaller firms, have bristled at the costs of rules imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform legislation. Besides mandating that managers attest to having adequate controls, the rules require an auditor to sign off that the controls are sufficient.

Supporters of the internal-control rules have argued they are needed because companies still are having a tough time getting their accounting right. They point to the rise in restatements in recent years as evidence companies still have a lot of work to do.

In 2005, there were 1,195 restatements by U.S. companies compared with 270 in 2001, according to Glass Lewis & Co., a proxy-advisory and accounting-research firm. U.S. companies had issued 1,070 restatements this year as of Sept. 30, making it likely that total restatements for the year will hit 1,300, said Mark Grothe, an analyst at Glass Lewis.

Restatements are akin to a product recall of a company's financial statements. They mean investors can no longer rely on profit and other figures that may have formed the basis for an investment decision. The rise in restatements has been attributed to much tougher audits by accounting firms, which came under fire for their failure to catch blowups like Enron Corp. and the former WorldCom Inc. In addition, Sarbanes-Oxley brought accounting firms under formal regulation for the first time, giving them impetus to dig deeper into corporate books.

Mr. Taub said his office undertook its study to find the underlying problems causing the restatements. Besides basic errors, the SEC's research concluded that about a third of restatements in recent years were due to errors in judgment related to more-complex issues, industry practices that ran afoul of accounting rules, and lack of clarity in accounting standards. Only about 5% of restatements were due to deliberate errors or fraud, he said.

Among problem areas that go beyond basic errors, Mr. Taub said a large number of restatements were caused by problems applying accounting standards related to lease contracts, income taxes and revenue recognition.

To help stem the wave of restatements, Mr. Taub suggested that accounting-rule makers need to replace standards that are confusing to companies. The Financial Accounting Standards Board is making progress, he added, citing its work to revamp lease-accounting rules and a continuing project to overhaul pension accounting.

The SEC and other regulators need to accept that there can be "reasonable differences in judgment" on accounting issues that don't necessarily imply wrongdoing, Mr. Taub said, and impose regulation only when needed. Companies and auditors need to exercise "professional judgment" and help to stamp out transactions structured to achieve a particular accounting result, he said.

Mr. Taub also encouraged companies to increase disclosure that shows their reasoning on complex questions. He suggested companies forced to restate results disclose how they discovered the problem. That happened in only about half the restatements his staff examined. How an error is found is "something investors might be concerned about," he said.

EXITING UNDER A CLOUD, WITH $175 MILLION (LAT)

By Kathy M. Kristof, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

KB Home's CEO left amid a stock option probe. He can cash in because he wasn't fired.

When KB Home Chief Executive Bruce Karatz retired last week amid a stock option controversy, he agreed to give up $13 million in disputed stock gains. But that doesn't mean he will leave the company empty-handed.

Karatz is walking away with as much as $175 million in severance pay, pension benefits and stock options, regulatory filings show.

The windfall is possible in part because Karatz was not fired for cause but simply retired, making him eligible for his severance pay and pension unless the company's board of directors blocks payment, compensation experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0096019

"It's like he hit the jackpot," said Patrick McGurn, general counsel of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises large investors such as pension plans and mutual funds. "He might not like the hit to his reputation, but he's certainly not going to take one to his bank account."

Karatz, 61, stepped down as head of the Los Angeles home-building company Nov. 12, after an internal probe found that he had picked stock option grant dates that inflated the value of the options to himself and other executives.

Under his employment agreement, Karatz would get a severance payment equal to the sum of what he earned in salary and incentive pay over the last three years, according to KB Home's proxy statement. That adds up to nearly $80 million.

Karatz also has a special executive pension plan that guarantees him $1 million a year for up to 25 years in retirement, making it potentially worth $25 million.

And Karatz has vested stock options that aren't in dispute, which are worth about $70 million based on KB Home shares' closing price Friday of $49.07.

Add it all up, and it comes to $175 million.

"What's perverse about this is Karatz may actually do better by getting fired than he would have done if he had stayed with the company," McGurn said.

He noted that Karatz's compensation from 2002 to 2005 — on which his severance is based — was boosted by the strong housing market, because his pay was tied to KB's profit. In 2005, the company reported profit of $842 million.

Mark Fabiani, an attorney representing the KB Home board, declined to say whether directors would move to revoke Karatz's severance pay or retirement benefits.

"The employment agreement will be the subject of discussions with the board and Mr. Karatz's representatives," Fabiani said. "The board is going to enter into discussions with Mr. Karatz about that situation, and those discussions have not yet begun."

Lawyers for Karatz declined to comment.

By stepping down, Karatz joined more than 50 corporate officers who have been fired or resigned in the option backdating scandal. Nearly 200 companies have disclosed federal or internal inquiries into their option practices.

Options are the right to buy stock at a set price within a certain time period.

Government and internal investigations are focused on whether executives improperly looked back weeks or months to set grant dates to coincide with their stock's lowest recent price, which would boost the value of the options.

KB Home disclosed in August that the Securities and Exchange Commission was reviewing its option practices. Legal experts said last week that Karatz's resignation could also draw the attention of the Justice Department, which has filed criminal charges against former executives of two companies accused of backdating.

In a statement Nov. 12, KB Home's board said its internal probe concluded that Karatz and former human resources chief Gary A. Ray had set "incorrect" option grant dates, but the board did not directly accuse them of wrongdoing. The company said Karatz had retired, Ray's employment had been terminated and chief legal officer Richard B. Hirst had resigned.

Company representatives declined to elaborate on the statement, which also said that Karatz would surrender $13 million he had realized based on flawed option grant dates.

Karatz's contract guarantees him severance except under only a few circumstances, including being fired for a specific cause such as fraud or misappropriation of funds, said Paul Hodgson, a compensation expert with Corporate Library, a research firm.

"The problem is that these contracts are written so loosely that it's tough to terminate without paying," he said.

Hodgson also noted that by saying Karatz had retired, KB Home implied that the separation was voluntary, which could make it more difficult for the company to deny Karatz his severance pay or pension.

Hodgson and other experts said that lucrative severance agreements were common for top corporate executives, even those who leave under a cloud.

"No one should shed any tears for CEOs who are forced out because of their role in backdating scandals," said Amy Borrus, deputy director of the Council of Institutional Investors, which represents large shareholders.

"In most cases, they will walk away with lavish severance packages that will more than offset any ill-gotten gains that the board presses them to return."

Check, Please Companies Discover It's Hard To Reclaim Pay From Executives (WSJ)

By Phred Dvorak And Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

In April 2001, directors of utility FPL Group Inc. faced a sticky problem. A few months earlier, they'd awarded top executives $62 million in bonuses linked to a merger that would have created the U.S.'s biggest electric company. Now the deal had fallen apart and shareholders were clamoring to get the money back.

FPL directors scrutinized payment plans. They clashed with executives. Shareholders sued. After three years and millions in legal bills, executives returned $9 million, based largely on a technicality. Insurers paid another $12.5 million.

The FPL saga is an object lesson in why companies rarely recoup money paid to executives for results they didn't actually achieve. Although the concept seems simple, at least from an ethical point of view, so-called "clawbacks" of executive pay are in practice disruptive, divisive and difficult to pull off. In addition to a murky legal environment, the process is complicated by compensation contracts and insurance provisions. Most boards don't try recovering the money. Those that do often get mired in years of litigation.

With beefed up scrutiny of corporate accounting, an increasing number of companies have been revising their numbers, making the clawback problem more acute. In the first nine months of this year, 1,070 companies restated previously reported results, up from 948 in the same period last year, according to shareholder adviser Glass, Lewis & Co. These revisions lowered revenue and profits totals that were the basis for millions of dollars in executive bonuses.

In the most egregious cases, executives who fudged numbers that boosted their pay have been pursued by prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Former CA Inc. Chief Executive Sanjay Kumar pleaded guilty in April to manipulating the dates of sales contracts to artificially boost revenue by more than $2 billion in 1999 and 2000. That helped earn Mr. Kumar $5.6 million in performance-based bonuses and $331 million in restricted stock. In 2000, Mr. Kumar returned about a third of the restricted stock to settle a shareholder suit.

In addition to his 12-year prison sentence, Mr. Kumar has to pay an $8 million fine and restitution to investors; the amount hasn't been set. The SEC has claims pending for civil penalties and return of his "ill-gotten gains." CA, the software company formerly known as Computer Associates, has sued Mr. Kumar for repayment of his legal expenses.

A handful of executives quietly repay their companies. In 1998, then-CEO Lawrence Coss returned roughly a third of his $102 million 1996 bonus to Green Tree Financial Corp., now part of Conseco Inc., after a restatement wiped out $174 million of pretax profit on which the bonus was based. In August, the top 14 officers of electronic-component maker Molex Inc. said they'd return a total of $685,000 in gains on misdated stock options they'd received over the last 12 years.

Even voluntarily returning money can prove complicated. After a 2002 restatement shaved $100 million from Dollar General Corp.'s net income for 1998 to 2000, the discount retailer's then-CEO, Cal Turner Jr., decided to return all of his bonuses. But his awards also included the right to exercise stock options ahead of schedule -- and the value of the shares he bought had fallen below what he'd paid for them.

Mr. Turner says he told his lawyers he'd return whatever amount they chose, which turned out to be $6.8 million. "How on earth do you calculate that anyhow?" Mr. Turner says.

Some boards who pursue current or former executives find themselves bogged down in the courts. Canadian telecommunication-equipment maker Nortel Networks Corp. last year recovered $8.6 million in "return to profitability" bonuses paid to 12 executives. A restatement showed the company hadn't returned to profitability after all. It sued another 10 executives, including fired CEO Frank Dunn, who has counter-sued the company. All the suits are pending.

Symbol Technologies Inc., a maker of barcode scanners, sued four former executives in U.S. district court in Central Islip, N.Y. in 2004, to retrieve bonuses based on results the company now says were fraudulent. The suit is on hold while three of the executives contest criminal charges. A trial early this year in the same court of two of those individuals ended in a mistrial. A new one is scheduled for next year.

The 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law was supposed to ease the process of recovering undeserved bonuses. One provision requires CEOs and chief financial officers to return performance-based pay or profits from stock sales following restatements that involve misconduct. But when companies and shareholders have tried to use the law in civil courts, they've been rebuffed by judges and arbitrators who say the vaguely worded rule suggests only the SEC can enforce the provision. The agency, meanwhile, has never done so.

Directors of Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. tried invoking the provision in their long-running battle against former CEO Henry Yuen. The SEC in its own case, brought in U.S. district court in Los Angeles, says Mr. Yuen helped inflate the company's revenue between 1999 and 2002, a charge he denies. Mr. Yuen's incentive-based pay was partly tied to revenue, and in those years, he earned $72 million from bonuses and stock sales, Gemstar says.

Arbitrators who heard the employment dispute agreed that the Sarbanes-Oxley rule could be enforceable only by regulators. "We were surprised that we couldn't use it," says Rick Stone, a lawyer who represents Gemstar.

An SEC spokesman says the commission prefers to use other laws to recoup money, in part because the Sarbanes-Oxley provision funnels money to companies instead of shareholders. Rep. Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who's in line to become chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, has proposed legislation that would strengthen the ability of shareholders to achieve clawbacks.

Some companies have tried amending their rules to forestall the problem. Directors of International Paper Co. last year revised their long-term executive bonus plan. Now the company can recover money if its results are revised significantly, regardless of who's to blame. International Paper pays bonuses in restricted stock that can't be sold for several years, providing time to catch mistakes.

In general, says Maura Abeln Smith, the company's general counsel, "if someone wrote you a check and paid you too much, it would only be fair to return the overpayment."

The biggest push to return unearned compensation comes from shareholders. Some are suing to recover bonuses when directors are slow to act. In the past three years, activist investors have asked 13 companies to adopt provisions like that of International Paper, according to proxy adviser Institutional Shareholder Services. Only one proposal has come close to winning 50% of the shares voted. But some targeted companies are adopting similar measures on their own.

Earlier this year, advertising giant Interpublic Group of Companies Inc., adopted a policy that allows it to seek repayment of bonuses if executive misconduct leads to a restatement. Interpublic had been under pressure since last year when it restated results for 2001 through 2004, reducing net income over the period by $514 million.

Interpublic says it has no plans to pursue $1.4 million in "performance bonuses" paid to former CEO David Bell over that period. In a written statement last year, Interpublic said Mr. Bell and other top executives were not involved in the "malfeasance" that led to the restatement. The company said misconduct by lower level employees overseas was partly responsible.

FPL's clawback tale began in December 2000 when shareholders approved the company's $8 billion merger with Entergy Corp. The approval triggered payment of $92 million in cash bonuses to nearly 700 managers. Like many companies, Juno Beach, Fla.-based FPL, the parent of Florida Power & Light Co., had a "change of control" provision in its compensation plan, designed to retain top talent during a merger or acquisition.

FPL's provision was unusually liberal. It took effect even if FPL shareholders ended up owning a significant majority of the merged company. FPL also required the payments to be made when shareholders approved a deal, rather than waiting for it to be completed.

Two-thirds of the money went to FPL's top eight officers. The chairman and CEO at the time, James L. Broadhead, received the biggest chunk -- $22.6 million.

The proposed merger quickly ran into trouble. Mr. Broadhead, a former telecommunications executive, found "discrepancies" in Entergy's financial projections, FPL says. Entergy says FPL demanded some of its executives step down after the merger. (FPL won't comment on that assertion.) In April 2001, the two companies called off the deal.

Former FPL director Marshall Criser says it was only after the deal collapsed that he realized the merger bonuses had already been paid. Mr. Criser, a lawyer, says he expected the board to ask Mr. Broadhead and others to return the money. Mr. Criser's term on the board ended soon after the deal fell through and he says he didn't have an opportunity to raise the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0096022

The board was in a quandary. Some directors upset about the payments felt they had no grounds to demand repayment, says Willard Dover, a lawyer and former FPL director. Mr. Dover says some directors also feared hurting relations with Mr. Broadhead and other officers, given the close ties between the executives and the board. Mr. Dover himself used to hunt with an FPL executive. At least three independent directors were friends of Mr. Broadhead, according to a report the company later prepared about the payments.

Mr. Broadhead and FPL's general counsel, who also received the bonus, asserted publicly and to directors that the payments were justified by language in the compensation plans. The board didn't challenge them, says Mr. Dover.

Mr. Broadhead says in an interview that he never considered returning the money. It would have been "really inappropriate" for the board to ask him to repay compensation guaranteed in a contract, he says.

The FPL board was already under fire from corporate-governance watchdogs for the size of Mr. Broadhead's pay. He received about $35 million from 1999 to 2001, not including the merger bonus. In May 2001, a month after the Entergy deal fell through, a shareholder asked the FPL board to sue Mr. Broadhead and seven other executives to recover $62 million of the merger bonuses. In January 2002, two other groups of shareholders sued FPL's directors and officers on the company's behalf, asking for similar repayments.

Roy Oorbeek, a former FPL engineer, was a plaintiff in one of the shareholder suits. He says he already was angry at FPL management for collecting big salaries while cutting worker pay and benefits such as discount coupons for Thanksgiving turkeys. Seeing them collect millions for a merger that never happened upset him more, Mr. Oorbeek says.

The discontent forced FPL directors to reconsider the issue. In May 2001, they formed a committee to review the payments. Directors relied heavily on advice from the company's management. To staff the committee, Mr. Broadhead recommended Mr. Dover and two other directors, and the board agreed. The committee also hired a law firm recommended by FPL's general counsel.

After eight months of work, the committee replaced the law firm, citing an appearance of a conflict of interest. In court documents, the directors said they were unaware that the firm, Steel Hector & Davis, had earlier had the job of reviewing and approving the controversial compensation plan.

After 16 months of study, the board decided in September 2002 not to pursue repayment of the bonuses. The board's new lawyers said directors would have trouble proving that the bonuses had been paid improperly. Directors worried about complex repayment calculations. They also feared antagonizing executives, Mr. Dover says. "Pretty soon, you lose the sense of cohesion you must have between the officers and the board," he says.

Mr. Dover's committee, however, had uncovered something else: a glitch in how the bonuses were calculated. According to one interpretation of FPL's compensation plan, the company overpaid the top eight executives by about $9 million, former FPL directors say. Directors seized the opening to ask executives for some money back. "It didn't make us very popular," recalls Mr. Dover.

By mid-2002, when the error was uncovered, Mr. Broadhead had retired and his successor Lewis Hay III -- who declined to comment for this article -- wanted to maintain good relations with the board, says a person familiar with the deliberations. FPL directors and executives agreed to let an arbitrator decide the fate of the $9 million.

Meanwhile, the judge hearing the shareholder suits ruled against the company in a key preliminary ruling. In January 2004, Florida District Judge Alan Gold decided that FPL's board didn't independently evaluate the original shareholder claims. Judge Gold noted that the board's committee had been hand-picked by Mr. Broadhead, and that two of the three members had initially approved the awards as part of the compensation committee. The judge also questioned the independence of FPL's first set of lawyers.

The ruling prompted FPL's board and executives to settle the shareholder suit in late 2004. Mr. Broadhead and other executives agreed to repay $22.25 million of their $62 million. Of that, the executives paid $9.75 million according to court documents; insurers covered the rest. According to Mr. Dover, the sum owed by executives was based on the amount of the original overpayment.

Mr. Dover says the experience was painful and draining. Mr. Broadhead, 70 years old and now retired, says it was a waste of time and money. Mr. Oorbeek was unimpressed. "It was not a substantial amount of money that they recouped," he says. In the end, FPL didn't lose executives or suffer in recruiting, former directors say.

Still, the long drama prompted changes. In a series of amendments starting in 2001, FPL's board revised the change-of-control provision to take effect only after a merger is completed. It cut potential bonuses in half and made it harder to trigger such a payment.

Last December, FPL announced another merger, this time with Constellation Energy Group. FPL shareholders would have owned roughly 60% of the combined company, the new threshold for some change-of-control payments. This time, senior executives waived the payments as long as they stayed in comparable positions in the combined company. CEO Mr. Hay, who had received a payment in 2000, said he wouldn't take one at all.

Last month, FPL and Constellation abandoned their deal amid worries it wouldn't get regulator approval. No one at FPL had been paid bonuses.

CRIMINAL LAW:

NASA's Auditor Probed (ORS)

By Michael Cabbage

Orlando Sentinel, November 20, 2006

A federal probe of NASA Inspector General Robert Cobb outlines allegations that he stifled investigations, mistreated department employees and maintained a close personal relationship with top officials of the agency he was supposed to independently monitor.

Preliminary findings from a 10-month investigation into Cobb's conduct have been forwarded to an oversight group, the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency. That group is expected to make a final decision before the end of the year on what, if any, action to take.

Cobb has denied any wrongdoing. However, he said during an interview with the Orlando Sentinel last week that it was inappropriate for him to publicly rebut many of the specific allegations until the process had run its course.

Investigators from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the federal agency called in to conduct the inquiry, have examined 69 allegations against Cobb, a White House appointee. The allegations came primarily from career employees in his own office.

Not all substantiated

A confidential summary of the HUD probe detailing the investigative findings was obtained by the Sentinel.

Not all of the allegations against Cobb were substantiated. However, current and former employees in Cobb's office interviewed by HUD inspectors and the Sentinel described him as a partisan manager who often failed in his responsibility to independently investigate possible wrongdoing at NASA.

Cobb vehemently disagreed with that characterization.

"I look forward to the integrity committee's review of all of the evidence and the resolution of this matter," Cobb said. "It is appalling that persons entrusted with part of the process would try to subvert it by releasing information."

Cobb sent a letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller on Friday requesting an investigation to learn how the Sentinel obtained the document and "take such action as necessary to address an obvious breach of law and investigative ethics." Those receiving copies of Cobb's letter included U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and a dozen members of Congress.

Serious questions

Some of the allegations against Cobb appear to raise serious questions.

According to the probe, the number of audit reports issued by Cobb's office plummeted from 62 in 2000 to seven during the first half of the 2006 fiscal year. An audit safety team was abolished. Investigations were derailed, witnesses said, including some related to safety and national security.

DOJ_NMG_0096024

Investigators found that Cobb lunched, drank, played golf and traveled with former NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe, another White House appointee. E-mails from Cobb showed he frequently consulted with top NASA officials on investigations, raising questions about his independence.

Witnesses told investigators Cobb also intimidated and berated some subordinates to the point of tears. During his tenure as NASA inspector general, the department's employee attrition rate has increased by more than 50 percent, according to figures in the report.

Cobb said in his letter to Mueller that the report was "replete with easily demonstrable factual errors and inaccuracies." He described the investigation as having "spun out of control."

Shoppers Back In Force After Shootout At Mall (WP)

By Eric Rich And Leef Smith

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Shoppers returned to Westfield Shoppingtown Annapolis in droves yesterday, undeterred by a gun battle that wounded three in the mall's food court the night before and sent scores of others racing for exits or diving under tables.

An 18-year-old Annapolis resident who was shot twice in the abdomen remained in a hospital under police guard, authorities said, and an off-duty U.S. Secret Service agent with whom he allegedly traded fire was recovering from a single gunshot wound.

The injuries to each man -- as well as to Tahzay L. Brown, a 16-year-old male struck in the crossfire -- were not considered life-threatening.

The violence began at 7:15 Saturday evening when the agent intervened after spotting as many as eight young men assaulting another young man, according to a preliminary police account.

The 18-year-old drew a handgun and fired, hitting the agent once in the leg, police said. The agent then drew his weapon, fired seven times and struck the 18-year-old twice in the abdomen, police said. The agent was with a family member, who was not injured.

Sara Schriver, an Anne Arundel County police spokeswoman, said it was unclear whether the bullet that hit Brown was fired by the agent or the 18-year-old.

Georgia Goslee, an attorney authorized to speak on behalf of Brown's family, described the Annapolis High School student as a victim drawn into the violence merely because the person who was being assaulted is his friend. She said the confrontation between the friend and the larger group was "spillover from an earlier incident that happened at the school . . . back in September."

Police said they are investigating whether the shooting was related to three fights at the high school Friday, during which seven students were arrested, or to fighting there in September, when nearly 20 students were arrested. Police have said those fights stemmed from "neighborhood rivalries," particularly between students from public housing complexes.

Goslee said she was unsure whether the September incident she referred to was, in fact, the fighting that led to so many arrests. Of Brown, who was treated at a hospital and released, she said: "Obviously, he's upset and shocked. He's disturbed by the entire occurrence."

In the bustling food court yesterday, shoppers and employees buzzed about the shooting. Tommy Yau said he was behind the counter at Panda Express, helping customers during a busy rush, when he spotted four or five men fighting.

Fistfights aren't uncommon in the food court, he said, but this one was close to his shop. Yau, the restaurant's manager, decided to call mall security. He had barely stepped toward the phone when shots rang out -- as many as seven within three or four seconds, he said.

"I got down," Yau recalled. "Then I heard another four or five shots."

Looking up moments later, he spotted two men on the floor, each just feet from his counter. One was sprawled near a trash can and bleeding, and the other was by a bank of pay phones near a mall exit.

Yau said the next voice he heard was that of the federal agent, who raised his badge and called out to bystanders: "I'm a police officer -- call 911!"

DOJ_NMG_0096025

Yau said mall security and law enforcement officers quickly swarmed the food court, and he later provided cups that were used to mark spent shell casings scattered on the floor.

Schriver would not identify the 18-year-old. She also would not identify the agent, referring questions to the Secret Service.

Federal authorities, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the agent has been with the Secret Service for more than five years and is assigned to the Office of Protective Operations in Washington.

"It was your typical Saturday night at the mall," Schriver said. "You had families there, juveniles getting ready to go the movies. It was definitely a terrorizing event."

Despite the incident, many shoppers appeared unbowed yesterday. The food court was jammed, and many there said they'd heard about the shooting but felt secure.

"When you think of Annapolis, you think it's safe," said Baltimore resident Courtney Katunick, 23, who was eating with her sister just feet from where the shooting occurred. "It makes you feel safe that [the Secret Service officer] would step up" to break up the fight, Katunick said. "It could have escalated into something worse."

Many business managers said that although they had feared the violence might cause holiday shoppers to avoid the mall yesterday, business was as brisk as usual.

"I didn't know what to think," said Erin Gray, assistant manager at Trade Secret, which is just paces from the food court. "It doesn't look like it damaged business."

Nathanial Weiss, an employee at Fast-Fix Jewelry and Watch Repairs, agreed. "I'm surprised, but we're really busy today," he said. "And it looks like it's just going to get busier."

Bought And Sold (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Atlanta

When Mayor Shirley Franklin recently announced that the city would be cracking down on the pimps and johns who prey on under-age prostitutes, she also disclosed publicly for the first time that she had been molested when she was a young girl.

Speaking at a gathering of reporters, local officials and civic leaders, the mayor spoke frankly about the incident, in which she was abused at the age of 10 by the father of a girlfriend. She then asked how many of the women in attendance had endured similar experiences. Several women in the room raised their hands.

One of the most tightly kept secrets in the U.S. is the extent to which children are sexually exploited, not just by child pornographers and compulsive pedophiles, but by men who are viewed by their relatives, friends and neighbors as quintessentially solid citizens.

In an interview on Friday, Ms. Franklin told me: “It seemed appropriate to reveal my story in that setting, because what we were trying to do is demonstrate that this can happen to anyone. Not only can it happen; it does happen to a lot of children.”

Atlanta has become a major hub of commercial sex in the U.S. It’s a full-fledged sex-tourism destination, with thousands of strippers, prostitutes and other sex workers accommodating an endless stream of johns from around the country. Under-age girls (some as young as 10 and 11) are a significant part of that trade. Many of them were already carrying the scars of sexual molestation when they got into prostitution.

A study of the commercial sexual exploitation of girls in Atlanta, released a year ago by the Atlanta Women’s Agenda, an advisory group formed at the mayor’s request, said:

“Atlanta, being a convention and sports event center, has a thriving ‘adult entertainment’ industry: strip clubs, lingerie and sex shops, escort services, massage parlors. At the same time, Atlanta generates its own lost battalions of emotionally and physically abandoned children and is a magnet for such children from outlying areas. These children are vulnerable to the pimps and their recruiters, but the pimp would have no interest in the children if there were no demand.”

Ms. Franklin, who is 61, is trying to jump-start a cultural change that will expand awareness of the widespread sexual exploitation of children in Atlanta and foster an attitude throughout the city that it is not to be tolerated.

It is beyond unusual for a mayor, especially the mayor of a city that depends as heavily on tourism as Atlanta, to shine a spotlight on a problem as repellent as child prostitution. I asked the mayor why she went ahead with such a high-profile campaign, which includes a "Dear John" initiative that has flooded the city with posters and public service announcements declaring that the men who "buy sex from our kids" will no longer be tolerated.

"We take the position in my administration that the best way to solve a problem is to face the facts," she said, adding: "We know the problem is here. It's happening on our watch. It's unacceptable behavior, and we are not going to stand for it. So look for us to do everything in our power to change it."

It won't be easy. Law enforcement agencies have a notoriously poor record when it comes to prosecuting and putting away the pimps, traffickers and johns in the child sex trade. And there are very few resources, financial and otherwise, to help the kids once they are identified.

The mayor acknowledged the heavy lift that will be required: "Normally, by the time girls become prostitutes, there are a lot of other experiences that they've had, and you can't turn that around with a pat on the back and a new set of clothes. There's a great deal of psychological damage. They've lost trust in adults. They've lost self-confidence. Many of them have lost the will to do anything differently. They're demoralized.

"So we're just getting started. And we'll be asking for a lot of help."

The last time I was in Atlanta, about a month ago, I rode with the police as, among other things, they looked for a 15-year-old girl who had become a prostitute and was being used by her pimp to recruit other young girls. I remember looking at a circular with a picture of the child. She had the saddest expression on her face.

Over the weekend I checked with the cops to see if they had found her. "We never did," said Lt. Keith Meadows, who heads the city's vice unit. "We have reason to believe that she might have been trafficked out of the state."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Years Later, Lessons From Newark Riots To Be Learned (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, November 20, 2006

NEWARK — Moise Abraham heard the bullets before he saw what they had done. It was July 12, 1967, the first night of the deadly Newark riots that put a spotlight on racial unrest in the nation's decaying urban centers. His mother had walked down the block, promising she would soon be back.

"Then I heard something hit the parking sign. It said 'Bing,' " remembers Abraham, then two weeks shy of his 17th birthday. "A few seconds later, my mother is coming up the street, but I noticed she was walking with a limp, so I ran to her and I grabbed her. … When we got to the front porch, she collapsed."

The next day, Rosa Lee Abraham died from a gunshot wound her son believes was fired by a police officer, although no official determination was made.

Moise Abraham has struggled emotionally ever since. Almost as painful, Abraham says, is the lack of acknowledgment for what the riots wrought.

"It is personal, but it is a pain that we all felt," says Abraham, 56, who yearns for a citywide memorial service for the 26 who died in the riots. "Even if they had done it once every 20 years, I would have appreciated that. But it's just total silence. … It seems that for some reason, Newark has forgotten."

Now, there is an effort to remember. In the first major exhibit documenting the 1967 Newark riots, the New Jersey Historical Society is assembling a retrospective that is scheduled to open by next summer, the 40th anniversary of the unrest.

Tentatively titled "What's Going On," the exhibit will use oral histories, text and artifacts to examine the six days of rioting in Newark. It also will look at the violence that engulfed Detroit 11 days later and the 1965 riots in Los Angeles' Watts district.

These and other riots in scores of cities in the late 1960s — many triggered by incidents involving police — focused attention on the lack of economic opportunity in predominantly poor, black neighborhoods. A presidential commission studying the causes concluded in 1968 that the nation was moving toward "two societies, one black, one white, separate and unequal."

"We want to move beyond Newark and show the parallels between what happened in those summers of the 1960s," says Max Herman, an assistant professor of sociology at Rutgers University in New Jersey who has conducted many of the interviews for the project. "The frustration was building for several decades."

The exhibit will stay in Newark for nearly a year. Organizers then plan to take it to Los Angeles and Detroit, where they will work with local museums. The University of Baltimore also is planning a 40th anniversary exhibit on the 1968 riots in that city that followed the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. Sociologists say such exhibits are critical in helping the nation understand the legacy of that turbulent time.

"The late 1960s is a period we can't revisit enough," says Clement Price, director of the Rutgers Institute on Ethnicity, Culture and the Modern Experience. "The riots had an impact on what might be called the decline of our cities and the rise of suburbs, and in that transformation is a racial transformation. The riots impacted American politics. They pretty much ended the civil rights movement. They turned white ethnics against black ethnics."

Newark has gradually rebounded in the last decade, replacing high-rise housing projects with town homes, opening a renowned performing arts center, and this year electing a charismatic new mayor, Cory Booker.

Yet for many outsiders, the 1967 riots indelibly defined Newark.

They were sparked by the police arrest and beating of a black cab driver, stoking the anger many African-Americans felt about segregated housing, joblessness and alleged police harassment. While the middle class and businesses had been leaving the city for decades, the abandonment quickened after the riots, making Newark a symbol of urban decline and decay.

"It crippled the city," says Ann Marie Penn, 56, who has wrestled with depression since her 17-year-old brother was shot to death during the riots.

In Newark, as in many other riot-scarred cities, there has been a reluctance to remember.

"All American cities have had to struggle to regain their footing after that time, and people don't want to revisit that," says Linda Caldwell Epps, president of the New Jersey Historical Society. "It's an unhappy part of our history."

A marker resembling a headstone stands at the epicenter of the Newark riots along Springfield Avenue, naming the 26 who died. But it is easy to miss. A local group holds annual remembrances at the site, but the crowds number no more than a few dozen.

The historical society, whose exhibit will cost up to $250,000, has struggled to raise funding. Some law enforcement officers and activists from that era have been reluctant to give interviews.

"There was a lot of dissension at the time, and it was not difficult to stir up resentment against authority," says Kenneth Melchior, 90, the Newark police inspector sent to the 4th Precinct to quell tensions the first night of the riots.

Melchior made sure the injured cab driver was sent to the hospital, but he says he does not believe it was a case of police brutality. "The man was belligerent," he says. "If police officers arrive on a scene … and they're met with resistance, they have to overcome that resistance, and if somebody gets injured, then immediately somebody will declare police brutality."

Nearly 80 people have shared their stories of being caught in the violence of 1967. Among them are the now-grown children whose mother was shot as she moved them out of harm's way and the police detective's daughter whose father was killed and whose mother later committed suicide.

Craig Wilson remembers that his father's dry goods store on Springfield Avenue was spared during the riots. But in the end, neither the business nor his father survived.

"He died three months later," says Wilson, 62, who believes the difficulty his father had after the riots contributed to his fatal heart attack. "You went from having a business to you couldn't pay the rent."

Wilson, now a dentist in neighboring Irvington, was a 23-year-old social worker. He was on his way to see a client when rocks shattered the rear window of his 1962 Plymouth Valiant. "Nobody won, everybody lost," he says. "The people who lived in the neighborhood, the people who worked in the neighborhood. … It was sort of like dropping a bomb."

Lawrence Hamm has a different perspective.

Since the 1980s, Hamm's group, The People's Organization for Progress, has been the only group to hold an annual observance.

DOJ_NMG_0096028

"The rebellion gave rise to the political movement, gave rise to the first black mayor in Newark, the first majority black City Council," Hamm says. "The rebellion pushed forward people's social consciousness."

Detroit, whose 1967 riots were the worst in modern U.S. history until the 1992 Los Angeles riots left 58 people dead, has had few retrospectives on those events, says Mike Smith, director of the Walter Reuther Library at Wayne State University in Detroit.

"Would I love to see the public become more deeply aware of the factors causing the riot and the aftermath of it? Yes, indeed I would," Smith says. "I think if we could reach some people, we'd have better race relations in this city."

In Baltimore, 60 students are interviewing residents for an exhibit to be titled " '68, Riots and Rebirth." "The time is right to do it because there is enough historical distance between the events and the current day," says Jessica Elfenbein, associate professor of history and community studies at the University of Baltimore.

For Abraham, though, the calendar sometimes seems stuck on July 12, 1967.

"I have a house, I have a brand new car," says Abraham, who has been in and out of counseling since his mother's death. "On the outside it looks good, but I've been fighting this battle for almost 40 years."

He is happy about the exhibit that will tell his mother's story.

"It's a good thing," he says. "I think it should be remembered throughout the history books, in whatever ways are possible."

National 'nurse-in' Set To Protest Treatment Of Mom (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 20, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. — A national "nurse-in" will be held Tuesday to protest the treatment of a passenger who was kicked off a plane for refusing to cover herself while breast-feeding her baby.

A similar protest, in which mothers sat on the floor near the Delta Airlines counter, breast-fed their babies and held signs, took place at the Burlington International Airport last week.

Chelsea Clark, 31, of Fairfax, said she is using Web message boards to organize a national protest at Delta counters across the country. What happened to Emily Gillette, 27, of Santa Fe, N.M., has prompted an "out-swell of outrage," Clark said.

"This is for all of the nursing mothers in the country who felt that way," Clark said. "This is our opportunity to make a statement."

Freedom Airlines, a regional airline for Delta, said it has disciplined the flight attendant who ordered Gillette off the plane when she declined to cover up with a blanket. Spokesman Paul Skellon said the attendant did not meet company expectations when Gillette was told to leave the plane.

A spokesman for the airline said the pilot apologized and asked Gillette and her family to get back on the plane, but Gillette said that never happened.

"I would have jumped at the opportunity," she said.

On Oct. 13 Gillette was sitting aboard a plane, which was three hours late in taking off, when she began to breast-feed her 22-month-old daughter. She says a flight attendant handed her a blanket and told her to cover up, which Gillette declined to do.

The attendant said Gillette was offending her and she was removed from the plane.

Delta did provide ground transportation and a hotel before rebooking the family on a flight with a different airline the following day.

Gillette filed a complaint with the Vermont Human Rights Commission because breast-feeding in a public place is protected under state law.

Kerry: 'Botched' War Joke Won't Hurt Me (AP-Y)

By Hope Yen

AP, November 20, 2006

Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry insisted on Sunday his "botched joke" about President Bush's Iraq policy would not undermine a possible White House campaign in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0096029

"Not in the least," Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, said when asked if the furor over his comment had caused him to reconsider a 2008 race. "The parlor game of who's up, who's down, today or tomorrow, if I listened to that stuff, I would never have won the nomination."

One of the GOP politicians mentioned in a crowded field for the White House, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, said he would not make a decision until September — a relatively late date in the campaign cycle — to focus in the private sector on trade policies.

"We have lots of time for personal ambition," the Georgia Republican said. "And I think an awful lot of this early energy is wasted, and we ought to be focusing on, you know, how are you going to compete with China and India, how are you going to solve the problem in Iraq?"

Gingrich said Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom have set up presidential exploratory committees, were the likely GOP front-runners. But Gingrich said voters are yearning for a clearer conservative voice.

"I think Mitt Romney has an opportunity to fill that," Gingrich said, referring to the outgoing Massachusetts governor.

McCain said Giuliani was an "American hero" for his leadership in New York following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But McCain called himself the best presidential candidate based on a "record of being a conservative Republican, of knowledge on national security and defense issues."

McCain, who supports a ban on abortion except in cases of rape, incest and to save a mother's life, said he doubted a constitutional amendment could pass but that one would not be needed because "it's very likely or possible that the Supreme Court should — could — overturn Roe v. Wade."

The high court is deciding this term whether to uphold a 2003 federal law banning the procedure opponents call "partial-birth" abortion. It is a case that conservatives hope could be used to reverse the landmark 1973 decision that made abortion a constitutional right.

At least two conservatives, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, have called on Roe to be overturned. Legal analysts have said if the court issues an anti-abortion ruling, justices would be more likely to impose restrictions rather than abolish the right.

"I'm a federalist," McCain said. "Just as I believe that the issue of gay marriage should be decided by the states, so do I believe that we would be better off by having Roe v. Wade return to the states. And I don't believe the Supreme Court should be legislating in the way that they did on Roe v. Wade."

McCain called the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy toward gays "very effective." He said he opposed gay marriage, but as to civil unions, "people ought to be able to enter into contracts, exchange powers of attorney, other ways that people who have relationship can enter into."

Meanwhile, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 Democratic nominee for vice president, said Illinois Sen. Barack Obama should get into the race.

"I hope he runs. I think he should run," Edwards told The Associated Press. "This is such an important job that I would urge anybody who can make a serious contribution to the campaign and the dialogue — either in our party or the other party — to run.

Edwards isn't yet willing to commit to another run for president. He said whether Obama — or any other candidate — enters the race will have no bearing on his decision to make a second run for president. Edwards sought his party's nomination for the White House in 2004.

Kerry said he would decide early next year whether to run for president.

Shortly before the Nov. 7 elections that brought Democrats back into power in the House and Senate, Kerry retreated from public view following his remark to a college audience that young people might get "stuck in Iraq" if they do not study hard and do their homework.

"This is over. This was a misstatement. All of us make them in life. You wish you could have it back, but you can't," the senator said Sunday.

Kerry said Sunday he had made the decision to keep a low profile after the White House attacked the joke as insulting to U.S. troops and several Democrats called the comment a needless distraction before the pivotal congressional elections.

DOJ_NMG_0096030

"Since we had very close races, I made the decision to make certain that I didn't distract. The results speak for themselves," he said.

On running in 2008, Kerry said he had not yet made a decision whether to set up an exploratory committee.

"Right now, my focus will be what happened on election day," he said, citing a need to work toward solutions on Iraq, energy independence and health care. "The American people are waiting for us to lift up an enormous challenge."

Both Kerry and Gingrich appeared on "Fox News Sunday." McCain was on "This Week" on ABC.

Romney Pushes Vote On Same-Sex Marriage (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 19 (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts said on Sunday that he would ask the state's highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators did not address the issue.

Mr. Romney, a Republican, said he would file a request this week for a justice of the Supreme Judicial Court to direct the secretary of state to place the question on the ballot if lawmakers do not vote on the issue on Jan. 2, the final day of the session.

The governor, an opponent of same-sex marriage who decided not to seek re-election as he considers running for president, made his announcement to the cheers of same-sex-marriage opponents at a rally on the Statehouse steps. Supporters of same-sex marriage staged a protest across the street.

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled in November 2003 that same-sex marriages were legal. Since then, more than 8,000 same-sex couples have married in the state.

More than 170,000 people have signed a petition in support of the ballot question, which would define marriage as between a man and a woman. Mr. Romney has criticized lawmakers since they refused this month to take up the question during a joint session. They voted instead to recess until Jan. 2, all but killing the measure.

"A decision not to vote is a decision to usurp the Constitution, to abandon democracy and substitute a form of what this nation's founders called tyranny, that is, the imposition of the will of those in power, on the people," Mr. Romney said. "The issue now before us is not whether same-sex couples should marry. The issue before us today is whether 109 legislators will follow the Constitution."

Because the legislature did not adjourn but went into recess, Mr. Romney has no legal authority to call lawmakers back into session.

Supporters of same-sex marriage have defended the lawmakers' procedural move.

"One of the tenets of the Constitution is that you do not put the rights of a minority up for a popularity contest," said Mark Solomon, campaign director of Mass Equality, a group that supports same-sex marriage. "It is one of the very principles this country was founded upon."

Romney Wants Gay-Marriage Ban On Mass. Ballot (WP)

By David Weber

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 19 -- Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) said Sunday that he will ask the state's highest court this week to order a ballot question on same-sex marriage if legislators fail to vote on the matter when they reconvene in January.

Romney said he will ask a justice of the state's Supreme Judicial Court to direct the secretary of state to place the question on the ballot if lawmakers do not vote directly on the question Jan. 2, the final day of the current session. Romney's term as governor expires Jan. 4.

The legislature is in recess and, because it did not adjourn, Romney has no legal authority to call legislators back into session.

Romney, an opponent of same-sex marriage, made his announcement to the cheers of hundreds of same-sex-marriage opponents at a rally on the Statehouse steps. A counter-protest was held across the street.

DOJ_NMG_0096031

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled in November 2003 that same-sex marriages are legal. Since then, more than 8,000 gay couples have tied the knot in the state.

More than 170,000 people had signed a petition in support of the ballot question, which would define marriage as between a man and a woman.

Romney has criticized lawmakers since they refused earlier this month to take up the question during a joint session, voting instead to recess, all but killing the measure.

"A decision not to vote is a decision to usurp the Constitution, to abandon democracy and substitute a form of what this nation's founders called tyranny, that is, the imposition of the will of those in power, on the people," Romney said earlier. "The issue now before us is not whether same-sex couples should marry. The issue before us today is whether 109 legislators will follow the Constitution."

Supporters of same-sex marriage defended lawmakers' procedural move.

"One of the tenets of the Constitution is that you do not put the rights of a minority up for a popularity contest," said Marc Solomon, campaign director for Mass Equality, which supports same-sex marriage. "It is one of the very principles this country was founded upon."

Messages seeking comment from legislative leaders were not immediately returned Sunday.

The legislature grappled with various efforts to ban same-sex marriages before the high court ruling in 2003. Lawmakers refused to vote on a citizens' initiative in 2002, and two years later they voted down their own proposed amendment that would have banned same-sex marriage and legalized civil unions.

Renewed War Over "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

With the Democrats in control of Congress, some activists are hoping they'll add a controversial issue to their to-do list: revisiting the "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military. Gay servicemembers have sought a policy change for years. Now, says Steve Ralls, spokesman for the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, gay vets hope they might make some progress at a time when the military can't afford to turn away the willing and able. Last year the Pentagon discharged 742 service members for homosexuality, according to SLDN.

But making a change won't be easy: gay-rights advocates have seen a troubling signal from the Pentagon. Massachusetts Rep. Martin Meehan and the American Psychiatric Association complained last June when they learned the military's disability policy classified homosexuality as a mental disorder—something the APA stopped doing in 1973. Then the Pentagon quietly reclassified it in July. Last week Meehan and the APA complained once more: homosexuality has now been grouped with other "conditions, circumstances and defects" like bed-wetting, repeated venereal-disease infections and obesity. The reclassification is "even worse," says Aaron Belkin, who studies gays in the military at the University of California, Santa Barbara. "Now [homosexuality] is explicitly deemed to be a defect." Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith says the Defense Department does "not think homosexuality is a mental illness" and says the classification could be re-examined.

The gay question has long been a political quagmire. Since Bill Clinton waded into the controversy in 1993, more than two dozen former senior military officers have denounced "don't ask," including Gen. Wesley Clark and Gen. Claudia Kennedy. "We have a much friendlier environment now," says Ralls, citing a more accepting attitude by the "Will & Grace" generation. Gay British soldiers serve alongside Americans in Iraq and Afghanistan, sharing quarters. In Congress, Meehan has already introduced the Military Readiness Enhancement Act to replace "don't ask" with a nondiscrimination policy. He has 122 bipartisan cosponsors and hopes for hearings on the topic. Though GOP Rep. Duncan Hunter—a backer of "don't ask"—is on his way out as House Armed Services chair, his Democratic replacement, Rep. Ike Skelton, supports the current policy, too. And as the Pentagon's recent reclassification showed, there is still a long war ahead.

Freeport Buys Phelps For $26bn (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0096032

By James Politi In New York

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Freeport-McMoRan on Sunday night agreed to buy Phelps Dodge for $25.9bn (£13.7bn) in cash and stock to become the world's largest publicly traded copper company with mines stretching from Indonesia to Chile.

The takeover is the latest in a wave of consolidation that has swept through the global mining industry as commodity prices soared because of high demand, particularly from China.

Amid the boom, both Freeport and Phelps were faced with key strategic challenges that they decided to address by combining the two companies. Freeport has been seeking ways to diversify away from its main Grasberg mine, which is based in a remote part of Indonesian Papua and has been criticised for containing too much political risk.

Phelps, on the other hand, has been a takeover target since its twin bid for Canadian mining groups Inco and Falconbridge fell apart in September.

Under the terms of the deal, Phelps shareholders will receive $126.46 per share – or a 33 per cent premium to the company's market value on Friday. About 70 per cent of the transaction value, or $18bn, will be in cash, with the rest in shares, meaning Phelps investors will end up owning 38 per cent of the combined group.

In an interview last night, Richard Adkerson, the chief executive of Freeport who will run the combined group, said the deal made sense in a wide range of scenarios for the copper price.

He added that the greater size would make his company much stronger: "Scale is important because it will allow us to have better access to resources, suppliers and project opportunities in a way that is limited for smaller companies."

Although the deal is structured as a takeover by Freeport, the company's headquarters will move from New Orleans to Phelps' home of Phoenix, Arizona. Steve Whisler, chief executive of Phelps, will retire.

The new Freeport will become one of the most powerful forces in global mining, generating cashflow of about $6.5bn from the production of about 3.1bn pounds of copper, 1.7m ounces of gold, and 69m pounds of molybdenum. As well as Freeport's Grasberg mine, the combined group will own Phelps operations in North and South America and control the Tenke Fungurume copper-cobalt project in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The deal is the latest in a wave of transactions in the global mining industry. In recent months, Brazil's Companhia Vale do Rio Doce agreed to take over Inco, while Falconbridge was acquired by Xstrata.

Freeport was advised by bankers at JPMorgan and Merrill Lynch and lawyers at Davis Polk and Jones Walker. Phelps was advised by Citigroup, Morgan Stanley and Debevoise.

Freeport Sets Big Bet On Metals With Phelps Deal (WSJ)

By Mark Heinzl And Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc.'s $25.9 billion cash-and-stock agreement to acquire rival copper producer Phelps Dodge Corp. marks a major long-term bet that metals prices will remain strong.

Freeport said it pursued the deal to gain the scale it needs to compete among other miners for equipment and prospects amid increased Chinese demand for commodities and high prices. But the deal comes after copper has fallen from loftier levels, leading to some industry concerns of a potential cyclical downturn.

The combination -- resulting in what would be North America's largest copper producer -- continues the recent streak of big-ticket mining deals, as the industry scrambles to secure new production and mine developments.

Freeport, of New Orleans, will offer $88 in cash and 0.67 share for each Phelps Dodge share. The offer is valued at $126.46 per share at Friday's closing prices, marking a sizable premium over Phelps Dodge's share price of $95.02 reached at 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Freeport will finance the deal's cash portion, about $18 billion, with debt. Though Phelps Dodge is roughly twice the size of Freeport in terms of market value and sales, its shareholders will control 38% of the combined company.

Since reaching an all-time high in May, copper prices have dropped more than 20%, trading at about $3.08 a pound Friday on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Copper-market players have pointed to such factors as increasing Chinese production and slackening demand, and a slower U.S. economy and housing market. Concerns that copper supplies could fall short of demand have been offset by a growing sense that supplies appear sufficient. Costs, meanwhile, have climbed sharply in recent years amid high energy prices and tight equipment and labor markets.

Still, the current price remains high by historical standards and provides strong earnings and cash flows to many mining companies. Most copper mines in operation today were built with much lower prices in mind.

The Phelps Dodge acquisition will be immediately accretive to Freeport's earnings, the company said, and it will seek to pay down the incurred debt as quickly as possible from the cash flows of the combined company.

In an interview, Freeport President and Chief Executive Officer Richard Adkerson and Phelps Dodge Chairman and Chief Executive Steven Whisler said they have for years discussed the advantages of combining the companies.

Mr. Adkerson -- who would remain chief executive -- said the acquisition allows Freeport to branch out. It operates the highly profitable Grasberg copper and gold mine in Indonesia. Phelps Dodge, based in Phoenix, has geographically diverse mining operations in North America and South America and development projects such as a copper mine in Congo that stand to boost the combined companies' metal production by about 25% over the next three years.

The combination will help Freeport with the industry's labor and equipment problems, Mr. Adkerson said. "The larger and bigger players are in better position to have access to those resources," he said. "We will now be a global company in scale."

He argued copper prices are likely to remain strong because of economic development in China and other fast-growing countries and the lack of large new mines. Grades of existing mines, meanwhile, are dropping while some big mines are being quickly depleted, he said. Copper is used in industrial and construction applications from pipes to electronics and telecommunications.

Mining companies on the hunt for new deposits are being forced to do business in less politically stable nations. Indonesia has never received an investment grade from lenders. Freeport believes it can bring its Indonesia experience to bear in Congo, where Phelps Dodge has struggled to start its long-delayed Tenke Fungurume copper mine. "It looks to be a world-class development opportunity," Mr. Adkerson said. Freeport's role in Indonesia has been criticized by political activists and environmental groups; the company has defended its conduct.

Speculation that Phelps Dodge would become a takeover target has swirled since the company lost out on a bid to acquire Inco Ltd. in a protracted global battle for control of the big Canadian nickel and copper producer. Phelps Dodge's shares reached their 52-week high of $103.90 earlier this month. Mr. Whisler declined to comment on whether other companies sought to acquire Phelps Dodge. Some major shareholders have pushed for a sale or other measures to boost its stock.

For the first nine months of this year, Phelps Dodge reported net income of $1.69 billion on sales of $8.68 billion, while Freeport reported net income of $1.01 billion on sales of $4.15 billion.

James R. Moffett, chairman of Freeport, will be chairman. Mr. Whisler will retire when the deal is completed.

Freeport is being advised by J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. and Merrill Lynch & Co., with legal advice from Davis Polk & Wardwell and Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrere & Denegre LLP. Phelps Dodge is being advised by Citigroup Inc. and Morgan Stanley & Co., with legal counsel from Debevoise & Plimpton LLP.

Smaller Rival In Agreement To Acquire Copper Giant (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Ian Austen

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Phelps Dodge, the world's second-largest copper producer, will be acquired by Freeport-McMoRan Copper and Gold, a smaller rival that has been embroiled in environmental and human rights controversies, in a cash and stock deal worth $25.9 billion, the companies said yesterday.

The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor.

"We have been watching the industry consolidation, fewer companies, larger companies, but we had not been playing a role in it," Freeport-McMoRan's president and chief executive, Richard C. Adkerson, said. "Now Freeport is a larger company that has a larger platform."

The chairman and chief executive of Phelps Dodge, J. Steven Whisler, said yesterday that the two companies have talked about a possible merger for about a decade. The premium of about 33 percent being offered by Freeport-McMoRan, Mr. Whisler said, was a decisive factor in Phelps Dodge's decision to end its 172-year history as an independent company.

The boards of both companies have approved the transaction. Under its terms, stockholders in Phelps Dodge will receive $88 a share in cash plus 0.67 of a Freeport-McMoRan share. Based on Friday's closing, the deal is offering Phelps Dodge shareholders a 33 percent premium.

Freeport-McMoRan, which has a market capitalization of $11.3 billion compared with Phelps Dodge's value of $19.4 billion, will finance the transactions by borrowing about $17.5 billion. Freeport said it expected the deal would be accretive to the combined company's earnings per share and cash flow immediately.

To a considerable extent, Phelps-Dodge now finds itself being acquired because of its failure earlier this year to bulk up with an acquisition of Inco, the large Toronto-based nickel miner.

Inco had approached Phelps Dodge in an attempt to help it with its bid for another Canadian nickel miner, Falconbridge. In exchange for financing for that transaction, Inco's board agreed to be acquired by Phelps Dodge in a deal cash and stock worth about $17 billion.

Ultimately, however, the three-way transaction fell apart. Phelps Dodge walked away from its Inco offer after Xstrata of Switzerland emerged as the winning bidder for Falconbridge. Companhia Vale do Rio Doce of Brazil acquired Inco after offering about $17 billion in cash.

Not only did the Phelps Dodge bid fail to impress Inco's shareholders, it was also criticized by some of the Phoenix-based company's own shareholders largely because it would have increased the company's debt levels from almost nothing to about $24 billion. Some critics said at the time that they would prefer Phelps Dodge to sell itself rather than become larger through acquisitions, a request that has now apparently been granted.

Mr. Whisler will retire when the Freeport-McMoRan takeover is completed. The resulting company, which will retain Freeport-McMoRan name but move its head office from New Orleans to Phoenix, will be led by Mr. Adkerson and retain James R. Moffett, of Freeport-McMoRan, as chairman.

While Phelps Dodge has large mines in United States, Central and South America as well as Africa, Freeport-McMoRan's only significant asset is a mine in Indonesia.

Earlier this year, riots in the Indonesian province of Papua were directed at Freeport-McMoRan. In December 2005, The New York Times reported that Freeport had given more financial support to the Indonesian Army and police in Papua than the company had publicly reported, in some cases individual commanders received tens of thousands of dollars from the company.

Mr. Adkerson said the company was still responding to requests from regulators about the timing and level of disclosure to shareholders about those payments.

The Indonesian mine's operations have also come under criticism for their environmental practices. Mr. Adkerson said that Freeport-McMoRan now had its environmental measures assessed and tracked by independent auditors.

"We operate in an unusual place," he said. "Our mine is in a remarkable physical setting."

Freeport-McMoRan was advised in the deal by J. P. Morgan Securities and Merrill Lynch while legal advisers were Davis Polk & Wardwell and Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre. Citigroup Corporate and Investment Banking and Morgan Stanley & Company worked with Phelps Dodge, and its legal counsel was Debevoise & Plimpton.

Copper Firms To Merge In $26 Billion Takeover (BLOOM)

By Vivek Shankar And Tan Hwee Ann

Bloomberg News, November 20, 2006

Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. has agreed to buy Phelps Dodge Corp. for $25.9 billion in cash and stock to form the world's largest publicly traded copper company.

DOJ_NMG_0096035

Phelps Dodge stockholders will get $126.46 a share, or $88 in cash and 0.67 Freeport share, New Orleans-based Freeport-McMoRan said in a statement yesterday.

That is 33 percent more than Phoenix-based Phelps Dodge's closing price Friday.

Global mining takeovers, fueled by record profits and prices of metals such as copper and zinc, more than doubled this year, to $113.7 billion, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News.

The Freeport transaction will be the largest mining-industry takeover deal this year.

"With metal prices fueling strong cash flows, and the expectation by companies that prices will stay stronger for longer, more miners would want to shore up their backdoor or acquire to add value," said Tim Barker at BT Financial Group, which manages $54 billion of assets, including mining stocks. "It looks like a pretty strong price for the shareholders of Phelps Dodge."

Freeport has secured financing from J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Merrill Lynch & Co., and the cash portion of the bid is about 70 percent of the total bid, it said.

This year, Freeport has paid $500 million of debt early, spent $313 million on dividend payments and bought back $80 million in shares.

Freeport shareholders will "benefit from . . . lower cost of capital, and improved geographic and asset diversification," Freeport President and Chief Executive Officer Richard C. Adkerson said in the statement.

Blackstone In Talks To Buy Equity In $36bn Deal (FT)

By James Politi In New York

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Blackstone was on Sunday night in advanced discussions to seal the biggest private equity deal on record as the board of Equity Office Properties, the US commercial real estate company founded by Sam Zell, met to vote on a takeover worth $36bn including debt.

Although the outcome of the meeting remained unclear, the talks will highlight the growing audacity of cash-rich, buy-out firms, which are taking over some of the biggest US companies in a range of industries.

Last week Thomas H. Lee Partners, Bain Capital and a group of banks agreed to buy Clear Channel Communications, the biggest chain of US radio stations. Harrah's Entertainment, the US casino giant, has for weeks been in talks to be taken over by Apollo Management and Texas Pacific, although it remained unclear on Sunday night if that would result in an agreement.

In July, HCA, the biggest US hospital chain, agreed to be taken private by a consortium including Bain Capital, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, and Merrill Lynch for about $33bn. That agreement broke the record for the biggest private equity deal, sealed in 1989 when KKR bought RJR Nabisco, the food and tobacco conglomerate.

But the huge amounts of money flooding into private equity and the availability of cheap debt to finance acquisitions have led to expectations that the HCA deal size would soon be trumped.

According to people familiar with the matter, Blackstone, led by Steve Schwarzman, has offered to pay about $20bn in cash for Equity Office, which is based in Chicago and is the biggest publicly traded owner of office buildings in the US.

Blackstone would be taking on $16bn of the company's debt if a deal were signed. Blackstone and Equity Office declined to comment.

An acquisition of Equity Office by Blackstone would represent the private equity group's latest big bet on the health of the commercial property markets in the US, where prices have risen significantly in recent years, leading to fears of a bubble.

Blackstone already began targeting the commercial property this year when it agreed to take over CarrAmerica for $5.6bn and Trizec Properties for $8.9bn. Blackstone is also a big investor in hotels.

Shares in Equity Office, established three decades ago by Sam Zell, the current chairman and Chicago real estate magnate, were trading at $44.72 on Friday. The current stock price gives Equity Office a market capitalisation of $15.72bn and implies that Blackstone's offer is at a 27 per cent premium to its current market value.

Blackstone Is Set To Announce Takeover Plan For Equity Office (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096036

Joining an unprecedented rush to remove corporations from the public markets, the real estate arm of private-equity firm The Blackstone Group is set to announce a $20 billion takeover plan for Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. office-building owner and manager, people familiar with the matter said.

If completed, the deal would become the largest such "take private" deal in history -- and the largest real-estate deal in history -- when factoring in Equity Office's existing $16 billion in debt. It's a record that has already been broken this year, and could be broken again by year-end, as private-equity firms train hundreds of billions of dollars of capital on once untouchable names of the stock-market firmament.

If the deal is ratified later tonight, Blackstone is expected to pay about $48.50 for each share of Equity Office, say the people familiar with the matter, representing about a 10% premium to Chicago-based Equity Office's stock price on Friday, of $44.72. Equity Office's management, including its founder and public face, Sam Zell, are not expected to be a part of the buyout group, the people added.

Blackstone Acquiring Trust In Richest Buyout (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Terry Pristin

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The Blackstone Group, a private investment firm, said yesterday that it had agreed to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office-building owner and manager, for about $36 billion.

The deal marks the largest leveraged buyout in history, eclipsing the $33 billion paid earlier this year for H.C.A., the hospital chain, and it illustrates how private equity firms continue to gobble up corporate America. Under the transaction, Equity Office will go from being a publicly held company to a private one. Blackstone will pay $20 billion and assume $16 billion in debt.

Equity Office, with some 590 buildings and over 105 million square feet of office space in major metropolitan markets, was created in 1976 by Sam Zell, a real estate tycoon who built the business through dozens of acquisitions that were worth, in aggregate, more than $17 billion. Last year, Equity Office acquired the Verizon Building on Sixth Avenue in Manhattan for $515 million.

Matthew L. Ostrower, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, called the proposed deal "a ground-breaking transaction for the real estate world in general and an earthquake for the REIT industry."

Mr. Ostrower said that if a company the size of Equity Office chose not to remain public, "now every public company out there is going to have to some degree examine their capitalization, whether being public makes sense."

The deal will make Blackstone, which was founded in 1985 by Peter G. Peterson and Stephen A. Schwarzman, one of the nation's largest owners of real estate.

"We believe that the skills and strengths of Equity Office will greatly enhance our existing office platform," Jonathan D. Gray, senior managing director of Blackstone, said in a statement.

For Mr. Zell, one of richest men in America and the owner of more real estate than Donald J. Trump, the sale is an opportunity to cash out of part of the empire he built while working from his office in the old Daily News Building in Chicago. But the sale by Mr. Zell, who made his first millions in the 1970's buying distressed real estate, may also signal that he believes the market may have peaked.

Just last month, Ross L. Smotrich, an analysts at Bear Stearns, wrote in a note to investors: "REIT's have outperformed the broader market in each of the past seven years, putting valuations at the high end of historical ranges."

But in an upbeat report issued last week, Green Street Advisors, a research company, said that office rents, which have increased 8 percent over the past year, are likely to continue to rise next year. REIT's usually own and operate income-producing real estate.

Private equity firms are vying to hold the crown of having led the biggest buyout in history, and, with this deal, Blackstone will be able to do so at least for now. Blackstone will move ahead of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, which led the H.C.A. sale. Kohlberg Kravis also held the prior record with its 1989 takeover of RJR Nabisco, a deal that came to define an era when it was chronicled in the book "Barbarians at the Gate."

The transaction comes amid a private equity frenzy for the next big leveraged buyout. Last week, Clear Channel was acquired for about $26 billion by a team of private equity firms. Other deals, like the $22 billion purchase of the gas pipeline company Kinder Morgan or the sale of Freescale Semiconductor for $17.6 billion, have redefined the size and scope of leveraged buyouts. Harrah's, the big casino company, is currently in negotiations to be taken over by another group of private equity firms.

For many years, it was Equity Office that bought up other companies, but the company's performance in recent years has cast doubt on Mr. Zell's longtime credo that "bigger is better." In 2000, as the dot-com industry was about slide, Equity Office acquired a large portfolio of buildings in the Silicon Valley and was later forced to sell them at a loss.

In recent years, Equity Office has reduced its holdings in weaker markets like Dallas, Houston and New Orleans and has tried to establish a bigger presence in stronger markets like New York and Washington. In 2005, the company sold $2.7 billion in assets.

Blackstone, meanwhile, has been the biggest acquirer of large buildings over the last five years. It has bought interests in $32 billion worth of property, 50 percent more than next largest buyer, said Robert M. White Jr., president of Real Capital Analytics, a New York research company.

This year alone, Blackstone has bought $20 billion worth of real estate, or 7 percent of all acquisitions. It has been involved in more REIT buyouts and mergers than any other company.

Blackstone began buying office REIT's only this year, first by paying $5.6 billion for CarrAmerica Realty Corporation, which had interests in 285 buildings, mainly in California and Washington, D.C. In a deal that closed last month, Blackstone teamed with Brookfield Properties, a REIT, to buy Trizec Properties, the owner of 61 office buildings, including the W.R. Grace Building in Manhattan.

Under the latest deal, Blackstone would pay $48.50 a share for Equity Office, representing an 8.5 percent premium to its closing price on Friday of $44.72.

Real Estate Giant To Go Private In $36 Billion Deal (BLOOM)

By Dana Cimilluca And Brian Louis

Bloomberg News, November 20, 2006

Blackstone Group L.P., manager of the world's largest buyout fund, has agreed to purchase Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. office landlord, for about $36 billion in stock and debt, Equity Office said late last night.

The leveraged buyout of Equity Office would be the largest ever in the real estate industry. It comes amid a dealmaking bonanza for private equity firms, flush with cash from record fundraising, and office REITs, which are benefiting from surging demand in major markets such as New York.

Equity Office shareholders would receive $48.50 a share, an 8.5 percent premium to Friday's closing price of $44.72, the companies said in a statement. The Equity Office board unanimously approved the offer for the Chicago-based real estate investment trust last night. Including the assumption of Equity Office debt, the total value of the transaction is $36 billion, making it the biggest leveraged buyout in history. The deal still has to be approved by Equity Office shareholders.

"I think it's a deal that's pretty attractive to shareholders," said Srikanth Nagarajan, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets in New York. "Office properties are increasing in value in the eyes of private equity investors."

Blackstone had previously acquired 10 publicly traded real estate companies in the past two years, including CarrAmerica Realty Corp.

Buyout firms have raised a record $170 billion this year through mid-October, up from $134 billion in 2005, according to London-based consultant Private Equity Intelligence Ltd.

The buyout talks were reported earlier by the Wall Street Journal. Terry Holt, a spokeswoman for Equity Office, declined to comment late last night. John Ford, a spokesman for New York-based Blackstone, also declined to comment.

Blackstone in July raised a $15.6 billion fund, to which it is adding. In June, it raised $5.25 billion for the largest-ever fund for high-return real estate investments, the majority of which has been spent already.

DOJ_NMG_0096038

The company and other private equity firms, which finance the bulk of their takeovers using the target company's cash flow, have announced $600 billion of acquisitions so far this year, compared with $241 billion in 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News.

Equity Office and Blackstone said in the statement that they expect the deal to close in the first quarter of 2007.

The biggest acquisition of a real estate investment trust to date is General Growth Properties Inc.'s purchase of Rouse Co. for $11.3 billion in 2004.

Equity Office shares have gained 47 percent this year. Over the past three years, the shares have increased 60 percent.

But Equity Office's share price hasn't appreciated as much as those of other REITs since it went public in July 1997 at $21 a share. Shares of New York-based SL Green Realty Corp., for example, closed Friday at $126.30 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Boston Properties Inc. went public at $25 a share in June 1997 and it closed Friday at $108.62 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Managing Lessons Learned? How US Airways Would Navigate Merger (WSJ)

By Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

It's hard enough post-Sept. 11 to manage one airline. Now, US Airways Group Inc. Chief Executive Doug Parker wants to run three.

With his $8.67 billion hostile bid last week for Delta Air Lines, the CEO is proposing to add yet another company to the two he's already combining as a result of his America West Airlines acquiring US Airways late last year. He envisions that the new airline would fly under the Delta name.

The 45-year-old, known for his financial expertise, is rolling the dice again in what would become the greatest management challenge of his career if a deal goes through. By merging with the much-larger Atlanta carrier Delta as it emerges from bankruptcy court, US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., would become the largest U.S. airline in terms of passenger traffic , a huge leap from its No. 6 ranking right now.

It would add an exponential level of complexity to an already daunting task. Though the earlier merger is considered a financial success so far, some of its customer-service rankings have been among industry lows in recent months as the airline has had rising problems with baggage handling and overall service complaints. Management is still blending the cultures of the two airlines, which were in many ways steeped in vastly different processes and procedures.

Union groups have yet to be combined, and pilots are griping about how throwing a third airline into the mix would further complicate the task of reassigning seniority ratings. US Airways has yet to meld the reservation systems of its predecessor airlines, a huge and sensitive task set to occur early next year. The company had major glitches when it combined frequent-flier programs and launched a blended Web site in May, efforts that angered many customers who couldn't complete bookings or get access to frequent-flier-mileage information.

Mr. Parker, though, is talking up the savings. A US Airways-Delta merger would cut overlapping flights and reorganize ground facilities, among other things, to bring about some $1.65 billion in annual cost savings, he said.

Increased size would be an advantage, not a burden for the airline, Mr. Parker said: "Size helps. The ability to take more people to more places is a critical factor in running an airline, so it certainly matters." The airline would also have more purchasing power when it comes to buying things such as new seats for aircraft or cups and napkins for in-flight service.

Still, adding Delta would bring more than 400 additional planes to schedule and maintain, 51,000 more employees, more complex technology to integrate or overhaul, and throngs of new customers (in terms of "passenger enplanements" -- a person getting onto an airplane -- Delta has about 119 million a year, nearly four times that of US Airways). "Because of the immense complexity of all the moving parts, the amount of planning is the single most important factor involved" in pulling off any merger, said Peter Walsh, director of New York-based Mercer Management Consulting's aerospace group.

Mr. Parker and his team say they are ahead of the game in planning if the Delta acquisition goes through. In the first merger they had to create an integration plan from scratch. But when they began contemplating a Delta combination months ago, they started going through each operating area to assess what would be different with Delta and what didn't work in the first merger.

"We've learned a lot of lessons. We'll do it better the second time around," said US Airways President Scott Kirby, who, like Mr. Parker, was an executive at America West before the merger.

One of the lessons, Mr. Parker said, comes from the airline's Philadelphia hub, acquired from the old US Airways. Baggage-handling problems and staffing shortages persisted even after Mr. Parker bought millions of dollars in ground equipment and increased staffing. He recently bought more equipment and boosted staffing again.

"It was a bigger problem than we thought," Mr. Parker said. "We've made huge progress over the last few months by focusing more on baggage, getting more people hired, putting more ground equipment in place. We apparently didn't go quite far enough. That is our No. 1 focus at US Airways, getting that done."

Management also learned it needed to listen more to employees. After the problem-ridden launch of the new US Airways Web site, Mr. Kirby started a weekly conference call with employees from reservations, airports, and other areas to discuss customer feedback. Once a month, a dozen vice presidents meet with line workers at various locations to do the same.

In a Delta merger, management would move more slowly on some of the technology integrations, Mr. Kirby said. The company was blindsided by higher customer call volumes after it moved more than 10 million frequent-flier records from one airline's technology platform to another. In a Delta merger they'd do more testing in advance and bring in customers to give feedback on the Web site and help identify glitches.

Executives concede that Atlanta's airport -- where Delta operates a huge hub -- would be a bear to manage. US Airways executives say that to more efficiently manage the sprawling, busy facility, they'll likely fly larger planes from that airport, while moving smaller planes to their nearby hub in Charlotte.

One key challenge for Mr. Parker would be putting together an expanded team of managers that would include those from an airline that is still loudly opposing his bid. "What we learned in the US Airways-America West merger is that it's extremely important to have people from both management teams working together," he said.

When Mr. Parker was first integrating the new US Airways, he and his team came up with a list of goals he planned to share with employees. Someone from the America West side of his team suggested creating a slogan for the campaign. But managers from the old US Airways advised Mr. Parker that workers would think that was disingenuous, given that the company had made two trips through bankruptcy court and a string of promises from former managers hadn't panned out. "There are histories in each company, and as I went out and talked to employees on the US Airways side, I had to spend a lot of time trying to understand what have they gone through, what have they heard, how am I going to sound saying that?" Mr. Parker said.

All this is likely dwarfed by the union issues posed by combining three airlines. US Airways is conducting talks with pilots groups from both its predecessor airlines, and those talks are unlikely to be completed before a merger with Delta could be consummated some time next year. That means the airline could end up conducting three-way union talks.

Mr. Parker said he plans to raise union pay scales for the combined labor groups to the highest scale paid by any of the three original airlines. Current US Airways pilots say it's not so simple, given all the seniority issues and their uncertainty whether the highest pay scales would be enough. They also want the company to complete negotiations with them before taking on another merger.

Mr. Parker said he was forced to make a move while Delta was still in bankruptcy proceedings and big cost savings could still be negotiated through the courts. "If we could, we would have liked for this opportunity to come along a little later, so we could fully integrate our merger now," he said.

Final Bids For Putnam Are Due Before Thanksgiving Holiday (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

The auction of Boston money manager Putnam Investments will move into its latter stages this week with final offers due from three bidders before the Thanksgiving holiday, according to people familiar with the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0096040

Prior to the Thursday holiday, bids are expected from three suitors: Amvescap PLC of the United Kingdom, Unicredito Italiano SpA of Italy and Power Corp. of Canada, according to one of these people.

It could be weeks before any decision is made by Putnam's parent, Marsh & McLennan Cos., of New York. Marsh President and Chief Executive Michael Cherkasky has called the auction "a market check," and the company may decide to hang onto Putnam, which manages $187 billion of assets, if it can't get a price its board considers fair.

A Marsh spokesman declined to comment. Calls to Amvescap, Unicredito and Power Corp. weren't returned.

A final sale price could be affected by the inclusion of "earn out" clauses. These agreements might allow for a lower payment up front but also additional payments if Putnam meets specific financial goals.

The Putnam auction is seen as an important step in Marsh's recovery from a tangle with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. Mr. Cherkasky took the company's reins in October 2004 when an industry-wide bid-rigging inquiry put the firm and its Marsh Inc. insurance brokerage in crisis. Marsh Inc. and other large insurance brokers reached civil settlements with state authorities.

But many, including Marsh, also gave up controversial and lucrative commissions they previously accepted from insurers. Replacing that revenue has been difficult. Marsh earned $404 million last year. That was up from 2004 but down from the more than $1.5 billion in 2003 when it still accepted so-called contingent commissions from insurance companies.

The company has reported $764 million in net income through the first nine months of this year, as Mr. Cherkasky has embarked on a cost-cutting campaign. He has told shareholders he aims to build the company into a premier risk consultant to corporate clients world-wide. Its Marsh insurance-brokerage unit as well as its Mercer and Kroll consulting units generally fit under that umbrella.

But Putnam could be seen as something of an outlier. The money manager is seen as an awkward fit at times. Having a money manager and Marsh's Mercer Investment Consulting under one roof, for instance, creates a potential conflict of interest.

Putnam historically has buttressed Marsh profits when the insurance brokerage and consulting units struggled, but the company has grappled with its own problems in recent years. Poor performance in the 2000-2002 bear market and inclusion in a share-trading scandal in 2003 hacked away at the company's assets and reputation. The company's current assets under management are less than half what they were at their peak in 2000.

That said, things have begun to look up for Putnam and Marsh lately. Putnam funds' performance and reputation have started to improve during the watch of President and Chief Executive Charles Haldeman, who took over amid the share-trading scandal in 2003. While Mr. Haldeman offered to step down if a buyer wanted to install its own managers, he appears to have the backing of the board of Putnam's mutual funds, according to a person familiar with the matter.

For its part, Marsh more than doubled its net income during the third quarter from the year-earlier period despite modest revenue growth. The company's shares, still below their level prior to the bid-rigging probe, are up more than 26% during the past three months.

Marsh's shares closed at $32.09 each on the New York Stock Exchange Friday, down 12 cents, for a $17.75 billion market value.

Bearish On Chicago (WSJ)

By Meyer S. Frucher

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

The announcement of the proposed merger between the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade has sparked applause from the shareholders who will benefit. But for the marketplace, the growing derivatives trading community, and the American consumer, the merger of two already powerful monopolies into a single pre-eminent force in the risk markets may be the perfect illustration of why monopolies are a bad thing. For regulators, therefore, the proposed merger represents an urgent challenge and an opportunity to ensure the competitiveness of these essential markets.

Historically, both the CME and the CBOT have operated as effective monopolies as futures contracts were typically traded exclusively at a particular marketplace. Yet to the idea that there is a downside to two discrete but not overlapping monopolies merging into one, many in the financial markets have responded: So what? After all, contracts traded at both exchanges are cleared by a single entity today. So long as the products are distinct from one another and the transaction does not result in incremental concentration of the marketplace for futures clearing, then there is no incremental concentration of market share either.

The argument does not stand up. First, the commercial markets suggest that you look for evidence of monopoly powers in concentrated pricing that harms consumers, builds economic inefficiencies into the system, and stifles innovation. Yet the recent history of the futures markets has shown that the winds of change were brought by a failed competitor in the case of CBOT and by the scrutiny of public equity investors in the case of CME. In fact, CBOT's case demonstrated the impact of competition on pricing and the "stickiness" of incumbency. The merged entity will concentrate pricing and will thus wield monopoly powers.

Second, given the supposedly limited overlap between products in the merger, this monopoly will reside in the financial futures that comprise the interest rate risk products -- i.e., Eurodollar futures that trade on the CME and the Treasury futures that trade at the CBOT. If this merger is approved, 80% of exchange-traded interest rate derivatives will be concentrated in one marketplace. Some counter this by contending that Eurodollar and Treasury futures contracts do not compete with one another because they are used to manage risks at different ends of the yield curve. But this is not true; both provide products along the entire curve. Thus, they are competitive, and their concentration into one marketplace would clearly be anticompetitive.

Third, the fact that clearing is already concentrated into one entity is already anticompetitive. Clearing should be a commoditized, processing-oriented service essential to the credit intermediation role of exchanges and thereby to the proper functioning of exchanges. Given that both exchanges have raised prices for clearing services since the Common Clearing Link was established, their concentrated clearing is a red flag.

Well, argue naysayers, even if the monopoly begins to creep toward predatory pricing, what's to stop some other market from listing a competing product that slashes that cost? In many markets, such as the cash equity trading arena, that is exactly what takes place. But such a scenario is unlikely to happen in the unique arena of trading and clearing in the futures contracts. Firms will only trade where there is sufficient liquidity to unwind a position they are carrying. The liquidity at a merged CME/CBOT would be unassailable, making it impossible for an upstart market to get a "first adopter" to trade a competing product.

The concentrated clearing exacerbates the issue. The cross-margining benefits of clearing all financial futures contracts at a single clearinghouse reduces the amount of capital traders need to post in order to take potentially risk-offsetting positions in products traded on different exchanges. This provides a further incentive to trade only at CME. While the common clearing link may have made margining more efficient, it has left unaddressed the long-term pricing power in the clearing space. We are talking about structural advantages that already impede entry to compete head-to-head in a product with either of them. Taking on their combined might in a merged entity would be akin to a high school team taking on the Chicago Bears. Add to these concentrated powers the fact that a merged CME/CBOT would be a self-regulating organization. That would make the post-merger CME an effective monopoly in the regulation of the financial futures space, exacerbating the issues of bifurcated regulation at the federal level between the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and the SEC.

So how does this merger affect the average trader or public investor? As more and more people use derivatives to manage their own portfolio risk or speculate on the direction of interest rates or commodities, it is a certainty that their transaction costs will be higher if CME and CBOT merge. Since both went public, they have raised their transaction and clearing fees, and can certainly continue to do so unilaterally as a merged organization.

What can the CFTC and the Department of Justice do to ensure that a merger benefits the markets? First, the CTFC should insist on fungibility of products so that if another futures market offers a Eurodollar future, any firm can take or unwind a position on different marketplaces. That will encourage competition. Second, DOJ can insist that CME "universalize" its clearing services by separating the clearinghouse from its common ownership with the exchanges, or by allowing other clearinghouses the benefits of cross-margining.

Exchanges that have gone public -- especially futures exchanges -- have commanded the attention of the capital markets and enjoyed the benefits of investment. That is a good thing. A CME/CBOT merger, however, holds the potential to cast a disproportionate shadow over the risk markets -- with adverse impact on the markets themselves and certainly on the public.

Mr. Frucher is chairman and CEO of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange.

Reforestation And Deforestation (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Almost anyone who lives in the rural Northeast can attest that the forest has expanded its range in the past century. That is why all those stone walls — the edges of cleared fields once upon a time — are now orphaned deep in the woods. A new study published by the National Academy of Sciences and based on a recent international assessment of forests confirms that reforestation has become a widespread pattern in well-off countries and also in a few that are not so well off.

This is obviously good news. Forests provide critical wildlife habitat, and the study's authors say the forest "withholds carbon dioxide that would add to greenhouse gas in the atmosphere."

Forest transitions — the shift from net deforestation to reforestation — began long ago in Europe and more recently in the United States. What is surprising is that they are beginning to happen in parts of India and Asia as well. Reforestation is directly linked to prosperity, an indicator that a country has risen well above the level of mere subsistence and has an economy that no longer depends entirely on exploiting natural resources.

But there is also bad news mixed with the good news. In some parts of the world, deforestation is only expanding, with dire consequences for biodiversity and the climate.

And even where forests have recovered, there is the likelihood that they have passed through an ecological point of no return. Some of the most biologically diverse forests are being logged or burned without ceasing, destroying irreplaceable habitat and extinguishing species one by one.

Perhaps someday those tropical forests will come back. But there will be no bringing back all the creatures who lived among them.

No Fish Story (WP)

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

FOR YEARS, scientists, environmentalists, responsible fishermen and others who care about the health of marine ecosystems have been warning about overfishing and other practices that destroy oceanic biodiversity. The message has been clear to anyone who cared to listen: Reform fishing rules or the oceans will die -- and sooner than you think. How soon? A new paper by a team of respected scientists estimates that unless policymakers take substantial steps to preserve marine biodiversity, the world will face "the global collapse of all taxa currently fished by the mid-21st century." Given how variably fisheries are managed, that may be too dire. Then again, it may not; in many countries, fisheries management is a disaster. And in many parts of this country, it's little better. A lot of fisheries have already collapsed. And destructive fishing practices continue as though the oceans represent a limitless supply, rather than a series of delicate ecosystems more easily destroyed than repaired.

The only good news in the new study, published in the journal Science, is that with most species, humans have not yet reached the point of no return and that sound fisheries management really does make a difference in preserving the sort of diversity that allows stocks to recover. There is no great mystery here. Fisheries managers who are disciplined about limiting the catch to what responsible science says an ecosystem can sustain marry environmentalism with the long-term economic health for fishing communities. It is no accident that Alaska's farsighted fisheries management council is both a leader in environmental stewardship and oversees the country's largest and most profitable fishing industry. These are ultimately the same thing, after all -- extinct fish being hard to catch. The challenge domestically is to get other regions to follow Alaska's lead and internationally to get countries bent on destructive fishing practices to adopt more sustainable models.

On the domestic front, Congress needs to reauthorize and improve the law that governs fisheries management. Both houses of Congress have bills that would do this; the Senate's is generally stronger. It is critical that the legislature quickly send a tough bill to President Bush that would bind fisheries managers to the best available science and provide strictly enforceable limits on the amount of fish taken from the seas. Internationally the Bush administration has been pushing for a ban on unregulated bottom trawling on the high seas. Bottom trawling, in which giant nets get raked along the sea floor, destroying ancient corals and other life forms in their paths, is one of the most ecologically destructive forms of fishing. Getting such a ban -- as well as international limitations on other destructive fishing practices -- would be a significant coup environmentally and would burnish the record of oceanic protection Mr. Bush established this year with his creation of a mammoth marine protected area in the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands.

Responsible fisheries management is an issue that bends ideology. But it is one of the most pressing ecological concerns of our time. If policymakers fail to address it seriously, the oceans will become giant dead zones, and seafood will be a thing of the past.

Building Green (WP)

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

IT'S A COMMON misconception that the noxious spew from an automobile's tailpipe is the predominant driver of global warming. But buildings are massive producers of the gases that contribute to climate change, too; they are responsible for at least 38 percent of greenhouse emissions in the United States, and the American Institute of Architects says that number is significantly higher. And, unlike the case with cars, cutting the contribution of buildings to the problem can be remarkably easy.

The environmental benefits of better building requirements remain an insight overripe for policymakers to exploit. That's why we welcome a bill the D.C. Council unanimously supported in its first reading last week. If the bill passes, government structures built three years after the legislation takes effect will have to meet a high standard of environmental friendliness. Five years on, private construction projects will also have to fulfill building requirements aimed at lessening environmental impact. This way, private developers would have a sense of how to easily bring their buildings into compliance and keep extra costs down before they have to begin meeting the new standards, a palliative that convinced the president of the D.C. Building Industry Association to support the bill.

The legislation is hardly perfect, however. The guidelines to which District developers must adhere place insufficient emphasis on energy efficiency. For example, builders can get away with doing special landscaping or making indoor conditions more pleasant instead of aggressively cutting electricity usage. Still, the legislation serves a useful purpose without imposing punishing costs on builders.

While there is some concern that the proposed law might cause developers to turn to other areas of the region that have looser building requirements, it's more likely that the District will become a regional leader in establishing environmentally sound building practices. The region's Council of Governments recently commissioned a task force to recommend area-wide "green" building standards. The District is showing the way.

After years of presidential neglect on global climate change, states and localities have had to pioneer their own approaches to reducing the atmospheric pollution they produce. Smart building requirements are a promising new tool for American cities to do just that. More jurisdictions should follow the District's example.

Global Hunt Turns Pushers Into Prey (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 20, 2006

HENRY ON THE PARK APARTMENTS, ROXBOROUGH

Fighting a fever with pepper cardamom tea, the graduate student raced through his homework and e-mailed a PowerPoint presentation to classmates. American business school seemed so easy. Group homework assignments. Exam review sessions. Online classes. Open-book tests!

And now, on April 18, 2005, Akhil Bansal stood on the cusp of earning an MBA and a master's in health-care finance from Temple University, golden American degrees that would catapult his career back home in India.

He smirked at the irony of that evening's twin assignments, health-care marketing and generic-drug risk management, subjects in which he had more than a passing interest.

If they only knew...

DOJ_NMG_0096044

Since his arrival in Philadelphia in 2003, this studious foreigner, with his rumpled flannel shirts and cocksure demeanor, had at age 26 blossomed into a global businessman.

While classmates studied case histories and created mock businesses, Akhil made real money. He controlled offshore accounts worth $6 million. He bought four cars and a sleek five-bedroom condo in a swank suburb of New Delhi. He could fly his fiancée to London on a whim. The balance in his free student checking account stood at $401,881.

His family's business was simple. From its base in India, the company supplied Internet pharmacies on four continents. The Bansals were the guys who supplied the guys who sent that relentless spam, luring American consumers with cheap Viagra, no-prescription Ambien, next-day codeine.

Akhil oversaw the family's North American operations, shipping roughly 75,000 pills a day via UPS. In a little more than a year, the network had smuggled 11 million prescription tablets to more than 60,000 American addresses, an operation that grossed at least $8 million. These numbers did not include the steroids or the kilo shipments of the tranquilizer ketamine, a club drug called "Special K."

The family's Internet business represented a dark slice of the global economy so new, and so widespread, that national governments were still struggling to understand it, let alone police it.

Laws were vague, outdated, inconsistent. Technology - new medicines and ways to deliver them - was outpacing regulation.

Demand grew monthly. On this moonlit evening in April 2005, for example, the Bansal business had an additional six million tablets and 108 kilos of ketamine stockpiled in a cluttered garage and a warehouse in suburban Queens, N.Y.

There were risks, yes. Some clients paid slowly; some employees stole. More ominously, a valued client, one Web operator Akhil supplied, had been arrested on drug charges just days before.

Indeed, in an overseas phone call that very morning Akhil and his father, Brij Bansal, had discussed this arrest, spooked but reminding themselves again that what they were doing was legal: Both were doctors, after all, and in India most of the medicines they sold did not require a prescription.

Even so, the father sensed something wrong.

"Close all your bank accounts and transfer online," Brij told Akhil. "Keep an open ticket ready, and as soon as you smell trouble you can leave by the time they reach you."

"Yeah... . OK, Papaji."

ANJUMAN HOTEL, AGRA, INDIA

Seven thousand miles away, a thin Indian drug agent with a rust-colored goatee perched over a laptop in a sweaty hotel room not far from the Taj Mahal.

The room's thick walls and tiny windows shielded the wire man from the blare of National Highway 2, a road so frenetic even cows gave way to its traffic.

Through headphones, the Indian Narcotics Control Bureau agent listened to a replay of the Bansals' father-son call. Then the wire man listened again to confirm what he had heard: "Start taking precautions... keep an open ticket... as soon as you smell trouble..."

Across the room, his boss and his boss' boss stood next to an agent from America's DEA. The stakeout, two blocks from Brij Bansal's upscale home, was the culmination of a 13-month global dragnet. The wire man knew this bust represented his country's biggest Internet pharmacy crackdown, and its biggest case with the Americans.

With a series of synchronized sweeps coordinated from Philadelphia, Indian and U.S. agents hoped to arrest 17 people worldwide and seize bank accounts from 11 countries.

This was what the wire man had been waiting for.

Over six months on the wire, he had come to know the Bansals. Despite the time difference - when it was day here, it was night in Philadelphia - father and son spoke daily. True, they talked about the son's schooling and the father's bad heart. But mostly they talked business: supply, demand, stock, delivery, debt, profit.

DOJ_NMG_0096045

The wire man had also eavesdropped on the father's calls with his New Delhi courier. Again and again, Brij reminded the courier to use phony return addresses on the packages he shipped to the United States. Several times, Brij remarked that he was paying the courier six times the going rate, a fee for which he expected loyalty and secrecy.

In a way, the wire man felt sorry for the Bansals. Except for their crimes, they were educated, productive, respected members of society. It would be sad to see them yanked from their homes in handcuffs.

That inglorious end, he believed, lay hours away.

LANCASTER, PA.

Lynn, a 35-year-old mother who had not worked since a 2000 car accident, logged on to a familiar Web site, meds-warehouse.net.

Her doctor had prescribed Ambien in the past, but he was retired now, and insurance no longer covered the sleeping medication.

She ordered 30 tabs with her credit card.

The person at meds-warehouse.net did not require a prescription, nor did he have any medical training. He didn't even understand the purpose of half the drugs he sold.

After validating Lynn's credit card, the Web site operator entered the order onto an Excel spreadsheet, one of 24 Ambien orders this day - orders from Little Rock, Ark.; Hattiesburg, Miss.; Plano, Texas; Wichita, Kan.; and Philadelphia.

The operator forwarded the spreadsheet to his suppliers, Akhil and Brij Bansal, who fulfilled more than 1,000 orders each day from their Queens warehouse, shipping them by UPS across America.

DEA OFFICES, CENTER CITY

Whenever DEA supervisor Jeff Breeden grew nervous, he would rub his forehead with his left hand. Now, as the arrest briefing began, Breeden dug deep into his brow.

Tomorrow's worldwide takedown of the Bansal network was to be monitored from this drab conference room overlooking Independence Mall.

The network supplied a rainbow of pills - painkillers, sleep aids, sedatives, stimulants, steroids, psychotropics, erectile-dysfunction medication. Thousands of orders a day.

Who knew who made this stuff, where it came from, what was in it? The public health risk that Internet drugs posed, Breeden thought, was incalculable.

Yet no one in DEA had ever worked a major global online pharmacy investigation. He knew it was a career case, one colleagues would always link to his name. Breeden? Yeah, he's the guy who supervised the Internet pill case out of Philly.

To take down the network, agents were using a number of weapons - surveillance, undercover buys, cell-tower pings, trash pulls, e-mail wiretaps, bank subpoenas, immigration reports, even provisions of the Patriot Act. Agents here had flown to Australia, Costa Rica and India.

As Breeden listened to the arrest briefing, he thought about everything that could go wrong.

Would foreign banks and governments cooperate? Or would they protect the targets, allowing Akhil and others to flee with millions? Would magistrates in several states authorize search warrants in time? Would the bad guys be there when agents raided their homes at dawn? Had any of them gotten wind of the premature arrest in New York? Did Akhil, as he implied in e-mails, really have a mole inside U.S. Customs?

Had they overlooked anything?

James Kasson, the top DEA official in Philadelphia, a weightlifter with a New York accent, began with a pep talk. What they were doing, he reminded the agents, was important, cutting-edge.

"The administrator is personally watching," Kasson said, citing Karen Tandy, DEA's top official in Washington.

Congress was pressuring Tandy to do something about illegal online pharmacies. She recognized the emerging public health threat. After all, any kid with a credit card and Internet access could order highly addictive drugs from the safety of home. But so far, DEA had struggled to take down the rogue pharmacies.

Tandy was counting on the Bansal case to make a splash.

DOJ_NMG_0096046

In D.C., there was talk that the attorney general himself would announce the bust. In New York, DEA agents were going to let ABC News go along on the raids. In Philadelphia, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan prepped for his news conference.

As the briefing broke up, the FBI agent on the case, Jason Huff, a bright young techie, approached the lead DEA agent, Eric Russ, a no-nonsense former Marine. Huff proposed an overnight stakeout of Akhil's Roxborough apartment, in case he and his roommate tried to flee.

Russ liked Huff, but Russ had a lot to coordinate, too much to accomplish before morning, and a stakeout wasn't part of the plan. He doubted anyone would run. These targets were computer nerds, not street thugs. If they hadn't detected surveillance trailing them for the last nine months, they weren't likely to be spooked at the eleventh hour.

Huff offered to have his FBI squad sit on the Roxborough apartment. Russ wasn't in the mood to argue. He thought, Knock yourself out, bud. I'm going home. I've got to be back here at 5 a.m. to coordinate arrests in five countries.

In the meantime, Kasson walked over to chat with Breeden, the nervous supervisor.

Kasson could see Breeden was tense. He tried some DEA humor.

"All right, Breeden," he said. "It's all on your shoulders now."

Wonderful, Breeden thought, knowing the boss was half-joking. He rubbed his forehead.

NEW DELHI

The deputy director of investigations for India's Narcotics Control Bureau (NCB) was senior enough to rate an air-conditioner in his office. Yet Ahmad Payam Siddiqui was sweating anyway.

As the top official involved in the country's first Internet investigation, he knew the next 24 hours were vital.

For six months, Siddiqui had kept the Bansal case a closely guarded secret. Leaks and corruption were endemic in the Indian government, and Siddiqui feared someone would tip the targets in Agra or Delhi.

Akhil Bansal's father, Brij, was wealthy. If he knew what was coming, he might flee to nearby Nepal.

On the eve of the arrests, Siddiqui had had no choice but to let dozens of officials know about the case - agents, their superiors, local police. Who knew whom they might tell?

Siddiqui felt helpless. So much was at stake. The case. His reputation. The reputation of NCB. Of India.

If we screw this up, he thought, the Americans will think we are incompetent.

DUNKIN' DONUTS, NORTHEAST PHILA.

Prosecutor Barbara Cohan handed the search warrants to the magistrate judge on call.

It was well past 9 p.m.

Cohan ordered a large black coffee and an egg-and-bacon bagel, her first meal since breakfast, her first chance to exhale.

While the judge reviewed the paperwork, Cohan joined two cops at another table. They toasted her silently, clicking styrofoam. This was her last case as a federal prosecutor, probably the last time she would meet a magistrate after hours to get warrants approved. After 24 years - a career that included the successful prosecution of a KGB spy - Cohan was leaving the U.S. Attorney's Office.

That her last case was so important, so fascinating, so challenging, gave Cohan special satisfaction. Akhil's business acumen both impressed and repulsed her.

The prosecutor bit into the bagel, sipped some coffee. She looked up at Lower Merion Police Officer Christine Konieczny.

"Do you think he has any idea what's about to happen to him?"

"If he did -" Konieczny said.

"He'd run," Cohan said.

Everyone laughed.

They talked about that sweet moment - hours away - when agents would cuff Akhil.

Cohan said, "Wouldn't you just love to see the look on his face?"

ROXBOROUGH

About 10 p.m., Akhil received a call from India.

DOJ_NMG_0096047

It was his mom, worried about his dad. Brij had a serious heart ailment, and twice since January Akhil had flown home to take him to specialists. Now Brij's hands and feet were swelling, a sign his heart wasn't pumping properly. Though he was a doctor, Brij was a stubborn patient.

Akhil tried to calm his mother. He promised to see her soon.

He hung up and sat down.

The timing couldn't be worse: He was days away from buying a $400,000 medical transcription business; his best friend and his roommate were in South Carolina to close the deal. He was feuding with his sister over control of their father's business. And, in 12 days, he had final exams at Temple.

Then there was that odd New York situation. When his client, a New York Web site operator, had failed to respond for a few days, Akhil had Googled the man's name. The headlines shook him: "Internet Drug Ring Smashed," "Cyber Gangs Charged."

Akhil recalled his father's warning: Keep an open ticket... leave...

Akhil got online and checked his favorite airline, Virgin Atlantic. A flight was leaving Newark, N.J., for London in nine hours. He booked it and pulled out his Bank of America debit card.

The card was rejected.

Akhil tried again. Rejected again. He tried another card. It didn't work, either. He tried an Air Canada flight from Toronto, leaving in 19 hours. No luck.

How could the bank screw up this badly? He had $401,881 in that account!

He logged on to bankofamerica.com. The account showed a negative balance.

He dialed the bank's 800 number. A woman who answered told him to call a Philadelphia number in the morning. She said, "Legal restrictions have been placed on the accounts."

Legal restrictions?

Legal restrictions. An arrested customer. A warning from his father.

Akhil hunted through his wallet and found a credit card that worked. He bought two tickets home - one departing Toronto on Air Canada and one departing Newark on Virgin Atlantic. Booking two flights gave him a backup, and a decoy.

Then Akhil called a classmate. He needed a big favor; there was trouble. Could the friend come over?

Akhil explained that he needed to leave for Toronto right away but didn't want to use his own car. Akhil's friend could sleep in the passenger seat while Akhil drove all night. To cross the border, Akhil reserved a rental car in Detroit, a Ford Escape.

At 1:40 a.m., Akhil emerged from his apartment into the crisp night air. He rolled his canvas suitcase to his friend's SUV and put his laptop in the backseat. He pocketed a handful of the pick-me-up Provigil, his drug of choice.

Then Akhil got behind the wheel and headed west.

BREEDEN'S HOME, DOWNINGTOWN

The DEA supervisor's cell phone woke him from a deep sleep at 1:42 a.m. He groped for the phone, but the call slipped to voicemail.

As Breeden fumbled to retrieve the message, the phone rang again. It was a DEA agent on the other side of the world.

The guy in India got right to it: There was a new wiretap from Brij's phone. It looked like Akhil planned to flee his Philadelphia apartment and probably leave the country. In fact, he might already be gone.

"Jeff," the agent said, "we need to get out there." p>

1. The Bansals smuggle pills into the U.S. To avoid U.S. Customs, which targets small pill packages from overseas Web sites, Dr. Brij Bansal in India and his son, Akhil Bansal in Philadelphia, ship millions of pills in bulk from Delhi to their Queens, N.Y., distribution center.

2. A customer orders pills American consumers, responding to spam or using Google to search for drugs, place a credit-card order with a Web site. Unregulated sites do not require a legal prescription and are not registered with DEA.

3. The Web site forwards the order The Web site charges the consuner's credit card, then forwrds the order to the Bansals' operations in Agra, India, and Queens. Immigrants at the Queens depot fulfill the order, stuffing pills inside envelopes for UPS pickup.

4. Pills arrive Within a day or two, UPS delivers the pills to the consumer's doorstep.

5. Bansals get paid Every few weeks, the Web-site operators wire payment to one of Akhil's bank accounts.

Origins (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 20, 2006

THE STORY SO FARHours before DEA agents are to arrest Internet drug dealers in a worldwide sweep, Temple grad student Akhil Bansal races from his Roxborough apartment to flee home to India. Today's installment takes us back to the day the case began. It is February 2004.

PHILA. INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

It all began on a frigid February 2004 morning - back when Akhil Bansal still viewed shipping pills as a chore for his father, back when DEA agents didn't even have Internet access at their desks.

At the airport, a squat Airborne Express supervisor noticed three suspicious packages on the green conveyer belt and, because they lacked manifests, broke them open.

Inside the first, he found 120 tablets of generic Valium. Inside the others, he found more Valium and knockoff Viagra.

Anonymous packaging. No dosage directions. No evidence of a prescription.

The supervisor called police.

NEAR UPPER CHICHESTER

Carlos Aquino, tired from a three-day training session in Quantico, Va., pulled into the driveway of his canary-yellow suburban home. He planned to take the rest of the day off as comp time, maybe tinker with his fishing boat, an 18-foot Manatee.

The DEA investigator, his once-trim body softened by desk work and agency meetings, hauled his suitcase inside.

He had found the seminar interesting enough - DEA had established a new priority, targeting Internet pharmacies. But Carlos had left the session hoping he never got such a case. It looked complicated, a pain.

"Little cases, little headaches," he'd say. "Big cases, big headaches."

Carlos had had enough big cases. He'd spent 24 years as a Philly cop, nine of them assigned to a DEA task force, busting crackheads, kicking down doors, recovering kilos of dope, nearly getting himself killed working undercover against Jamaican thugs. He could be a hard-ass, but his warm smile revealed an empathetic nature.

Now, at 56, Carlos worked for the DEA division that regulated pharmaceuticals. He carried a clipboard instead of a gun, pursuing a softer kind of criminal, often doctors and pharmacists who violated prescription laws. As bad guys went, they made easy targets. He would say, "Doc, whatcha been doing, huh?" Usually, the doctor would confess on the spot, case closed.

Carlos found the work safe, satisfying, simple - a solid way, he thought, for a Puerto Rican raised in South Philadelphia to end a fine career as a narc.

After lunch on the day he returned from Quantico, his Nextel cell phone chirped. It was Bill Knightly, a state trooper Carlos knew from an old DEA task force. Salt-and-pepper crewcut, medium build. A good guy.

"Carlos, you know anything about Internet pharmacies?"

"Yeah, a little..."

Knightly briefed him: 119 packages seized at Airborne Express at the airport. Generic Valium and Viagra. In a month's time, the same shipping company, Abbas Enterprises in Chester, had sent 4,100 similar packages.

Here's the fun part, Knightly said: Two different men had delivered the Abbas packages, each signing "Leroy Jones."

Leroy Jones No. 1 was a hulking, bald African American.

Leroy Jones No. 2 was a flabby Indian fellow with a comb-over.

Carlos laughed.

Knightly continued: The latest shipment arrived without a manifest, giving Airborne the legal right to open the packages. The depot supervisor found scores of generic Valium and Viagra inside.

Knightly and local police planned to confront the shipper. Was DEA interested? Did Carlos want to go along?

Not really, Carlos thought. The case sounded complicated, probably insignificant.

On the other hand, Carlos valued the cop-to-cop network he had built over 30 years. He liked being a fed locals could work with. As a Philadelphia cop, he had hated it whenever the feds whizzed on stuff he brought them. When Carlos moved to DEA, he'd vowed never to be so rude, so turf-conscious.

"Dude," he told the trooper, "I'm in."

ROXBOROUGH

Akhil scanned an e-mail from his father and saved it.

Helping his father's business hadn't been part of his plan. Akhil had come to Philadelphia to earn an MBA and a master's in health-care finance. Classes kept him busy enough; his life in a dim Henry Avenue apartment - mattress on the floor, food stacked haphazardly in the kitchen - was a testament to that.

But as an only son, even at 25, Akhil had a duty to do whatever his father wished. Helping his dad ship Indian-made knockoff pills from inside the United States took only an hour or two a day.

Besides, when Akhil was young, Brij had given him whatever he desired - the latest computers, cell phones, stereo, CDs - things available to only 2 percent of Indians his age.

In return, Brij, a successful doctor, had demanded academic excellence in high school. "Get top marks and I will buy you a car," he used to say. "Get good marks and I will buy you a bicycle. Get low marks and I will buy you a taxi, and you will drive it for the rest of your life."

Late many nights, Akhil cloistered himself in his room with books, the air-conditioning and stereo turned up high. Outside, 10-foot walls separated him from Agra's poverty and chaos, a life he hoped to avoid.

"A very responsible boy," his high school report card said. "Artistic, capable."

Akhil excelled at St. Paul's Church School, where students wore stiff navy blazers and striped ties and could be caned for an incorrect answer. He scored best-in-class on a national standardized test, and when he turned 16, Brij bought him a new, Korean-made sedan.

Akhil entered medical college in Gwalior and took residence in a dorm, to his father's horror. No son of his would live among commoners. Brij got Akhil a proper apartment and installed a servant.

After graduation, Akhil worked for a few hospitals, an expected step before joining his father's clinics. He grooved in Delhi's party scene with fellow doctors, assumed comic postures in group pictures, and grew a goatee. He used "Dr." on credit cards and signed up for the e-mail address drakhil@hotmail.com.

Then he threw everyone a curveball: He was going to graduate school in America.

With his grades, he believed he could go anywhere. His research revealed that Temple University offered both the MBA and health-care diplomas he sought.

His parents were wary. Philadelphia was halfway around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0096050

"Just stay," Brij said. Akhil's mother, Kamlesh, laughed, "Who will cook for you?" The joke masked his parents' biggest fear - that some white American woman would fancy Akhil's piercing eyes and thick hair, and he would never return. Brij and Kamlesh devised plans to keep their son in India.

First, to renovate his room in Agra, they spent $16,000 - more money than most Indians spend for a house.

When that didn't work, they found him an attractive Indian woman to marry, of the same business-class caste, the Baniya. He rejected her, too.

"I'll not let you go away from me," Brij said. "How much can you earn if you go? $5,000 a month? I'll give you $6,000 a month to stay with me."

"Papaji," Akhil said. "Please understand. I want to get these degrees so someday I will be in a position to offer my son a job for $6,000 a month."

When Akhil left for Temple, Brij was so distraught he didn't go to the airport.

And yet, within six months, father and son found themselves working together again - Brij in India, Akhil in Philadelphia.

By February 2004, business had become so good, they had hired some help, a guy with an account at Airborne Express.

WASHINGTON

DEA Administrator Karen Tandy joined the nation's top narcotics officials inside the National Press Club, in a white banquet room overlooking the top of the East Wing of the White House. They were there to announce the government's first strategy to combat online pharmacies.

"What we have seen," Tandy told reporters, "is the incredible path of misery and wake of family destruction and addiction left by the illegal use of prescription drugs.

"Let me be clear: When Internet pharmacies serve legitimate patients receiving care under accepted medical standards, we welcome those Internet sales. When they are merely crime impersonating medicine, we will put them out of business."

A CNN reporter asked, "Why is it not a very simple matter for DEA to identify the individuals that are spamming offers for Vicodin, Xanax... and shut them down tomorrow?"

Because, Tandy said, "there are hundreds of thousands of sites" online, virtually all cloaking their identities.

"You don't know where to find them. They could shut down one day and pop up under a new name the next."

JAIPUR, INDIA

Akhil's sister, Julie, was in charge of marketing, or spam.

Sir,

We wish to introduce ourselves as wholesale distributor and supplier of generic and branded medicines manufactured by top multinational pharmaceuticals companies of India. We can drop ship to your customers in US 100% delivery without any customs problems.

We charge the following generic: Viagra $1; Valium, $60.00 per 100 tabs; codeine $50 per 100 tabs...

Let me know if you are interested. Thanks and regards, Julie.

A reply came the next day, from discountmedsonline.com:

Hi Julie,

What is the total delivery time frame? Will you be carrying Xanax, Ativan, Diazapam, Ambien, anytime soon? I may be very interested in your business.

Thank you.

CHESTER

To trace the suspicious Valium found at the airport, Carlos and two local officers, Chester Police Sgt. Joe Bail and Delaware County investigator Michael Boudwin, drove to a storefront at 214 Lamokin St., the return address on the package.

The storefront's owner met them there.

Richard Dabney was a bald, heavyset, 61-year-old ex-con with drug and bank robbery arrests dating back to 1969. Carlos expected Dabney to lie.

Indeed, he told them a story: A mysterious Indian he had met at a Radnor computer store had offered him $3 a package to use his Airborne account. The guy paid cash, and Dabney never asked what was inside.

DOJ_NMG_0096051

"Dude," Carlos said quietly, "you're BS-ing me."

Dabney tried again. He'd met the Indian driving a cab.

Carlos gave a cold stare. "Dude, don't lie to me."

Dabney insisted the story was true.

Fine, Carlos said. Help us catch this guy. Wear a wire.

Dabney agreed.

As Carlos drove back to his Chinatown office, he called a federal prosecutor.

"Hey, it's Carlos. I've got a new one, a quick-hit indictment. A no-brainer. Interested?"

ROXBOROUGH

Akhil confronted his roommate, fellow Temple student Atul Patil.

Where was Dabney? Patil was the one who had met him in the cab and had his cell-phone number.

Akhil didn't trust Dabney. He seemed like a hustler. And his English was terrible. Akhil liked to joke that Dabney, who was African American, spoke "Ebonics."

Still, mailing pills for Brij was beginning to interfere with Akhil's studies. He needed a shipper, one who did the job and didn't ask questions.

The Bansals did not operate Web sites. They were bigger than that. They were wholesalers who fulfilled the orders American consumers sent to online pharmacies.

To circumvent U.S. customs, Brij shipped large packages of generic pills from India to Akhil in Philadelphia. Here, Akhil and Patil took up the mindless task of reshipping; while listening to B-101's soft rock, they wrote labels and stuffed packages with generic Ambien, Xanax, Viagra, Valium, codeine, morphine, steroids.

Father and son told themselves what they were doing was legal because both were doctors in India and because Brij had an Indian license to ship pharmaceuticals.

Besides, they told associates, if the authorities concluded that shipping the medicines was illegal, someone would send a warning notice. Which the Bansals would, of course, honor.

In the beginning, two or three dozen packages from India were no trouble. But by exam time, Akhil and Patil were receiving 100 packages at once. A day's shipment could contain 5,000 or 10,000 pills.

So they had found Dabney and paid him $3 a package. For fun, they tipped him with surplus Viagra.

Now Dabney had vanished. Akhil pressed Patil. What had Dabney done with their drugs?

A month passed. Then in April, Dabney called. Could they meet in Chester?

Patil said, How about the Friendly's on Ridge Avenue? It was closer.

Sure, Dabney said.

NEAR FRIENDLY'S, ROXBOROUGH

Carlos stood by as a detective flipped on the recorder:

"Today's date is 4-7-04," the detective said. "Time now is approximately 4:30. This will be a consensual intercept by Richard Dabney and two Indian males."

The feds hoped Dabney could get the Indians to admit they were selling drugs - or, better still, provide details about a larger operation, anything that might lead to the smuggler behind it all.

But when Dabney met the Indians at Friendly's, his hostile, accusatory tone implied he'd had no idea the packages contained drugs. It caught the Indians off guard, as well as the agents listening in.

"If I get caught with drugs, I got a problem," Dabney told Akhil and Patil. "... Either you or the police set me up."

Patil was skeptical. "But you knew what we were doing. We were clear on that."

"You said Viagra and antibiotics... . You guys are playing games, man."

"If we were playing games with you, we wouldn't be here."

Dabney kept talking, but agents listening by wire already knew the whole thing was a disaster. Dabney dominated the session, in a clumsy attempt to exonerate himself. The Indians said little. They seemed unsophisticated, small-timers.

Besides, the agents already had another, promising lead.

DOJ_NMG_0096052

While searching Dabney's storefront in Chester, they found a letter from an angry woman in Olympia, Wash. She'd returned 50 tablets of Valium and a MasterCard receipt for $154. She'd ordered 1-milligram tabs, not 0.5-milligram.

The woman's letter was addressed to "Rx-mart.com." The FBI quickly traced the Web site. It was in Texas - and, ultimately, would lead them to Australia.

FRIENDLY'S, ROXBOROUGH

Akhil and Patil dismissed the Dabney encounter, too.

Dabney might be hoping to scam them out of more money. Well, Akhil and Patil were moving to a new system anyway.

Akhil's father had put them in touch with an Indian couple living in Queens, N.Y., David and Elizabeth Armstrong. From now on, the Armstrongs would handle the shipping.

Under the improved scheme, bulk quantities - pills by the tens of thousands - would be shipped from India to a Queens rowhouse. In the basement, newly arrived Indian immigrants would earn $6 an hour repackaging and labeling pills. Already, the Armstrongs were filling 400 orders a day.

From: Akhil Bansal

To: David Armstrong

Please send the following order and let me know the tracking number. Alprax, 2,000 tabs. Thanks. Success is a journey not a destination!

To further shield the operation, the Armstrongs had UPS pick up the packages from their home, a few miles away. The Armstrongs lived on a busy thoroughfare in Queens called Utopia Parkway.

PAGOSA SPRINGS, COLO.

On a lonely canyon road in southwestern Colorado, a deputy sheriff discovered a middle-age woman facedown outside her Chevy Tahoe, dead.

Inside her SUV, the deputy found packets of the blood-pressure medicine Catapres, pills often abused as a sedative.

The woman's husband knew she had been suicidal. But until he began to go through her things, he did not know that she had been ordering Catapres, Valium and other sedatives online.

The husband gave the receipts and envelopes to police. Some of them bore a return address in Queens - 5028 Utopia Parkway.

HOW THIS SERIES WAS PRODUCED

This series is based on multiple interviews with more than 50 sources; U.S. and Indian judicial, e-mail and bank records; and secret U.S. grand jury transcripts, Indian wiretaps, and DEA and Homeland Security investigative reports obtained by The Inquirer.

Quotes, details, interpretations, thoughts, conversations, even facial expressions, have been substantiated by firsthand observation, documents or multiple sources.

Interviews were conducted in New Delhi and Agra, India; Washington; and Philadelphia. Those interviewed include Akhil Bansal, Foram Mankodi and Bansal relatives; six Indian drug agents; 22 American federal agents, including DEA's Carlos Aquino, Eric Russ and Gerard Gobin; and eight current and former prosecutors, including Barbara Cohan. People who bought drugs online are identified by first name only because they have not been charged with a crime.

27 Nabbed In Major Drug Ring (HA)

Hattiesburg American, November 18, 2006

The indictments of 27 people - including five Hattiesburg men - as well as the seizure of $15.7 million worth of drugs and $2.9 million in cash and property resulted from breaking up one of the largest and most sophisticated drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi history, officials said Friday.

The Hattiesburg men indicted include:

Ivory Charles Kindred, 41, owner of the now-closed Hi-Hat 2000 Club

DOJ_NMG_0096053

Ricky Wilson Barnes, 33

Johnny Grindle, 35

Lester Carpenter, 41

Brooks Stallings Jr., 33

Kindred, Barnes and Stallings have already entered guilty pleas and are awaiting sentencing.

Carpenter has been sentenced to 37 months in federal custody.

Grindle has only been indicted.

"This is really the big, top-tier guys," Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of Mississippi Drug Enforcement Administration, said of the 27 suspects. "It was especially significant in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers."

Operation Central Hub, which began in April 2005, targeted drug trafficking in the Jackson and Hattiesburg metro areas, but the 19-month Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation uncovered a link to Mexico and other cities in the U.S., including Dallas, Atlanta, Little Rock, Detroit and Laredo, Texas.

Large shipments of cocaine and marijuana were transported across the border from Mexico, authorities said. Once inside the U.S., drug shipments were shuttled from Texas to various cities, including Mississippi. Cocaine shipments destined for Mississippi were sent via commercial tractor-trailers operated by truck drivers employed by Mexican drug bosses.

The drug shipments were sometimes hidden in secret compartments within trucks or trailers or co-mingled with legitimate cargo.

A second transportation method was the use of large gooseback trailers pulled by dual wheel pickups. The trailers were outfitted with sophisticated hidden compartments accessible only through a hydraulic remote control system.

Marshall Fisher, director of Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics, said the drug trafficking operation is one of the top two or three in MBN's history since it was created in 1971.

An affidavit by a DEA agent said a confidential source provided information that suspect Michael Andre Travis had telephone contact with another suspect, Oscar Gomez, a known trafficker of cocaine residing in Texas, who had ties to cocaine traffickers in Mexico. The informant also provided information on others. Surveillance of Travis showed all his movement and meetings with others involved in the alleged drug operation.

The government is seeking forfeiture of all items they believed were purchased with illegal drug money, including a home in southwest Hinds County valued at more than $500,000.

The home belongs to Wilbert Newell and his wife, Audrina. Wilbert Newell has pleaded guilty to a drug charge and is awaiting sentencing.

He could not be reached Friday. His wife, who answered the phone at the Newells' home, told The Clarion-Ledger he wasn't there. She began to cry and said she didn't know anything about her husband's activity or if he was involved with drugs.

Audrina Newell said she is aware that the government is planning to try to seize the home.

"I wish they would just leave me alone," Audrina Newell said. She has not been implicated in any of her husband's activities.

The Hattiesburg American reported earlier this year that during a May 26 hearing for Kindred, Stallings and Barnes, prosecutors said the suspects are part of a drug network that allegedly brought almost 6,000 pounds of marijuana from Texas to Mississippi since August 2005.

According to an affidavit filed by DEA special agent J. Derryle Smith Jr., a confidential informant tipped agents that marijuana was to be delivered to the owner of the Hi Hat 2000 on May 3.

Agents from the DEA and the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics observed Barnes unloading 1,500 pounds of marijuana from a tractor-trailer on May 3 near 309 Northgate Road, Hattiesburg, the affidavit said.

The maximum penalty for the drug trafficking charge on each defendant is up to 40 years in prison.

Tommy Gholar, 50, of Jackson.

NFL Testers Step Up Fight (NYDN)

By T.j. Quinn, Daily News Sports Writer

New York Daily News, November 20, 2006

As more of the NFL's Drug Program Agents join a potential lawsuit for tens of millions of dollars over back payroll tax and benefits, the league has changed its plan to replace them in midseason.

After the IRS ruled over the summer that the DPAs, the men who collect urine samples from players, were employees, not independent contractors, the NFL told the 80DPAs that they would be replaced by an outside company called Comprehensive Drug Testing (CDT) in mid-November. CDT handles collections for Major League Baseball and the NHL.

In a memo sent to DPAs last week, however, DPA supervisor Warren Welsh wrote, "It has become apparent that ongoing discussions between the Management Council and CDT make the original date unrealistic....it seems, more likely than not, that the change will not take place until the end of the season."

But the DPAs, most of whom are former FBI, IRS and DEA agents and police detectives, also want to know when the NFL is going to abide by the IRS' ruling. Attorney Robert Costello, whose client roster has gone from three to "many dozens" of current and former agents, said yesterday that he is giving the NFL less than a month to make a determination.

"Either we will settle or we will sue," said Costello, a partner with Levy, Tolman and Costello in Manhattan.

As Costello sees it, and as IRS documents seem to agree, the NFL has little choice other than to start writing checks to DPAs for the payroll tax they have been paying without help from the NFL since the program was created in 1988. Costello also has asked the NFL to say what benefit plans the DPAs should be entitled to join.

The NFL might have a much larger problem than a lawsuit if it doesn't come up with a solution. According to the IRS, if an employer is audited and found to be in violation of the agency's ruling, it could face "massive" penalties far in excess of the amount of money in dispute, one spokesman said. Many DPAs told the Daily News that they never complained because the job was well-paying with "no heavy lifting," as one put it. When anti-doping experts criticized the NFL before Congress last year, saying the league should turn to outside collectors, the NFL dismissed the suggestion.

DOJ_NMG_0096055

But after two DPAs asked the IRS to determine whether they truly were independent contractors, the arrangement started to fall apart.

The NFL, as has been the case since The News first reported the spat with the DPAs, refused to comment.

What Welsh's memo does not say, and what the DPAs do not know, is why the negotiations with CDT are taking longer than expected. Those talks come as the NFL is looking at other revisions to its drug-testing program.

League officials met with members of the House Government Reform Committee earlier this fall to discuss ways to improve their policy, and the NFL and the NFL Players Association have had ongoing discussions about adding more tests and closing potential loopholes.

Whatever the changes, many of the DPAs hoped to be hired by CDT, as the NFL originally suggested they might be. But according to last week's memo, the company has yet to contact any of the collectors, and one DPA said collectors who contacted CDT couldn't get information about the company's plans.

But several admit their chances of continuing with CDT may be slim, as the NFL has grown frustrated over stories about the standoff, and a story last week in which The News revealed that the league's testing program had large gaps during the season when players were not tested. The NFL denied there were gaps, but numerous DPAs and even some players disputed the league's claim.

Colombia Sends An Anti-drug Bouquet To U.S. (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

IPIALES, COLOMBIA — With the destruction of a 12-acre opium poppy crop in southern Narino state on Sunday, the Colombian government declared it had rid its territory of all "industrial" plantations of the flower used to make heroin.

Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos made the declaration during a media trip to a mountainside poppy field 375 miles southwest of Bogota near the Ecuadorean border, minutes before dozens of troops destroyed the crop with machetes. It was perhaps no coincidence the assertion came as the U.S. Congress was considering extending Plan Colombia, the $600-million anti-drug and terrorism aid package whose effectiveness has been called into question.

Santos described the elimination of sizable poppy fields as a "great accomplishment in the struggle against narcotics. We're not saying some poppies won't reappear in six months, but for now they are gone."

Santos is the Cabinet member who oversees the national police and armed forces, which have carried the fight against Colombia's drug traffickers. Heroin production and trafficking continues — a 130-pound load of heroin was seized on the Colombian island of San Andres in the Caribbean last month.

But even critics of Plan Colombia say strides have been made. Poppy cultivation fell to less than 4,500 acres last year, or 10% of what was farmed in the early 1990s, according to Colombian statistics. Colombians also report that seizures of the gummy substance collected from poppies that is the basis of heroin are up a hundredfold since 2000. U.S. drug authorities report increases in street prices in cities such as Chicago and Boston, an indicator of diminishing supply from Colombia and elsewhere.

But the relative success of poppy eradication only puts in bolder relief the stubbornness of cocaine production in Colombia. After seven years and $4 billion in U.S. aid under Plan Colombia, cocaine continues to be nearly as plentiful as it was before 2000.

In response, there are growing calls for a change in tactics, toward more incentives and fewer punitive measures. On Sunday, Santos told reporters that the government would offer farmers more subsidies to grow crops other than coca and poppies.

"Crop substitution programs have been the missing link in the struggle against drugs," Santos said. "That's going to change."

About 300,000 acres of Colombian coca were fumigated with an industrial herbicide last year.

DOJ_NMG_0096056

A shift away from massive spraying would be in line with calls from the United Nations, several nongovernmental agencies and Democratic Party critics of Plan Colombia in Congress. All have long insisted that for drug eradication to work, more farming alternatives must be offered to peasants.

"People grow poppies because we are all poor and we have been forgotten by the government," said farmer Alirio Quitiyan, who happened upon the eradication scene. Quitiyan denied that he ever grew poppies.

Guerrillas in the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, offer peasants about $50 a year to use their land to grow poppies, Santos said.

A top United Nations official here said recently that for crop substitution programs to work in Colombia as they have in Southeast Asia, officials must offer farmers similar incentives.

Santos said eight possible crop substitutes had been identified for Narino state, including African palm and rubber.

Such incentives "would be the only way to make any crop reductions sustainable," said Adam Isacson, a researcher at the Center for International Policy in Washington, a watchdog group that monitors Plan Colombia spending.

IMMIGRATION:

Signs Of Hope On Immigration (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The political earthquake in Washington has knocked loose some of the big obstacles to fixing the immigration system. A decent solution is now there for the taking, if President Bush and the newly Democratic Congress are willing to grab it.

It won't be easy. Some of the debate's loudest shouters, liars and dead-horse beaters were ushered by voters from the room — people like J. D. Hayworth and Randy Graf in Arizona, John Hostettler in Indiana and Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania. But the public is still in a prickly mood. All those shrill Republican ads about Mexicans stealing your Social Security failed as an electoral strategy, but that doesn't mean politicians always lose by being immigration hawks. Voters approved tough ballot measures. In Arizona, they made English the official language and restricted illegal immigrants' ability to sue, receive bail and qualify for benefits.

And except for the losers on the border-fixated fringe, not many in the restrictionist camp seem particularly chastened by the election. Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, an opponent of the comprehensive reform bill that passed the Senate this year, won his race, as did several new Democrats who ran as immigration hard-liners. Local lawmakers in Texas and other states are still going after illegal immigrants with fervor.

The roots of a divisive, grinding immigration debate have not gone away. But it is crucial that the Democrats find their voice. The effort to revive immigration reform should start in the Senate. There is a decent bill under the barnacled hulk of legislation that passed the Senate last May. It used to be called McCain-Kennedy, before other senators tacked on tough-posing amendments that made it fundamentally unworkable and unjust. The Senate should strip those away, like the ones that divide immigrants into three arbitrary tiers of worthiness and needlessly force those seeking legal status to trek to a border state to apply for it.

The principles that guided the original McCain-Kennedy bill are those that should guide the coming reform effort: laws should be enforced at the border and workplace, fairly and evenhandedly; temporary worker programs must not be used to create a permanent official underclass; and any reform must be designed to work and not just create another smothering bureaucracy.

Immigration remains a high-voltage issue that Congress may be too timid or distracted to touch. The new Democratic leaders, including Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, have conspicuously not listed immigration among their most urgent priorities. Even Senator John McCain, who is an architect of the most reasonable bill out there but also has presidential primaries on his mind, spent a lot of time this fall stumping for misguided restrictionists like Mr. Graf. We hope he and his moderate colleagues have the integrity to honor their sensible immigration views now that the dismal '06 campaign is done.

Many voters who scorned Republicans over immigration reacted as you would expect them to after being mocked and exploited by a party that elevated the issue into an urgent crisis and then offered nothing to solve it but faux hearings, strident campaign ads and a pretend fence. The same fate may await any Democrats who posture, deceive and dawdle over immigration reform in the next Congress.

TAX:

IRS Advisory Committee Wants Online Auctioneers To Have To Pay Taxes (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, November 20, 2006

Attention online auction sellers: An IRS advisory committee wants you — to pay federal income taxes on your profits.

Anyone who sells goods online should first be required by law to submit a federal tax identification number, a change that would enable the IRS to track the transactions and seek any taxes owed, the committee recommended in a new report to the federal tax-collection agency. The recommendation is similar to an enforcement option raised in August by the staff of the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation.

The IRS advisory panel of tax specialists, citing the rapid growth of Americans selling via eBay, uBid and other online sites, said it's likely that "a significant number of those users either choose to ignore income reporting requirements or are unaware of their obligations."

"We're trying to help close the tax gap" between what Americans actually earn and what they report to the IRS, said committee member Rachel Paliotti, corporate tax manager for Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island.

The non-government panel's report cited IRS data that estimated non-farm sole proprietors under-report 57% of their annual income. The committee also highlighted a 2005 eBay-commissioned report by ACNielsen International Research that said more than 724,000 Americans described the top online auction site as their primary or secondary source of income.

"These kinds of transactions probably contribute to the tax gap," Paliotti said.

Although the IRS has no estimate of under-reporting specifically by online sellers, the agency estimated that unreported capital gains by all businesses totaled $11 billion for the 2001 federal tax year.

The IRS could target suspected online under-reporting by requiring Internet business sites to get tax identification numbers from all sellers, the committee recommended. Sites like eBay and uBid would use the numbers to file duplicate reports of sales transactions with the IRS.

The IRS website already features a page designed to remind online sellers that they "may have tax responsibilities." Supplementing that effort with a new income-reporting requirement would require an amendment to the tax code, Kevin Brown, head of the IRS Small Business/Self-Employed Division, told the committee. He said the IRS would forward the recommendation to the Treasury Department.

Hani Durzy, an eBay spokesman, declined to say how the firm might respond if Washington enacted an income-reporting requirement aimed at online sellers. However, he said, "We've always encouraged our sellers to comply with the law, whatever the law might be."

Time For Tax Reform (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

TWENTY YEARS have passed since President Reagan signed the landmark Tax Reform Act of 1986, a bipartisan effort to simplify the egregiously complex federal tax code. Since then, Washington has taken about 15,000 steps backward — enacting an average of 750 new or modified exemptions, deductions and other wrinkles to tax law every year. The code not only grew more burdensome, it became less efficient, more likely to distort markets and more prone to evasion. The latter is a huge problem, as seen in the estimated $350-billion tax gap — the difference between what taxpayers should be paying the feds each year and what the Internal Revenue Service collects.

In short, it's time for Congress to take another stab at a major rewrite of the tax code that eliminates most of the preferences and loopholes. By broadening the tax base — in other words, requiring more corporate and personal income to be taxed — lawmakers can lower rates without reducing the total amount collected by the IRS.

DOJ_NMG_0096058

A blue-ribbon advisory panel led by former Sens. Connie Mack (R-Fla.) and John Breaux (D-La.) last year called for this kind of approach, floating a proposal to reduce the number of individual tax breaks and to vastly simplify the recordkeeping done by businesses. Although there are some differences on the details, the concept's backers include both conservatives and liberals. Two Democrats — Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon and Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois — have introduced bills that would simplify and flatten federal taxes even more drastically.

In the coming year, the new Democratic majority will have an unusually strong incentive to work with Republicans on fundamental tax reform. More than five dozen tax breaks passed in President Bush's first term are set to expire over the next four years, while the number of filers subject to the dreaded alternative minimum tax will mushroom from 4 million in 2006 to 22 million in 2007. If Democrats don't act, they risk being pilloried for raising taxes. A revenue-neutral measure that dramatically simplified the tax code would effectively change the subject.

The tax code should be about raising money to finance the federal government's operations. Lawmakers should eliminate all but the most vital and effective tax breaks and tailor those as precisely as possible to the goal they want to achieve. For example, if the goal is to make homeownership affordable, why extend the break only to taxpayers who itemize their deductions, or to those buying mansions or a vacation home?

Bush's support would be critical to the effort, but he had little to say about the advisory panel's report. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson, who is widely respected on Capitol Hill and Wall Street, needs to start championing the panel's cause while there's still time left in Bush's presidency. Tax simplification was one of the signal accomplishments of Reagan's second term; if Bush throws himself behind tax reform now, he may be able to say the same for himself.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

Rush hours

What was the huge attraction at a sold-out Warner Theatre on Thursday night that caused a double line of adoring fans to stretch all the way around the corner?

Rush Limbaugh, ladies and gentleman, or more specifically, as the bright lights of the marquee shone: "An Evening With Rush Limbaugh."

The nation's top radio broadcaster and commentator (heard locally Monday through Friday noon to 3 p.m. on WMAL-630 AM) didn't disappoint his Washington-area faithful, opening his two-hour act with a hilarious joke about an elevator encounter with a frustrated Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat. (Call us and we'll tell you the punch line.)

On Wednesday evening, Mr. Limbaugh was the dinner guest of Vice President Dick Cheney at the vice president's mansion in Northwest. The host shared a table with, among others, White House senior aide Karl Rove and Republican strategist and bookseller Mary Matalin.

And yes, that was soon-to-be-crowned House Majority Leader Nancy Pelosi that Mr. Limbaugh bumped into in the lobby of the Four Seasons Georgetown, where he stayed while in Washington. The broadcaster said it was difficult to gauge who was more horrified by the chance encounter, him or the nation's top Democrat.

In fact, Thursday's rare live appearance was bittersweet for Mr. Limbaugh, who earlier had endorsed the outspoken Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania to be Mrs. Pelosi's No. 2 man on Capitol Hill. Instead, the leadership position went to Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland.

"They don't want him in the leadership. We do," Mr. Limbaugh told his radio listeners. "We want him there, folks, we want him in the Democrat leadership because we want the Democrats to be who they are."

Thanks for my job

"To this day, I'm still impressed with his effective performance in a case called Bush v. Gore."

DOJ_NMG_0096059

Or so commented Vice President Dick Cheney, on hand for this past weekend's Federalist Society national convention at the Mayflower Hotel, heaping praise on Washington lawyer and former solicitor general Theodore B. "Ted" Olson, who represented then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush before the Supreme Court in his bid to become commander in chief during the hotly contested 2000 presidential election.

All's well within

Democrats and Republicans have chosen their respective party leaders for the upcoming 110th Congress, and for at least one congressman who was unsuccessful in his bid to become Republican Conference chairman, there are no hard feelings.

"While we came up short, 91-to-100 [votes], it was a close race, and I feel good about it," Georgia Rep. Jack Kingston told Inside the Beltway after his loss to Florida Rep. Adam H. Putnam, who will have the task of directing day-to-day operations of the conference office -- the organizational vehicle for all Republicans.

"I know many people were praying, especially me -- and at this moment of defeat, I'm comforted in a great peace," he said. "As the old hymn says, 'It is well with my soul.' "

And on your right

There's one group of tour guides in Washington that always looks forward to the next political scandal -- the more outrageous and disgusting the better.

We're referring to Scandal Tours, an Inside the Beltway mainstay for 17 years. Publicist Deb Fiscella of Center Stage Marketing calls it the "tour that highlights the lowlifes."

She forwards word to Inside the Beltway that the tour has been updated to include a new Mark Foley attraction on Capitol Hill, obviously honoring the former Florida Republican congressmen who couldn't keep his fingers off his keyboard.

Other new attractions include K Street, site of recent shady lobbying activity; a Donald H. Rumsfeld departure stop; and updates on the general lame-duck mayhem at the White House.

And if you think from those new attractions that the tour guides (all actors from Gross National Product) are picking on the Republicans, think again. The guides are proud to be "equal-opportunity offenders," confident "new majority rules scandals will be added as Washington moves into an era of Democratic control in Congress."

Scandal Tours is gearing up for the holidays, with tours taking place Saturdays at 1 p.m. starting Nov. 25, departing from the Warehouse Theater at 1021 Seventh Street NW. Reservations are required through the Gross National Product box office at 202/783-7212.

Hoyer Claims No 'Bad Blood' With Pelosi (AP-Y)

By Hope Yen

AP, November 20, 2006

Rep. Steny Hoyer acknowledged Sunday he was seeking assurances from incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi that she would not retaliate against his supporters after he won the No. 2 House leadership post.

Hoyer, D-Md., insisted there was "no bad blood" with Pelosi after she publicly supported Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania for the job of majority leader. Hoyer said he was confident Pelosi would not punish House colleagues who voted 149-86 last week to make Hoyer the majority leader when Democrats take control in January.

"We're going to talk about that," said Hoyer, when asked whether Pelosi had made promises not to retaliate by denying choice committee assignments. "One of the reasons it's going to not happen is that there are a lot of them."

"It's one thing ... if you have a margin of one or two or five or even 10, but when you have a margin as decisively as the caucus made a decision, then it's time to move on," Hoyer said.

Last week, Democrats chose Hoyer — who has long had a difficult relationship with Pelosi, D-Calif., — after unanimously backing her as the first female speaker.

On Sunday, Hoyer sought to play down any personal differences or ill will, noting that the two have worked together in the House Democratic leadership for many years.

"The American public have just given us a big mandate for change and taken the country in a new direction," he said. "Nancy and I share that obligation together. That's our objective and we're going to work very closely to accomplish that."

DOJ_NMG_0096060

Former GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich called Pelosi's decision to support Murtha a "mistake" but said Republicans should not underestimate her.

"Republicans, instead of chortling about ... the fact that she backed Murtha rather than Hoyer ... need to start by saying, you know, if she has these weaknesses, how come she's going to be speaker? She won," Gingrich said.

"She did make a mistake with Murtha," he added. "I think if she appoints Alcee Hastings to be the head of intelligence, that will be a further mistake in the direction of making her far too left-wing and far too insensitive."

Pelosi has not said whom she would appoint to lead the House Intelligence Committee. Hastings, D-Fla., and Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, are considered front-runners to take over in what has been considered a snub to the current senior Democrat on the panel, Rep. Jane Harman of California.

Pelosi has told Harman she will not be reappointed to the committee after her position expires at year's end. Hastings, the next senior Democrat on the committee, is a former federal judge who was charged in an FBI bribery sting but was acquitted by a federal jury. Later, he was impeached by the House and removed from the bench in 1989 by the Senate.

Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., who was elected to the No. 3 House post as majority whip, said, "I very well would support him if that's what Nancy would like to happen."

Gingrich said the main challenge for incoming House Minority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and other Republican leaders is to focus on regaining control of the House in 2008 rather than being the "White House's floor leader."

"They are very different jobs," Gingrich said, citing the danger for Bush in the final two years of his presidency to get caught up on "legacy concerns" rather than working for the broader interests of the Republican Party.

"The House Republicans have a different institutional challenge. How do they reach out in very closely contested districts, recruit the candidates, build the record, create the excitement and the energy to regain a majority?" Gingrich added.

Separately, Rep. Charles Rangel said tax increases are not on the Democratic agenda. But he said there are some taxes that "we Democrats and hopefully some of the new Republicans would like to see more targeted to the working class and to the middle-class people."

Rangel, incoming chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, declined to say whether he would support a 100 percent deduction for college tuition up to $3,000 a year.

"The problem is that, if you're talking about credits and you're talking about tax reform, it's inconsistent," said Rangel, D-N.Y.

Hoyer appeared on ABC's "This Week," Gingrich spoke on "Fox News Sunday," Rangel was on CBS' "Face the Nation," and Clyburn was on "Late Edition" on CNN.

Democrats Set Out To Heal Divisions (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Newly elected House Democratic leaders vowed to quickly reunify their Caucus in the wake of a bitter leadership contest last week, but offered few details and left some rank-and-file Members questioning how the party will mend its divisions as it prepares to take control of the chamber in the 110th Congress.

“We’ve had our debates. We’ve had our disagreements in that room, but now that is over,” Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Thursday following a closed-door meeting at which Democrats elected Rep. Steny Hoyer (Md.) to be Majority Leader, defeating Pelosi’s close ally and preferred candidate, Rep. John Murtha (Pa.).

But at least a few Democratic lawmakers remained angry Thursday over allegedly heavy-handed tactics employed by Murtha supporters in the contest, and others publicly suggested that House leaders could have a difficult time alleviating any lingering bruises.

“I think the Caucus is fractured,” Rep. Allen Boyd (Fla.), who will be a co-chairman of the Democratic Blue Dog Coalition in the 110th Congress, said Thursday, adding, Pelosi’s “biggest challenge is figuring out how to wrap her arms around all the Caucus.”

DOJ_NMG_0096061

Several Members, however, asserted that with the election completed Democrats will focus on readying their legislative agenda, rather than dwell on differences. "We just want to move forward," said Rep. Elijah Cummings (Md.), who endorsed Hoyer in the race.

"The majority of us in the Caucus didn't see this as a battle between Steny and Nancy," said Rep. Mike Ross (Ark.), another incoming Blue Dog co-chairman. "By the time we get back on Dec. 4, you'll see a reunited Democratic Party."

One Democratic lawmaker, who requested not to be identified, evaluated the outcome of the election by stating that the Speaker-in-waiting "has more egg on her face than a broken arm." But the Democrat added that to return the Caucus to unity, Pelosi must exert as much effort privately as she has pledged in public.

"If people want to continue this, then we'll know. ... Nancy will set the tone," the lawmaker said.

At least one House Democrat who backed Murtha in the contest, Rep. Jim Moran (Va.), had alluded Thursday to the possibility that lawmakers who had pledged support to Murtha privately but cast their ballots otherwise could face retribution when committee assignments are distributed.

"It remains to be seen whether all their wishes for committee assignments will be fulfilled," Moran said, referring to the freshman Democratic lawmakers, nearly two-thirds of which are believed to have supported Hoyer in the race by some estimates.

But while top Democrats on nine House committees endorsed Hoyer's bid, Rep. Kendrick Meek (D-Fla.), who had endorsed Murtha, said he expects those Members will shore up Pelosi's leadership when they hold the gavels next year.

"Many of the ... to-be-chairpersons are going to make sure she's a strong Speaker," he said Thursday, adding of any lingering animosity: "It doesn't continue ... We continue to move forward."

The House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, led by Rep. Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), is expected to establish its membership for the 110th Congress in coming weeks, and will begin work in December on the selection of committee chairmen, as well as panel assignments for rank-and-file Members.

After losing his bid for elected leadership, Murtha is expected to chair the Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, which controls a significant portion of federal spending, and perhaps more significantly will allow him to to continue in his role as the Democrats' point man in opposition to the Iraq War.

"I was proud to support him for Majority Leader because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq," Pelosi said Thursday. "I know that he will continue to take the lead on that issue for our Caucus, for this Congress, for our country."

In the aftermath of the election, Hoyer went on to offer his support to the California lawmaker.

"Our Caucus is unified today," Hoyer said. "I intend to do everything in my power to make Nancy Pelosi the most successful Speaker in the history of the House of Representatives."

A Pelosi spokesman said Friday that the Speaker-designate was not slated to formally meet with the new leadership team — also made up of Majority Whip James Clyburn (S.C.), Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and Caucus Vice Chairman John Larson (Conn.) — before departing to her San Francisco district for the Thanksgiving holiday next week, although he added that Democrats would likely have casual discussions before returning for the Dec. 4 lame-duck session.

In addition, Pelosi is expected to appoint a new DCCC chairman in the near future, filling the remaining Democratic leadership position. There were no indications Friday when the Speaker-designate would make her selection, but previous chairmen have been tapped late in December or in early January.

Several current DCCC lieutenants are considered likely candidates for the post, including Reps. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), Debbie Wasserman Schultz (Fla.), Artur Davis (Ala.) and Mike Thompson (Calif.), who is a close Pelosi ally.

In the meantime, Clyburn said he plans to establish his Whip team for the new Congress, and said Thursday that he would consult with the new leadership team on potential deputies. While he said he will consider the seven current Chief Deputy Whips, the South Carolina lawmaker said he has decided on at least one new addition, Rep. G.K. Butterfield (N.C.).

Did Nancy Pelosi Get The Message? (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty, Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, November 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096062

There's only one thing dumber in politics than picking a fight when you don't have to; it's picking one when you can't win. That's why pretty much everyone in Washington is mystified by Nancy Pelosi. Through a midterm-election campaign in which Republicans had tried to caricature her as a fuzzy-headed and dangerous San Francisco liberal, she succeeded in keeping the focus on them. And the first woman Speaker-to-be was pitch-perfect in the euphoric days that followed the Democrats' big win. She said the right things, and she did the right things, like quietly reshuffling her ranks to avoid a showdown between Rahm Emanuel, the campaign-committee chief who delivered her majority, and James Clyburn, a senior member of the black caucus. Even the arrival of her sixth grandchild seemed auspiciously timed to remind everyone of her motherly side. Yet before many Democrats across the country had even taken down their yard signs, Pelosi decided to step on her own coronation by turning what would otherwise have been an all-but-ignored secret ballot for majority leader into a gang war. Instead of quietly accepting that her rival Steny Hoyer would continue to be her second in command, she threw herself into a fierce and ultimately unsuccessful campaign for John Murtha, an old friend whose ethics didn't seem to match Pelosi's talk of a new day in Congress.

All that raised a lot of new questions about Pelosi herself--about her judgment, her political instincts and her real ideology. Was her endorsement of longtime ally John Murtha over Hoyer a testament to her loyalty or proof that she is incapable of letting go of old grudges? Was putting her muscle behind the hero of the party's antiwar wing a sign that she would steer her fractious and fragile coalition over the guardrails on the left? Did her support for a man who is notorious for slipping special-interest earmarks into spending bills prove that she didn't really mean all that talk about cleaning up Congress? In other words, was Nancy Pelosi really up to the job?

THE FALLOUT

Pelosi will have to answer those questions with her actions in the months ahead. "It was a serious misstep and inexplicable to me," former Republican leader Dick Armey chortled. "I just hope she does more of it." But the Murtha defeat will be largely forgotten if the Democrats under Pelosi's leadership rack up a series of victories on the agenda that she had laid out for her first 100 hours as Speaker, which includes raising the minimum wage, forcing Medicare to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices, cutting student-loan rates and making the national-security fixes recommended by the 9/11 commission. Then there is the biggest issue of all, now that the Democrats are partners in governing and not just critics: charting a course on Iraq. Hoyer insists the phased withdrawal he supports is not all that different from the exit strategy that Murtha and Pelosi are pushing, but his victory tells Pelosi her caucus members will not tolerate her getting too far ahead of them.

Pelosi may now have to reconsider how she plans to deal with another rival, fellow California Congresswoman Jane Harman. Pelosi has already made it clear that she does not want to give Harman the top job on the Intelligence Committee when the party formally takes over in January. Harman, whose qualifications no one doubts, says she was promised it by earlier Democratic leaders; Pelosi says her term is up. But by shutting out Harman, Pelosi would be setting another trap for herself. The next in line after Harman is Florida's Alcee Hastings, who in 1989 was impeached and removed from his federal judgeship by Congress over allegations that he had conspired to take a $150,000 bribe (charges of which he was acquitted in court). If Pelosi passes him over, she is certain to infuriate the Congressional Black Caucus, with whom her relations are already strained.

The new Speaker will also be under more pressure to push through lobbying and ethics reform but may find that harder to accomplish. After an election in which exit polls showed that voters are more concerned about corruption than the Iraq war, Pelosi needs to recover the high ground she lost with her endorsement of Murtha, who said he thought her reform measures were "total crap." It was bad enough that Murtha's candidacy turned the cable-news networks into a film festival of the grainy tapes from the Abscam sting in 1980, in which the Pennsylvania Congressman told an agent posing as an Arab sheik that he couldn't be bribed "at this point." But on ethics reforms or any other tough issues that lawmakers like to publicly support and privately fight, Pelosi might now lack the backroom clout needed to get results. "When key votes like the budget come around, this will make it a lot harder for her to pressure members," said a Democratic Congressman who backed Hoyer over Murtha. "It's going to be a lot harder for that pressure to be as meaningful."

THE FIGHT CLUB

Speaker of the House is one of the most treacherous jobs in Washington. Tip O'Neill was the last one to leave the big chair voluntarily, nearly 20 years ago. The four who have followed him have been ousted. Pelosi may have taken a different path to power than her predecessors--she was 47 and had raised five children before she ran for office the first time--but by rising rapidly in an institution where getting ahead has always meant waiting in line for your turn, she ensured that she would have a large target on her back. Now the qualities and impulses that fueled her rise--making bold moves, keeping and settling scores, trusting only a small circle of loyalists--could be disastrous in a new role that is all about building alliances that can get you to 218 votes.

To adapt, she will have to understand that today's opponent could be tomorrow's ally. Few in Congress have such a memory for slights and betrayals. She still bristles at the fact that when she first went to Washington, many in the Democratic establishment didn't take her seriously and opposed her march up the leadership. As she told TIME earlier this year, "They couldn't control me, so they tried to take me down." When her former House colleague Martin Frost was running to head the Democratic National Committee after the 2004 elections, she lobbied against him with a determination that all sides attributed to Frost's challenging her for Democratic leader two years before. Asked about those conflicts, Pelosi refused to discuss them specifically but said, "Anybody who's ever dealt with me knows not to mess with me."

And yet she is capable of bringing people back into her fold. When Frost's wife, a retired Army major general, was buried in September, he was touched that Pelosi interrupted her frantic campaign schedule to attend the service at Arlington National Cemetery and then walked more than a mile behind the caisson and riderless horse that took Kathryn Frost to her grave. Afterward, Pelosi asked Frost to visit her in her office. She appreciated the work he was doing to help Democratic candidates, she told him, and added that if the party won the House, she would be turning to him for more. "She could not have been more gracious," Frost says. "I was very appreciative. Whatever she needs me to do, I will do."

Still, pulling together is not something Democrats do well--even in victory. As the Pelosi-Hoyer-Murtha battle was heating up, Democratic consultant James Carville and pollster Stan Greenberg--both of whom are close to the Clintons--loudly called on Howard Dean to resign as Democratic chairman, saying the party could have won more House seats if he had spent its money more wisely. Liberal bloggers were slamming Emanuel, head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, saying he was taking credit for their victories. And the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of the most conservative House Democrats, was mounting a rear-guard campaign to save Harman's post at the Intelligence Committee. Savoring a team victory, it seems, is something the party has yet to get the hang of.

THE BALTIMORE EFFECT

Even as Democrats scratched their heads over Pelosi's judgment last week, they knew where it was coming from. "This isn't San Francisco," said a former Democratic-leadership aide. "This is Baltimore." The latter is where Pelosi grew up and where she got her first lessons in politics, from the best teacher anyone could want. When Nancy D'Alesandro was a child, her father used to collect yellow sheets of paper that were stacked and stapled together at the end of each week. They were called the "favor file." That was the way Baltimore's legendary Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro Jr.--later known as "Big Tommy," to distinguish him from his namesake son who also became mayor--kept track of who had been given a job or some other benevolence. The record always came in handy at election time. From the age of 13, his only daughter Nancy took charge of the desk in their home on Albemarle Street, where people came to tell their stories and ask for help.

Knowing that also explains why the lefty caricature that Republicans paint of Pelosi has never quite stuck. Hers is not the loopy liberalism of San Francisco, where you can be branded as a right-wing extremist if you vote, as Pelosi once did, for cracking down on rave parties. The politicians in her family were progressives of a rougher cut, rooted in the Depression and the New Deal and in doing things for desperate people who turned to the government when there was nothing else for them to do.

You also didn't last long in big-city machine politics if you buckled at the first sign of a fight. When Big Tommy once threatened to fire striking garbage workers, Jimmy Hoffa himself sent an emissary to tell the mayor he wasn't happy. As D'Alesandro's former press secretary Tom J. O'Donnell recounted the story to the Washington Post, "The mayor spoke up and said, 'You go back and tell Mr. Jimmy I'm very unhappy with the garbage piling up on the streets of Baltimore, and I'm not going to stand for it.'" The following Monday, most of the garbagemen were back at work.

That fighting philosophy has defined Pelosi's leadership style as well. Her predecessor Dick Gephardt was known as "Ironbutt" for the hours he spent sitting and wheedling his colleagues. "Gephardt would plead with people to do the right thing, and they would know that there was no penalty for it," recalls a veteran senior aide on Capitol Hill. Not Pelosi. "Once you cross her," he says, "your life is not going to be very pleasant."

DOJ_NMG_0096064

The Speaker-to-be puts it in more graphic terms. At lunch with a group of TIME correspondents a few months ago, she said Republican attacks on her would not work, because she wouldn't let them. "If people are ripping your face off," she said, picking at a chicken salad dressed only with lemon wedges, "you have to rip their face off."

THE ROAD AHEAD

It was not entirely clear that Pelosi would ever make the family business anything more than a hobby. After graduating from an all-girls Roman Catholic college in Washington, she married Paul Pelosi, whom she met at summer school at Georgetown University and who would eventually make a fortune in investment banking and real estate. They moved first to New York City and then to San Francisco. Pelosi had five children in six years. Between diapers and laundry, she raised money for Democrats and ultimately became the state-party chairwoman.

But it turns out she was compiling a favor file of her own. Not only was she a prodigious fund raiser in a state that functions as a political ATM for Democratic candidates across the country, but she also helped bring the national convention to her city in 1984. In 1987 she decided to run for the seat left vacant by the death of Sala Burton, the widow of Phillip Burton, who had run his own storied political machine. One of Sala's final acts was to give her endorsement to Nancy Pelosi.

In 2001 Pelosi made her first move toward the leadership with a bid for the No. 2 job, which pitted her against Hoyer. As it happens, the two had interned in the office of Senator Daniel Brewster of Maryland in 1963. That experience also introduced Pelosi to the different opportunities that Capitol Hill offered men and women. Hoyer "worked directly for me and helped me with a number of different projects," recalled Brewster, 83, in an interview last week with Capital News Service. Pelosi was a receptionist--or, as Brewster put it, "an excellent front person."

That first whip race intensified her rivalry with Hoyer and also cemented her bond with Murtha, who managed her campaign. Not only did he get her the votes to win that job but his support also made it possible for other old bulls in the House to begin to imagine a woman rising to the top. The former Marine had a reputation for male chauvinism that stood out even in an institution where the only private rest room adjacent to the chamber is for men. (Women members have to go around the corner and through a reception area to use a facility in Pelosi's office suite.) Murtha's backing "was the answer to sexism in the place," says an aide to Pelosi. "If he didn't have any problem with a woman in leadership, no one else would either."

But Pelosi has also found a way to make her gender a weapon in political combat. She was one of the loudest voices demanding an investigation into what G.O.P. leaders knew of the sexually explicit instant messages that Congressman Mark Foley, who has since resigned, was sending to congressional pages. While Republicans booed her on the House floor, Pelosi insisted "as a mother and a grandmother" on putting the question to a recorded vote.

She won that round over the Republicans, but that victory and all the others will be forgotten unless she can regain control over her own caucus. She didn't just politely suggest that people vote for Murtha; she fought hard. Her lieutenants plied the House with phone calls and none-too-subtle threats, including suggestions that anyone who bucked her might lose committee assignments. After Hoyer still drubbed Murtha by a vote of 149-86, Pelosi emerged from the ballot room and pronounced Hoyer's win "a stunning victory." By the look on her face, she meant it. Pelosi went to Hoyer's party that night but retreated afterward to the downtown- Washington restaurant Tosca with a dozen or so of her closest allies. They entertained one another with stories about an old rivalry between Phil Burton and Texas Congressman--ultimately Speaker-- Jim Wright that had divided the Democrats decades ago. Pelosi seemed cheerful and relaxed--anything but war weary. It was a reminder of something else that is true about Capitol Hill: what really matters in a fight is whether you're standing at the end of it.

Fineman: Can Speaker Pelosi Hold Dems Together? (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

George Miller was reared in the liberal Democratic Party of Northern California—not the fancy Nob Hill kind, but the fiery kind bred in the docks, shipyards and canneries of the East Bay. His father was state party chairman and taught his son to distrust Big Money and to "go to work like you're killing snakes." Elected to Congress in 1974 at the age of 29—in the wave of Democrats sent to Washington by Watergate and Vietnam—Miller is now the Man of the House: the closest ally of and adviser to the already-embattled speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco. "It sounds corny," he told me, "but I was taught that you acquire power for one reason: to help the seriously disenfranchised."

Ellen Tauscher was reared in business. Her dad was a grocer in New Jersey, and after college she went to Wall Street, where she became one of the first women with a seat on the New York Stock Exchange. In 1989, she migrated to an upscale East Bay suburb. Elected to Congress in 1996—in a district next to Miller's—she now chairs the centrist New Democrat Coalition. Her politics lean toward tax cuts and free trade, but she has a productive working relationship with Pelosi, the proudly quintessential San Francisco liberal. "Nancy and I come from different places," Tauscher says. "But we put our big-girl pants on every day and go to work."

Two fault lines appear on Bay Area maps of Planet Pelosi: the geological San Andreas and the Democratic Miller-Tauscher. The Speaker's task (and, by extension, her party's) is to avoid an intramural earthquake. "This isn't just about the next two years," says Rep. Ed Markey of Massachusetts. "We have to show we are a governing majority."

First comes the relatively easy part, at least in the House. Republican-style "values" issues aren't a problem. While it is true that most of the new wave of "new" Democrats are from suburban or even rural districts, there is no new Democratic Bible Belt in Congress. Virtually all Democrats and Democratic candidates (including Miller and Tauscher) backed Pelosi's carefully drawn initial agenda: to raise the minimum wage, to trim interest on college loans, to use tax money for stem-cell research and to allow Medicare to negotiate bulk purchases of drugs.

But the tectonic plates move in dangerous ways when the topics are taxes, trade, torts and terrorism. Miller voted against reducing the federal tax code's "marriage penalty"; Tauscher was for it. He was against liberalizing trade with China; she was for it. He was against limiting awards in lawsuits; she was for it.

Then there is terrorism—and Iraq. Tauscher, with her lower Manhattan ties and her swing district (which includes two of the government's most important defense-research labs), voted to authorize the war in Iraq and is wary of the consequences of a too-hasty exit. To Miller, the war is an unsalvageable blunder. Coming of age in antiwar San Francisco, his view is framed by Vietnam. He voted against authorizing the invasion. He admires Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania for having come forward last year to denounce it. "Everyone discounted the criticisms of people like me because we were the 'antiwar crowd'," Miller says. "Jack gave the Democratic Party a place to stand."

Miller backed Pelosi's decision to try to reward Murtha by making him majority leader. Tauscher organized her coalition allies on behalf of the man who trounced Murtha, Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland. It was an embarrassing strategic debut for the Speaker-to-be. Not an earthquake, to be sure, but a tremor that may be worth remembering.

GOP Keeps Team, Promises Changes (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Despite efforts by a small band of House Republicans last week to convince their colleagues that a change in leadership was important, if not critical, to winning back a majority in 2008, the House Republican Conference overwhelmingly sided with the status quo Friday and handed landslide victories to Minority Leader-elect John Boehner (Ohio) and Minority Whip-elect Roy Blunt (Mo.).

Both leaders recast themselves in their campaigns and argued they would be agents for change in the 110th Congress, committing to return the Republican Party to its roots of fiscal conservatism and reform and to battle the new Democratic majority tooth and nail.

“We are going to work as a team and we are going to earn our way back into our majority,” Boehner told reporters after his victory, stressing the need “to fight for a smaller, less costly and more accountable federal government.” Boehner defeated Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, in a landslide 168-27 vote. One vote was cast for Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (Texas), who withdrew from the race Wednesday.

Similarly Blunt was candid about the need to shakeup the party agenda. “Frankly, [we need] to get rid of the bad habits that we may have developed in the 12 years in the majority,” he said. “It’s not our job to defend business as usual, it’s not our job to try to define the federal government in the biggest possible way, we need to do the right things. Our Conference is ready to do that." Blunt soundly defeated Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) 137-57, with one Member abstaining.

Speculation brewed all last week that some combination of Members would attempt to nominate Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) for the Whip job, or write in his name on the ballot, but there was no mischief during Friday's leadership elections. The Conference also ruled the day before elections that write-in ballots would not be tallied in final vote counts. Blunt will maintain Cantor as his Chief Deputy Whip.

While the top elected leaders invoked the 1994 spirit that swept in a Republican House majority that year, Friday's elections were a significant defeat for prominent conservatives Pence and Shadegg. Pence has been a darling of the outside conservative establishment — much of which endorsed his leadership candidacy — and Shadegg is also a former RSC chairman and a member of the 1994 class.

Rep. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) contended that his colleagues did not heed the call from voters on Election Day for reform within the party. "We haven't hit the first stage, we're still in denial," Flake, a Pence ally, told reporters. "When you're here you kind of drink your own bath water," he said, a reference to a supposed inside-the-Beltway mentality.

Flake's comments were seen as particularly critical of Blunt, who is the longest serving member of the current leadership team. Flake said it might be "doubly difficult" to convince voters the party got the message to change the way it does business.

There were few surprises in any of the downballot leadership races, with the exception of the four-way race for Republican Conference chairman. GOP Reps. Adam Putnam (Fla.) and Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.) were widely seen as the frontrunners against Reps. Dan Lungren (Calif.) and Jack Kingston (Ga.).

However, Blackburn secured an unimpressive 31 votes on the first ballot, with 29 votes for Lungren. Blackburn received 30 votes on the second ballot and was removed per Conference rules, leading to a showdown between Putnam and Kingston. Putnam bested Kingston, the current Conference vice chairman, in an unexpectedly close 100-91 vote. "I have no regrets, it was a good campaign," Kingston told supporters in an e-mail following his defeat.

Blackburn spent the better part of the year laying the groundwork for her campaign, including frequent radio and TV appearances. One Member contended that Blackburn's eagerness could have also led to her demise. "Marsha worked really hard, but there was just this perception that Marsha was in it for Marsha, and not for the team," said one Republican who asked not to be named.

"I will continue doing my best to support our leadership and support our Party's principles," Blackburn said in a statement following her defeat.

Texas is back at the leadership table as well, with the election of Texas GOP Reps. Kay Granger and John Carter to Conference vice chairwoman and Conference secretary, respectively. Granger beat Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) 124-63 and is the only woman on the leadership team. Carter was unopposed and was approved by voice vote.

Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.) soundly defeated Rep. Darrell Issa (Calif.), 132-63, for Republican Policy Committee chairman.

The first test of the new leadership team will be in the coming weeks as it transitions into the minority. The internal Conference rules and the makeup of the GOP Steering Committee, which determines committee ranking members and rank-and-file assignments, will have to be reconfigured as they are largely written for majority status.

For instance, the current 28-member Steering Committee provides for a weighted voting system, with five votes granted to the Speaker, two to the Majority Leader and one for the remaining 26 members.

Minus a Speaker, it remains to be seen how many votes the Minority Leader and Minority Whip will be granted. Regional representation on the Steering Committee may also be shifted to account for the geographic loss of Members.

Republicans also will have to clarify an internal Conference rule regarding how many years a Member can serve as chairman or ranking member of a committee to try to fend off potential turf wars.

Currently, chairmen are term-limited to six years, but some Members have made the argument that the rule is unclear and should allow for six years as chairman, and six years as ranking member.

DOJ_NMG_0096067

Transportation and Infrastructure Chairman Don Young (Alaska) and Judiciary Chairman Jim Sensenbrenner (Wis.) are term-limited, but both are expected to try to claim rights to the ranking memberships on their committees due to their interpretation of the rule.

Additionally, GOP leadership sources have suggested that Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (Calif.), who is under federal investigation, may not be able to hold on to the ranking member slot when it comes before Steering. When asked Friday if he expected to serve as the ranking member in the 110th Congress, Lewis deferred. "That is a pay grade that's different than mine," he said.

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.) is expected to get the ranking slot on the House Ways and Means Committee. McCrery is a close Boehner ally and gave a nominating speech for Boehner during elections last Friday.

As leader, Boehner will have sole decision-making power over who will head up a handful of committees, including Rules, House Administration, Intelligence and ethics.

According to knowledgeable GOP sources, Rules Chairman David Dreier (Calif.) is expected to remain as ranking member as the exclusive committee is not subject to term limits.

Similarly, Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra (Mich.), a public Boehner supporter, is also expected to remain. Ethics Chairman Doc Hastings (Wash.), who currently is investigating the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and his interaction with underage male House pages, is expected to remain on the panel if asked.

Also Friday, the incoming Republican freshman Members held class elections. Rep.-elect Bill Sali (Idaho) is class president, Rep.-elect Doug Lamborn (Colo.) will serve as the representative to leadership, Rep.-elect Adrian Smith (Neb.) will serve as representative to the Policy Committee, and Rep.-elect Kevin McCarthy (Calif.) will serve as the freshman representative on the Steering Committee.

Leadership Lessons (WSJ)

November 20, 2006; Page A16

House Democrats and Republicans elected their leaders for the next Congress last week, and the results suggest there's a reason Democrats will have the majority. They seem to have absorbed the election's lessons better than the GOP.

Rank-and-file Democrats ignored Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi's endorsement of Pennsylvania's John Murtha as majority leader and instead voted to keep Maryland's Steny Hoyer as their second in command. The vote was a rout, 149 to 86, despite not-so-veiled leadership threats about committee assignments for those who favored Mr. Hoyer. In rejecting the ethically challenged Mr. Murtha, Democrats showed good judgment and a desire to set a higher ethical tone than have the Tom DeLay Republicans.

Despite their recent defeat, however, Republicans also easily re-elected their top two leaders in the face of challenges from younger conservatives. Ohio's John Boehner, the new minority leader, had only taken over from Mr. DeLay in January and so he could fairly dodge some responsibility for this month's debacle. On the other hand, Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri was a key part of Team DeLay, in addition to being a vocal defender of spending earmarks and pork-barrel incumbent protection.

House Republicans are talking a good game of recovering their small-government principles, but their leadership choices suggest they think their defeat had little to do with their own image or performance. Instead -- and we also hear these whispers privately -- they blame everything on President Bush and Iraq. Mr. Blunt is said to have impressed the Members with a plan to defeat freshman Democrats in 2008; so much for self-reflection and new ideas.

The Revival Of Trent Lott (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, November 27, 2006

Hello, Mr. President. This is Lazarus speaking." That is how Trent Lott answered a phone call last week from George W. Bush, the man who helped force him out of the Senate's top job in 2002 after Lott praised Strom Thurmond's 1948 segregationist presidential campaign. Maybe Lott is selling himself short. After all, Lazarus was in the tomb for only four days, but it took Lott, 65, four years to mount the improbable comeback that culminated in his election last Wednesday as minority whip, the second most powerful G.O.P. position in the Senate. But if Bush, who called from Air Force One en route to Singapore, was spooked by the Mississippi Senator's resurrection, he did his best to hide it. Lott says Bush laughed off the Lazarus analogy and said, "Well, we're looking forward to working with you."

Why would Senate Republicans choose the controversial Lott after an electoral drubbing that saw them lose, among other things, the hard-fought progress they had made with nonwhite voters, especially African Americans? And why pick someone who is known to have an ax to grind with the White House at a time when the party should regroup and unify?

The answer is that Lott won (by one vote over Tennessee's Lamar Alexander) because he spent the past four years quietly making himself as useful as possible to his colleagues. He lent his old strengths as a backroom dealmaker and a master of arcane Senate rules to sometimes thankless tasks. He not only won back allies that way, but he also sharpened the exact skills that his party will need for the next two years, when its main goal will be to stop Democratic bills from seeing the light of day, let alone the President's desk. As the whip--a position named after the switch-wielding valet at fox hunts who keeps the hounds in line--Lott will keep his party disciplined and frustrate the Democrats with amendments and filibusters. "He understands the rules. He's a strong negotiator," says New Hampshire's Senator John Sununu. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich says he's "the smartest legislative politician I've ever met." Even Senator Ted Kennedy calls him a "worthy opponent."

And smooth relations with the Bush White House aren't the priority they used to be. In the upcoming Congress, with every Republican Senator seemingly running for re-election or for President, proof of one's independence from the White House will be an asset, not a liability, especially if Bush's approval ratings remain mired in the mid-30s. As he was campaigning for the whip job, Lott says, he told his colleagues that when it came to White House pressure, "there's nothing they can do to me or for me that they haven't already done. I'm not mad, but I am a little bit of a liberated guy these days."

The Democrats are the ones who should fear Lott the most: they are desperate to pass bills that will show voters they can govern. That might explain why some of them are already trying to reach across the aisle to him. While Mel Watt of the House Congressional Black Caucus released a statement after Lott's election saying, "The sting of Trent Lott's hurtful words are unlikely to expire anytime soon," Barack Obama, the freshman Senator from Illinois, seemed not to carry a grudge as he left the Senate floor the day after Lott's victory. "[Lott] obviously paid a price and comes back a little bit wiser, as all of us hopefully do after a mistake," Obama said.

The White House is doing its best to mend fences too. Vice President Dick Cheney, an old hunting buddy of Lott's from their days together in the House, called him soon after the Senate vote. And as I was interviewing Lott late last Thursday evening, Rob Portman, the White House director of Management and Budget, patiently waited until I finished so that he could tell me how great he thought Lott was. "He's very effective," Portman said. "He's a skilled tactician and strategist. A rare combination of unparalleled experience."

By then Lott had moved back to the floor of the Senate, where he was working the room, accepting one congratulatory handshake after another for his return to power. When one well wisher added his compliments to the chorus, Lott beamed at him and called out in his trademark baritone, "Hey, hey! I can still count votes!"

'Gang Of 14' Mulls Script For Next Act (RC)

By Emily Pierce And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Having successfully averted what could have been an explosive partisan showdown over judges in the Senate last year, Senators in the "Gang of 14" believe they have attained a relevancy that will allow them to play an even more prominent role in the 110th Congress — not just on judicial nominations but on other issues as well.

Though their original mission vanishes at the end of this year, Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) said she expects that a broader role for the holdover gang members, and perhaps other like-minded Senators, likely will develop in the coming weeks.

It will be "somewhat formal, it will be regular and it will be real," she said.

"The 12 of us still remaining [in the Senate] will have that discussion sometime soon to see what the mood is. There have been many individual and group meetings about how to advance a civil and productive agenda."

DOJ_NMG_0096069

Landrieu said that while the details haven't been worked out, she expects that several of the gang's Democratic Senators, and perhaps more, will participate. On the Republican side, the Louisiana Democrat said, Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) is helping lead efforts to engage the gang's GOP Senators and other moderates.

Other Gang of 14 members, echoing Landrieu, said that now, more than ever, they have a part to play in helping negotiate agreements and advance legislation around which both parties can agree.

This possible re-emergence of the gang comes even though the group saw two key GOP players — Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) — go down in defeat on Nov. 7.

Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), who led the group along with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), said the gang would be useful in instances "where the leadership can't get together," such as "issues that otherwise get snagged or require 60 votes" to overcome a filibuster.

It was the filibuster of 10 judges that prompted the gang's genesis. With a majority of Democrats blocking judges during the 108th Congress and again in the spring of 2005, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) came close to invoking the "nuclear" option, in which he would demand a ruling from the chairman that filibustering judges is unconstitutional.

Frist would have needed only 51 votes to ratify that ruling, rather than the 60 needed to break a filibuster, and such a maneuver would have eviscerated the ability of the Senate minority to block objectionable judicial nominees for years to come.

Then the Gang of 14 — seven Republicans and seven Democrats — emerged, pledging to oppose filibusters of judges except in "extraordinary circumstances," in exchange for all of them voting against the nuclear option — enough to rule out the maneuver.

Because of the bipartisan deal, Frist never brought up the nuclear option for a vote; several controversial judges were voted through, while Democrats could continue to block other nominees, the gang agreed.

Though he supported the nuclear option at the time, Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said, "In retrospect, I have to admit they served a useful purpose in diffusing a stalemate. ... Looking back, the outcome was positive."

Cornyn said he could envision the remaining members — Nelson, McCain, Landrieu and Collins, plus Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), Olympia Snowe (R-Maine), John Warner (R-Va.), Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) and Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii) — playing a similar role in upcoming judicial and policy battles.

"Those Senators could very well serve a useful function," Cornyn said.

Graham acknowledged that the most recent Senate fight over judicial nominations almost certainly is a chapter for the history books. But he said the group has not lost sight of its guiding philosophy, saying, "The idea of maintaining a functioning Senate and not destroying the judiciary will always have resonance and viability."

"It could spill into other areas after we've lived through that experience," he said. "We get along very well on a variety of issues, not just judges."

Salazar said that he, too, believes the original gang members can remain integral players going forward. He pointed to issues such as immigration reform, where a centrist-oriented group worked behind the scenes to try to broker a Senate deal earlier this year.

Salazar said he's hopeful that gang members "will have a reason to come up with an agenda" in the next Congress.

Nelson agreed, saying that one option may be for the gang to devise a compromise budget next year.

And even with pledges by President Bush and incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to renew efforts at bipartisanship, gang members suggested that there will be a need for them to step in. In fact, the future balance of power may make the gang even more essential than before to helping broker compromise, Senators said.

"With a Republican president and a Democratic Congress, there will have to be bridge builders," Landrieu said. "We're not about compromising our principles. We're just trying to find common ground."

Pryor agreed, but added that he believes the extreme partisanship that has characterized the past few years would be less common with Reid at the helm.

"I don't think you're going to see as many politically charged issues that come through" the Senate, he said.

On judicial nominations, Senators in the gang said they still could be relevant, but likely less so, given that the dynamics will be radically changed in the 110th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0096070

Republicans won't have the 51 votes they'd need to institute the nuclear option and force votes on nominees. What's more, Reid will have the power to stop any nomination — not just judges — from coming to the Senate floor. Plus, incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) can simply refuse to schedule committee hearings and votes.

Cornyn acknowledged that his party would have a "tougher" time pushing judicial nominations this year.

"It's not like an amendment that we can offer to a bill," he said. "We've got to get them out of committee."

Nelson acknowledged that the gang would have less sway over judicial nominations, because "I don't see the Gang of 14 working to get a name brought up. By the same token, there are other steps that could be taken. Something could be done informally, rather than formally."

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the newly elected Minority Whip for the next Congress, helped form the Gang of 14 before dropping out in deference to Frist. Lott said he foresees instances in which gang members could influence whether a judicial nomination is brought up, simply by stating whether they believe a nominee meets the filibuster test they agreed to.

In any case, he said, the spirit of the Gang of 14 most definitely will live on: "It's the kind of thinking and cooperation that we've got to do a little more of."

Compromised (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

During the recent off-year elections, the president repeatedly pointed to the booming economy and noted that his tax cuts were responsible. With growth strong and unemployment low despite the ending of the stock-market bubble, terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, he had every reason to be proud. Moreover, both economic theory and the actual timing of the economic revival support his claims regarding the tax cuts.

That is why it is so odd that rumors swarm around Washington that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a "deal" on entitlement reform. In particular, the rumors suggest the president might be willing to get rid of the provision that caps the income level used to compute Social Security taxes and benefits. These rumors aren't without substance; last year the president would not rule out raising the cap when asked.

Doing so would raise the marginal tax rate on the entrepreneurs that Mr. Bush credits for having led the economic recovery by more than 10 percentage points. The new effective rate would be five percentage points above the level when he took office. Moreover, in 2011, the rate would go up a further 4.3 percentage points to an effective 53% marginal rate on entrepreneurial income. The president would thus be not just raising taxes on entrepreneurs to well above the levels that prevailed in the Clinton administration, but to a rate higher than that which prevailed in the Carter administration. Most of the improved incentives for entrepreneurship and work brought about under Reagan would be repealed.

Should the president do this, he doubtless would be thinking that saving Social Security would be worth the price. He would be wrong. In practice this idea would both destroy the basis on which Social Security was started and fail to produce the expected revenue that supposedly would save the system. Social Security was set up as a contributory pension plan, not a welfare scheme. Benefits are linked, by statutory formula, to contributions. Congress and the president could choose to maintain this relationship. Traditional supporters of Social Security like AARP have long insisted on this link and argued against turning the program into another welfare plan by ending the linkage between contributions and benefits.

There are two problems with that approach. First, an increase in the cap on taxes and benefits would produce very little net revenue for the system. Even if one assumed higher taxes did not hurt the economy, the increased benefits would consume much of any increased revenue. Second, the benefits that high income people would get would be politically unsustainable. A retiree who earned a million per year would receive a monthly Social Security benefit of $13,500. This is politically unimaginable. So, expect both the universality of Social Security and the link between taxes and benefits to go, and this most enduring element of the New Deal to become a welfare program.

But it is the damage to the economy and to the fiscal system that is more important. Economists differ on how much such a dramatic increase in tax rates on entrepreneurs would damage the economy. Certainly given the statements of the president earlier this year he believes it would be significant. Consider some figures.

Published IRS data from 2004 show that taxpayers with incomes over $100,000 earned $1.9 trillion in wages, salaries, bonuses and self-employment income. Of that, roughly $800 billion was above the Social Security maximum tax threshold. Levying the 12.4% Social Security tax on that income would produce $99 billion in revenue. Of that, employers and the self-employed would be able to deduct half of that tax from their corporate or personal tax returns. Thus, $17.4 billion of the $99 billion would not be a net gain to the Treasury, but a transfer from the general fund to the Social Security trust fund. So the net gain to the government would have been about $82 billion in 2004.

That assumes that taxpayers would not have changed their behavior when their marginal tax rate rose to 48.6% from 38.4%. No one believes that, although economists do disagree on how much. These are a very sophisticated group of taxpayers with both the knowledge and the means to adjust to taxation by changing the form of business, converting income to capital gains, or other methods. A cautious estimate that enjoys wide acceptance in the tax community says that for every 1% reduction in the share of their income they take home, high income individuals cut their taxable earnings by four-tenths of a percent. My own research from the Reagan tax cuts indicates the response by this group is higher, roughly seven-tenths of 1%.

Although these numbers may seem small, when they are applied to a massive tax rate increase like this, they can have important ramifications. Remember, taxpayers will be seeing the share of income they keep dropping from roughly 61 cents on the dollar to just 51 cents -- and that is before state taxes are figured in. This implies a decline in the tax base of between 7% and 13%.

Under the lower assumption, total federal revenues would only increase by $27 billion, with the behavioral response of taxpayers offsetting 70% of the static revenue increase. True, Social Security tax revenues would still rise by $82 billion, but this would be offset by a net decline in personal income taxes of $55 billion. Under the higher assumption about a behavioral response, total federal revenues would decline. While Social Security taxes would rise by $69 billion, personal income taxes would drop by $95 billion.

Whatever one's assumption, lifting the Social Security tax cap would have to be viewed as an economically and fiscally risky proposition. I seriously doubt that the president would be interested in agreeing to a deal that purports to "save Social Security" when the reality is that it seriously undermines the economic and fiscal basis that underpins the system.

There is another argument that the president will have heard that might persuade him to do what the rumors say he is considering: fairness. It is true that high income earners do not pay Social Security taxes on all of their earnings. As already noted, it is also true that they do not receive benefits on those earnings. So, if you think that Social Security should be a welfare program with benefits unlinked to contributions, then in a sense this may be unfair.

But, consider the total tax system. An urban myth has arisen that the so-called "rich" do not pay their "fair share" of taxes despite the fact that the top 10% of taxpayers pay 68% of federal income taxes in the country. A comparison between a relatively high-income entrepreneur, of which I am one, and a "typical" worker might be illustrative.

Last year an entrepreneur similar to me would have paid federal taxes equal to 33.9% of total income. That is, income before any exemptions, exclusions, adjustments or deductions. By this measure all of the fringe benefits that an entrepreneur provides himself as a self-employed individual are included in income. His federal income taxes and the employer and employee shares of his Social Security taxes are all counted as "taxes."

For comparison, consider a married worker earning a salary of $75,000, who like our entrepreneur, has three children. To compute his total income on the same basis, I gave him the same level of benefits as an average worker and the same level of capital income as others making his income. I also followed convention to impute to him both his own Social Security taxes and all of those paid by his employer. On that basis, his average tax rate was 14.5%.

Based on a 40-hour week, while he finishes paying his Federal taxes on Monday afternoon at 2:48, our entrepreneur will work all day Monday until about the same time on Tuesday until he finishes, another full day. If the plan to eliminate the cap on Social Security earnings is adopted, he will work all day Monday, all day Tuesday, and then Wednesday morning until 10:26 to finish paying his federal taxes. Then he can start paying his state taxes.

That assumes he keeps working as hard as he is and doesn't rearrange his income to take more fringe benefits or shelter it in other ways. This suggests another way to think about just how risky this plan is. Using those 2004 figures cited above, all it would take would be for one of these workers in ten to decide it wasn't worth it to work until 10:30 Wednesday morning just to pay

Uncle Sam and this plan the president is reportedly considering would actually cost government tax revenue. Don't make it too tough on him, or Atlas may actually decide to shrug.

Mr. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group, was President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002.

Picking Up Where Ron Brown Left Off

One was a snazzy dresser, a major African-American force who thrived on the Washington social circuit. The other is a buttoneddown white Vermonter, an excitable but nerdy med school kind of guy. But there's something about the similarities between the late Democratic National Committee Chairman Ron Brown and current DNC boss, Howard Dean, that has folks talking--even Dean. "My model is Ron Brown," he says flatly. Don't laugh. Sure, their personalities and styles are radically different, but party insiders and friends of both say Dean has attacked his job of reforming the party just as Brown did--with similarly winning results.

Some examples: Both entered the job as outsiders under fire from moderates who worried that they were too liberal. Both surprised the establishment by raising tons of money. Both took a shattered party and built a national organization geared to winning a presidential election. "He was incredibly inclusive, and he was an outsider, of course," Dean says," so I identify with him that way." And both focused on the key Democratic demographic-- blacks. Brown brought African-Americans to the table. Dean, who's studied Tracey Brown's bio of her dad, wants more: putting more blacks on the ballot. "It's going to be about opportunities and a place on the ticket," says Dean. "Ron Brown was really the beginning of that."

Why Not Impeach Bush? Dick Cheney

The degree to which the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill despises Vice President Dick Cheney is a big plus for President Bush. Consider why incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid scrapped an idea to impeach Bush: "Two words: Dick Cheney," he says, joking that it would vault the veep into the Oval Office.

Globe-trotting to Iraq Hot Spots

The troops in Iraq are about to get their hoops fix, thanks to the storied Harlem Globetrotters. The team of roundball magicians departs November 25, visiting Iraq as part of a 21-day trip to 12 bases in the Middle East. And, yes, owner Mannie Jackson and his 10 stars will return in time for the 193-city U.S.-Canada "Nothing Like It" tour opening December 26.

These Marines Forgive and Forget

It was party time for Sen. John Kerry's staff and alumni from his 2004 presidential campaign last week at the Democrat's favorite Capitol Hill hangout across from the U.S. Marine Corps Barracks and HQ when a group of marines approached him. But they didn't scold him for recently suggesting that the military attracts mediocre students. Instead, they yukked it up and even bought the vet a shot of tequila--which he downed.

Score One for the Airport Ziploc Rule

Kip Hawley is a rarity among federal execs: He relishes the chance to experience their own onerous security rules. While traveling, the head of the Transportation Security Administration has been looking to see if the new rule requiring that small amounts of liquids be put in zip-top bags is a good one. With stops in St. Louis, Orlando, and even Brussels, he finds it A-OK. "It's great to see [our screeners] doing such a top-notch job," says Hawley.

MSNBC, CNN Hop Democratic Wave

There's lots of buzz in the cable TV world that having Democrats running Congress will hurt Fox and help MSNBC and CNN. It certainly looked like that election night when CNN won the key viewership demographic of 25-to-54-year-olds. "We're clearly the place to go for information," CNN boss Jon Klein tells us. "Maybe the trick is that you have to actually cover politics. The public seems to be in the mood for facts and information-- not cheerleading." MSNBC, No. 3 but surging, also crowed: "MSNBC is the place for politics." So what about Fox? It simply turned to the numbers. And they show that Fox is still No. 1, with its audience growing. "We'll let the two cable news alsorans battle for second place, and we wish Jon and [MSNBC] well on their quest for relevancy," says an amused Foxie.

From Red Meat to Haute Couture

The conservative American Enterprise Institute has scrapped its magazine and replaced it with a new glossy, The American. Unlike the think tank's old political rag, the jazzy new one is all business and economics, six times per year. "Our perspective," says editor James Glassman, "is not partisan, but it is rooted in liberal, free-market economics." There are no editorials and foreign-policy manifestos. Instead, Reaganite Michael Ledeen writes about why Naples became the center of men's high fashion. It's an old model: The lively conservative American Spectator tried the same thing before finally switching back to politics.

Worse Than the White House Press

Former President Clinton is probably rethinking just how tough his White House press corps actually was. His office tells us that after he spoke in Mexico last week, reporters blocked his motorcade, then kicked and punched his security agents, prompting one to draw his weapon and order them out of the way. Clinton was fine. So what was the problema? Clinton's Jay Carson says, "Who knows?"

Paulson Set To Address US Market Rules (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, will on Monday say what the US needs to do to ensure that its markets remain globally competitive in a landmark speech on capital market regulation.

The move comes amid growing concern in the US that New York is losing out to emerging financial centres in Asia and to London, with its lighter-touch, principles-based regulatory regime.

It is also a sign that the concerns on Wall Street about the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate compliance and controls laws have moved higher up the agenda in Washington since the arrival at the Treasury three months ago of the former Goldman Sachs chief executive.

Senior figures, including Dick Cheney, the vice-president, have said that Sarbox may have gone too far.

But there is increasing recognition that the issue goes well beyond Sarbox, encompassing the entire US regulatory and legal landscape, particularly the proliferation of class-action lawsuits, liability issues and overlapping securities regulations.

Mr Paulson is understood to be aware of the need for a re-examination of US regulation in the light of international competition, cross-border merger of equity and derivatives exchanges and competition between public and private enforcement efforts, which have led to over-zealous corporate litigation.

One senior official said Mr Paulson's arrival at the Treasury had helped "tie a lot of these things together and helped structure a response" in Washington at the President's Working Group of Financial Markets, composed of the heads of the Federal Reserve, Treasury, Securities and Exchange Commission and Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

"I expect the secretary will address an array of issues that impact our capital markets – ranging from our corporate governance requirements to our legal system," said Rob Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a lobby group that represents the chief executives of financial companies.

Policymakers see a need to update the regulatory architecture in the US in the light of rapid innovation, which is blurring the distinction between traditionally separate asset classes.

A growing number of executives think the US could learn some lessons from regulatory practice in the UK and elsewhere, where a "principles-based" regulation takes a more flexible approach to accounting and market oversight than a "rules-based" system in place since the 1930s in the US.

John Thain, New York Stock Exchange CEO, recently warned that the US needed to "rebalance" its regulatory framework.

Paulson's Stance: Review U.S. Rules Hindering Markets (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096074

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, in a speech scheduled for delivery to the Economic Club of New York today, will press the case for a re-examination of government rules and laws he believes are putting U.S. financial markets at a disadvantage amid competition from abroad.

Mr. Paulson, in his first major public comments since Democrats won control of Congress, is expected to stress the need for "regulatory balance" and to outline challenges regulators and policy makers face as they try to juggle the need for regulation with the imperative to make U.S. markets competitive.

He isn't expected to call for any new laws or for repeal of any rules, but Mr. Paulson will emphasize the impact of existing regulations, the legal environment, and the complexity of dealing with multiple, overlapping regulators. He likely will call on federal regulators to tweak a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, known as Section 404, that requires companies to assess internal controls to ensure financial reporting is accurate and reliable. The Securities and Exchange Commission has said it plans to address that by the end of the year.

Mr. Paulson's speech comes amid a chorus of complaints by business that the regulatory and legal climate in the U.S. puts companies at a disadvantage, driving some firms overseas. Business leaders say the cost of doing business in the U.S. has increased, pointing to the Sarbanes-Oxley law passed in the wake of corporate scandals, class-action lawsuits, and a crackdown by state and federal law enforcement.

Many investor and consumer advocates argue that U.S. capital markets remain the most competitive in the world and regulation has helped attract capital by offering protections.

Since leaving Goldman Sachs Group Inc. to take the reins at Treasury, Mr. Paulson has identified market competitiveness as a domestic priority and backed a private-sector effort to recommend changes to laws and rules that critics say handicap U.S. companies.

The Match Maker How A U.S. Official Promotes Marriage To Help Poor Kids (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

The notion that government can help children escape poverty by promoting marriage for their parents was once considered a fringe idea from right field. It is now federal policy.

In very large part, that's due to Wade Horn, a child psychologist turned bureaucrat who has put marriage atop the Bush administration's limited antipoverty agenda.

As head of the federal Administration for Children and Families, Dr. Horn has employed the zeal of an ideologue and the discipline of an academic to inject marriage promotion into a host of government programs under his purview, even before Congress authorized an official marriage program. Today, more than 200 programs are at work across the country, seeking to change public attitudes surrounding marriage, persuade teenagers to aspire to matrimony and teach relationship skills to young couples.

Along the way, Dr. Horn has co-opted critics, fine-tuned his rhetoric, and persuaded Congress to insert his marriage agenda into this year's welfare legislation, winning $500 million over five years. A host of grants were doled out last month, to organizations ranging from large coalitions of social-services groups to antiabortion pregnancy-counseling centers that plan relationship classes for teens.

"Wade Horn has shown the influence a bureaucrat can have," says Ronald Haskins, a welfare expert who has worked for Congress and the current President Bush's White House. "Anything that wasn't nailed down over there is now devoted to marriage."

Not everyone is persuaded. Women's groups say his emphasis on marriage unfairly demonizes unwed mothers, and pressures women to stay in sometimes unhealthy, violent relationships. Libertarians say government has no business using tax dollars to probe so deeply into people's personal lives. Some note that there's no proof yet that any of these efforts can work. Others say the money would be better spent elsewhere.

The idea that poverty is, in significant measure, the result of broken families and unwed mothers has been contentious since Daniel Patrick Moynihan's controversial 1965 warning that the disintegrating black family was an obstacle to black advancement. In that year, 8% of children were born to unmarried parents. Today, more than one-third of all children -- and nearly 70% of black children -- are.

Study after study show children are better off in two-parent homes. They are less likely to be poor, drop out of school, become teen parents or get arrested. The theory: Two parents bring stability and emotional support to children and one another, not to mention providing two incomes. But can government do anything to actually promote marriage? And should it? 3

Dr. Horn offers an emphatic yes, and saw proof on a recent evening in Baltimore where he observed six couples participating in a federally funded effort called Building Strong Families. The program, being tried in seven cities, hosts weekly discussions for unmarried couples who have recently had or are about to have a baby. It doesn't specifically push couples to marry, but the curriculum sets out marriage as the ideal. Group leaders regularly mention marriage. Posters on the wall proclaim "Marriage Works."

On that evening, Myckel Cobbs, age 24, talked about how trust and openness come hard to him. But since meeting his girlfriend, Tashanna Harvey, 21, and joining the Baltimore program, things seemed different. "I came up on the streets, no family," he explained, glancing at Ms. Harvey, nearly nine months pregnant with their child. Now, "this is my family, with her."

On the drive back to Washington, Dr. Horn was still thinking about Mr. Cobbs's fatherless childhood. "Here they are, this young couple, trying to break that cycle. It takes a lot of courage," he said. "If this works, the real impact will be on their kids."

Six years into the Bush administration, Dr. Horn is one of the few remaining political appointees interested in "compassionate conservatism," the slogan from the President's first campaign. Mr. Haskins, now with the Brookings Institution, advised the White House on welfare for only a year. Political-science professor John Dilulio launched the White House's faith-based initiative to direct federal dollars to religious charities, but left after less than a year.

Dr. Horn endured in the Department of Health and Human Services, using his position to push the theory that families with married parents can pave the path out of poverty.

Even before Congress authorized the marriage program in the welfare bill, Dr. Horn began using discretionary funds from his Administration for Children and Families to inject marriage promotion into the agency's programs -- ranging from refugee assistance to aid for Indian tribes to child-support enforcement. The efforts included marriage-awareness campaigns and couples classes. Over its first four years, his patchwork of spending added up to a $200 million program, which Dr. Horn dubbed the Healthy Marriage Initiative.

Dr. Horn didn't always succeed. He failed to get similar marriage-promotion efforts into Head Start, the preschool program, in the face of opposition. "We've never had parents request that," says Sarah Green, president of the National Head Start Association. "Most of them want help in how to get out of marriages that are not healthy." Dr. Horn says he dropped his marriage proposal in order to focus on other Head Start priorities.

Dr. Horn, 51, grew up in New Jersey, one of seven children of a liberal mother and conservative father. Over dinner, they would disagree about Vietnam, Watergate and abortion, he says, yet "no one remembers my parents leaving the table mad at each other."

He earned a doctorate in child psychology at Southern Illinois University and went into practice. He and his wife, Claudia, and their two daughters, moved to Washington in 1986 because Claudia, now a consultant, was promoted to be the associate rehabilitation director at the national headquarters of Goodwill Industries.

'OUR MOST VITAL SOCIAL INSTITUTION'

Read excerpts4 from Wade Horn's speeches, writings and statements to the press from over the past 10 years.

During his years as a therapist, he got interested in the importance of marriage. A divorcing couple asked if he would work with their child to "be sure the child was not impacted by divorce in any way," he recalls. "It was so cavalier. I won't go along with the idea that it is perfectly OK to assume divorce will have no impact on children."

He helped write policy papers for the first President Bush's 1988 presidential campaign and afterward landed the post of HHS commissioner for children, youth and families at age 34.

In 1989, the president appointed him to a commission on children, chaired by Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D., W.Va.). Dr. Horn successfully pushed to have the final report include rhetoric condemning divorce and out-of-wedlock childbearing as bad for children. The White House, fearing Sen. Rockefeller might challenge Mr. Bush for president in 1992, leaned heavily on Dr. Horn to vote against the final report. But Dr. Horn thought Sen. Rockefeller had accommodated his concerns and voted yes. The report was approved unanimously.

After President Bush's 1992 loss left him without a job, Dr. Horn joined the burgeoning fatherhood movement, launching the private National Fatherhood Initiative, which promotes the notion that fathers have a special role to play that isn't always appreciated.

During those years, Dr. Horn also began thinking about the incentives built into the welfare system that discouraged marriage, such as reducing government benefits for women who got married. Social workers were known to hunt through homes and cut women off welfare if there was a man present. It was no surprise that few single moms married, he says, because the message was, "Don't do it."

BUSH SPEAKS

"As we reduce welfare case loads, we must improve the lives of children. And the most effective, direct way to improve the lives of children is to encourage the stability of American families."

Read the full text5 of the February 2002 speech at the White House Web site.

Then in a 1997 paper published by the Hudson Institute, a conservative think tank, Dr. Horn proposed reversing these incentives for programs such as public housing. "Only after all income-eligible, married, two-parent families are offered the benefit should it become available for income-eligible, single-parent families," he wrote.

After President Bush took office in 2001, he nominated Dr. Horn for an assistant secretary's post at HHS, but 90 groups opposed his confirmation, citing the 1997 paper and complaining his policies would keep women trapped in violent, unhealthy relationships out of fear of losing benefits.

In the hearings, Dr. Horn renounced his earlier comments, saying he was now convinced that preference for married people in social services could translate into discrimination against single moms. Sen. Rockefeller vouched for him and he was easily confirmed.

A key assignment for Dr. Horn was to help develop the Bush administration's proposal for renewing the 1996 welfare law. He pushed to include funding for marriage promotion, despite some reluctance from his boss, HHS Secretary Tommy Thompson. "It wasn't my first priority," Mr. Thompson acknowledges, but says he came to see the political advantages. "The religious right certainly found this a plus and we could find more supporters" for the legislation.

As the job of hashing out welfare reauthorization shifted to Congress, Dr. Horn worked to mollify his critics. He directed that every program work with local domestic-violence experts. And he agreed to hire a domestic-violence expert as part of the national program team.

"One of the smartest things I did," Dr. Horn says, "was put the word 'healthy' in front of 'marriage.'" Every speech and handout on the initiative now uses that phrase.

He also was careful to steer clear of religious overtones. Dr. Horn is religious and active in his Presbyterian church. But he avoids using religious arguments to make the case for marriage.

Dr. Horn put Diann Dawson, a 27-year HHS veteran and an African-American, in charge of outreach to the black community. And, to woo welfare experts and academics eager to attack the program as ideological and unsupported by research, Dr. Horn incorporated evaluation requirements into many early programs and recruited prominent researchers in the field to study them. "He co-opted the whole damn academic world," Mr. Haskins, the onetime White House aide, says admiringly.

He still faced opponents. In Congress, the most vocal was Sen. Max Baucus, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, who reflected Montana's libertarian leanings. Marriage is a "personal and private choice, not something the government should interfere with," he told a Washington rally on the welfare bill in March 2002.

To help negotiate the welfare legislation, Sen. Baucus in 2004 hired Kate Kahan, now 32, a single mother and former welfare-rights organizer. Pregnant at 18, Ms. Kahan had married the father, then left him after a year and a half because she says he was violent. She and Sen. Baucus knew that the welfare bill inevitably was going to include a marriage program, but she fought for explicit protections: a promise that the domestic-violence experts hired would be experienced and qualified, and guarantees the programs would be voluntary. Dr. Horn, insulted that anyone would question his commitment to protecting women, pushed back.

WHAT QUALIFIES

Eight types of activities may be funded under the Bush administration's "Healthy Marriage Initiative." • Public advertising campaigns on the value of marriage and the skills needed to increase marital stability and health.

• Education in high schools on the value of marriage, relationship skills and budgeting.

• Marriage education, marriage skills and relationship skills programs that may include parenting skills, financial management, conflict resolution and job and career advancement for non-married pregnant women and non-married expectant fathers.

• Pre-marital education and marriage skills training for engaged couples and for couples or persons interested in marriage.

• Marriage enhancement and marriage skills training programs for married couples.

• Divorce reduction programs that teach relationship skills.

• Marriage mentoring programs, which use married couples as role models and mentors in at-risk communities.

• Programs to reduce the disincentives to marriage in means-tested aid programs if offered in conjunction with any of the other seven activities.

See a list of programs6 that were awarded money in the most recent round of funding.

The tension came to a head at a meeting during negotiations aimed at writing a bipartisan bill. Ms. Kahan was surprised to find Dr. Horn there. By her account, he began by asking what Sen. Baucus had against marriage. Ms. Kahan shot back that the senator is not against marriage but had more questions than answers about government promoting it. In any case, she said, poverty is complex and isn't going to be solved with marriage classes. Frustrated by her repeated insistence on that point, Dr. Horn threatened to walk out of the room, according to two people in the meeting.

After that, the two couldn't be in the same room, those involved in the talks say, and a Republican Senate staffer says she resorted to "shuttle diplomacy."

Dr. Horn says that characterization overstates the tension. But he allows that he sometimes aggravates his opponents. "There are times when I may push a little bit harder than other people may feel comfortable," Dr. Horn says, adding that he doesn't recall the specific debates with Ms. Kahan. A Republican staffer who participated in the talks confirmed Ms. Kahan's account.

When the welfare bill finally passed Congress early this year, there was $500 million for marriage promotion -- minus the specific guarantees Ms. Kahan had fought for.

Among the programs that received the recent round of grants from HHS last month, some are religious groups, though the recipients say they won't use the federal money to promote religion. For instance, the Meier Clinics Foundation of Wheaton, Ill., which won $2 million, is a Christian counseling group whose Web site gives marriage tips starting with: "Sincerely commit your life to Jesus Christ as Lord." The group plans to conduct relationship classes for teens.

Other recipients are secular organizations, such as the National Multiple Sclerosis Society, which plans to spend $531,000 on marriage education for couples where one spouse is struggling with MS.

Although the newly funded programs are just beginning, previously funded programs are being studied to see how well they work. Research suggests marriage education works for middle-class white families; the new studies will see if it works with poor, nonwhite couples.

In the Building Strong Families program in Baltimore, couples are randomly assigned either to join the program, or to receive no services but be contacted later for follow-up. Researchers will study the relationships -- including how many pairs marry -- and the couples' children.

On the night Dr. Horn visited Baltimore, he spoke to the young couples, without using the word marriage. "There's not a couple that doesn't have problems. It's work," he said. "But it's really worth it when you look at your kids."

Disputed Fla. Race Could Go To House (RC)

By John Mcardle And Matthew Murray

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096078

With five House races around the country still unresolved as of Friday, election watchers on Capitol Hill believe it is increasingly likely that the contest for the open Florida 13th district seat could end up before the House Administration Committee, which has oversight over federal elections.

Florida's 13th district, where bank executive Christine Jennings (D) and auto dealer Vern Buchanan (R) are competing for the right to replace Rep. Katherine Harris (R) — who, as Florida secretary of state in 2000, was a major player in the disputed presidential election — remains the only district where both Democratic and Republican House Administration Committee staff continue to have observers on the ground. Those observers act as the committee's eyes and ears to monitor the recount and certification process if it appears there is a chance that the race might be contested.

But just as the election itself is under dispute — Buchanan was leading Jennings by 401 votes as of Friday at press time — the process for determining who decides on the winner also could be controversial, with the House about to switch hands from the Republicans to the Democrats.

Florida state election officials are slated to certify the election results Monday morning. But the contest has been marred by allegations of voting irregularities in Sarasota County.

Democrats claim electronic voting machines are to blame for almost 19,000 missing votes in the Jennings-Buchanan contest.

But while Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, concedes that there was a high number of "undervotes" in the Jennings-Buchanan race, he said, "there is no evidence to suggest that anyone in district 13 who wanted to vote was unable to do so."

Patru added that all of the recounts in the race have produced the same result — Buchanan winning narrowly.

"The automated recount and subsequent manual recounts, it's like a skipping CD — you just keep hearing 'Vern Buchanan won,'" he said. "It's a matter of time before Christine Jennings concedes."

Nevertheless, Florida elections officials are about to proceed with an audit of the equipment used in the 13th district elections. By today, Buchanan's campaign must appoint a representative to the state panel that will be conducting the audit.

A source close to Buchanan said the campaign was in the process of "acquiring" an expert to represent the campaign in the audit. Barring any developments over the weekend, the audit could be the only recourse for Jennings. Then she'd have to decide whether to take her challenge of the election results to the House.

If the audit "is done in a fair way and it's an open process, that's where we might start to get some answers," said David Kochman, a Jennings campaign spokesman.

Candidates have 30 days after a race is certified by state officials to officially contest their race with the House Administration Committee. Once an election is contested, the committee appoints a panel of two majority members and one minority member to head up its investigation.

Along with a report on the investigation, the committee also is charged with coming up with a recommendation for what action should be taken. That recommendation is voted on by the full panel and sent to the House floor for consideration just like any other bill that is reported out of a committee.

Because the Democrats do not take control of the House until Jan. 3, it is likely that any investigation by House Administration would be launched while Republicans are still in charge — meaning the GOP will have the 2-1 majority on the investigating committee. But by the time the full House would be asked to seat the new Member, the Democrats would be in the majority.

Over the years, House Administration usually has recommended to dismiss contests after undertaking its reviews, but some elections have been closer than others.

In late November 1996 the Orange Country (Calif.) Registrar of Voters certified that Loretta Sanchez (D) had beaten the incumbent, Rep. Bob Dornan (R), by 984 votes. But Dornan filed a notice of contest in late December alleging voting irregularities such as noncitizens being allowed to cast ballots.

A task force under the Republican-led House reviewed the case and documented evidence that 748 votes were indeed invalid. But the total was not enough to give the seat to Dornan, and the committee recommended that the challenge be dismissed in February 1997.

DOJ_NMG_0096079

But while the House Administration Committee is charged with investigating any challenges, the House of Representatives as a whole is responsible for seating its own membership, and while Sanchez was allowed to take her seat despite the challenge of her election in 1996, it its not unprecedented for neither candidate to be seated until a contested election is resolved.

Perhaps the most notable example in recent years is the infamous 1984 race between the late Democratic Rep. Frank McCloskey and Republican Richard McIntyre in Indiana's 8th district where it took until the following May to swear in a Member for that seat.

In that race, McCloskey was declared the winner by a mere 72 votes, but a recount by the Republican secretary of state gave McIntyre the victory by 34 votes. In February of the following year, with the Democratic-led House unwilling to seat McIntyre, the House Administration Committee organized a task force to investigate the election — one of only four times in the past 60 years where the House initiated its own investigation without an official contest.

The task force found the state's recount procedure to be unreliable and, with the assistance of the General Accounting Office (which since has been renamed the Government Accountability Office), a recount was undertaken of the previous November's votes. In the end, McCloskey was granted a four-vote margin of victory and was seated on May 1.

Meanwhile, the races have not been called in North Carolina's 8th district, New Mexico's 1st district, and Ohio's 2nd and 15th districts. Republican incumbents are leading narrowly in all four races.

Two House races — one in Texas, the other in Louisiana — will be decided in December runoffs.

A Shutdown At The Favor Factory (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

While House Republicans reacted to stinging rejection from America's voters by refusing to change leadership, their Senate counterparts have tried to use their closing weeks in power to enact a last burst of pork-barrel spending. But that effort was stalled last week by independent-minded Republican senators, spearheaded by two abrasive freshmen and one longtime hair shirt. Before Congress recessed Friday for Thanksgiving, the GOP leadership appeared to capitulate.

The freshmen, Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint, campaigning in 2004 in Oklahoma and South Carolina, promised not to fall in line with GOP leaders. Fulfilling that pledge allied them with the long-termer John McCain. They have been backed by Jeff Sessions of Alabama and another freshman, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire. In the lame-duck session's first week, they played Horatio at the Bridge by combining to block a pork-filled omnibus spending bill.

That would place responsibility for spending excesses on the new Democratic majority taking office next year. It is highly unlikely that Sen. Robert C. Byrd, a legendary king of pork returning as Appropriations Committee chairman, will reverse the habits of a lifetime and listen to ordinary voters' revulsion over excessive federal spending. "Voters want the earmark favor factory shut down, not turned over to new management," said Coburn. He estimates that Congress can save the taxpayers a cool $17.1 billion by passing a resolution that would continue spending at present levels rather than enacting an omnibus bill laden with earmarks.

The bipartisan dismay the dissenters have caused cannot be exaggerated. Hard-working staffers are beside themselves that their lame-duck feast of pork is being thwarted. K Street lobbyists are frustrated that they are being deprived of a vehicle for their special-interest amendments.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran wanted President Bush, in Asia on a trade mission, to phone DeMint and ask him to stop blocking the agriculture appropriations bill. It did not happen, and the Republican leaders mournfully agreed to the cost-cutting resolution. An irate House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, who has taken pride in passing his committee's bills on schedule and filled with earmarks, called the outcome an "absolute disaster and catastrophe."

Among senators wailing that their pet projects are being derailed, none has been louder than Democrat Kent Conrad, who will be Budget Committee chairman in the new Congress. A self-described fiscal conservative (because he wants tax increases), Conrad submitted 41 proposals busting the Bush budget in 2005 alone. He was so distraught last week that the agriculture money bill blocked by DeMint contained $4.9 billion in additional emergency relief that he threatened to stop any money bills from passing in the lame-duck session. He did not follow through with this program of actually closing the government.

The cornucopia that the senators want to sneak through is reflected in 40 pork-stripping amendments to the agriculture bill that Coburn was ready to introduce in the lame-duck session. His key amendments were aimed at $1.1 million for alternative salmon research in Alaska, $591,000 for the Montana Sheep Institute and $194,000 for goose control in the state of New York.

McCain has his own pork-busting list for agriculture appropriations headed by $1 million for the National Sheep Industry Improvement Center and $6 million for sugar-cane growers in Hawaii. McCain also wants to get rid of the earmarks hidden in the Appropriations Committee report on the bill. They include construction costs, not requested by the administration, of $3 million for the Animal Waste Management Research Laboratory in Bowling Green, Ky., and $2 million for the Grape Genetics Research Center in Geneva, N.Y.

The scope and irrelevancy of earmarks are reflected in another target on McCain's hit list: $200,000 for the Lincoln Park Zoo and the Davee Center for Epidemiology, both in Chicago. A stated purpose is "maintenance of health in zoo populations nationwide."

While the Senate's archaic rules can frustrate the will of the majority in passing legislation and confirming presidential nominations, they also can enable a few strong-minded senators to fight excess spending. These senators may well temporarily close what Tom Coburn calls the "favor factory" maintained by Republicans. Will the Democrats try to reopen it next year?

New Justices Take The Podium, Putting Personalities On Display (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The two newest Supreme Court justices took off the robes and took to the stump last week, providing glimpses of the fresh personalities that will reshape a court that had remained constant for more than a decade.

The settings could not have been more different. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was interviewed before a crowd of 3,000 last Monday night at the University of Miami, and his telegenic message of moderation was then broadcast to the nation on ABC's "Nightline."

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. spoke to his fellow members of the Federalist Society, a coalition of conservative lawyers and legal scholars who have gone from rebel outsiders to Washington insiders -- the group drew 1,500 people to its annual banquet and warranted appearances by administration leaders from Vice President Cheney on down.

Roberts's turn on the stage was the most complete, and it showed that his sure-footed performance in his confirmation hearings, where he left even senators opposed to his conservative philosophy aglow, was no fluke.

He has a politician's gift for appearing open while answering only the questions he wants to answer, along with an almost over-the-top humility about being, at 51, the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, and he offers a reassuring middle ground between those worried about threats to judicial independence and those alarmed by activist judges.

He provided a little something for everyone. For the feature pages, he had a cute explanation of how his jiggling son Jack almost stole the show with his hammy performance before the cameras when President Bush introduced Roberts and his family to the nation last year: "People think Jack was dancing. He was not dancing. He was being Spiderman. He was shooting the webs off."

He gave the scholars caught up in the debate about his affection for legal minimalism a bit more to chew on: "If you're going up a list of what virtues are important when you're deciding a Supreme Court opinion, issuing an opinion, deciding a case, I have to say that I think boldness is going to be closer to the bottom and not the top."

And he showed deference to those he called the "people across the street" in Congress, who have been chosen by "hundreds of thousands of people, millions of people."

"Not a single person has voted for me, and if we don't like what the people in Congress do, we can get rid of them, and if you don't like what I do, it's kind of too bad," Roberts told ABC's Jan Crawford Greenburg, who conducted the interview at the Miami forum. "And that is, to me, an important constraint. It means that I'm not there to make a judgment based on my personal policy preferences or my political preferences."

DOJ_NMG_0096081

But as important as what Robert said was how he said it. He went a bit overboard in the humility department: Yes, the rest of the justices call one another by their first names, but they call him "chief." But, he quickly added, "I think it's more a tribute to the office."

And Roberts said he still finds it a little hard to believe that the office is his, for as long as he wants it. When he passes the formal entrance to his office, he said, there's "a little brass plaque on the door that says 'The Chief Justice,' and I still kind of feel that I have to be a little quiet so I don't disturb him."

Dahlia Lithwick, the sharp-eyed legal affairs columnist for the online magazine Slate, called it Roberts's "whole sweet/funny/smart/humble thing" and wrote that the chief justice "sees that the press can be gamed to disseminate a view of judging and the judiciary, and the clarity and effectiveness of his message is indisputable."

Alito, too, drew laughs with his speech Thursday night to the Federalist Society, but there was a scratchier tone to his address. He still seems a little sore about his confirmation hearings, which were tougher than what Roberts faced.

Or maybe Alito was just playing to his audience, which has become increasingly influential in nominations to the federal bench and cheers any reference to frustrated liberal Democrats. So they loved his comment that when he gets near the Hart Senate Office Building, where he spent days last November paying courtesy calls to senators, "invariably without thinking . . . I cross to the other side of the street."

He added: "My membership in the Federalist Society did not become a major factor in my confirmation hearings. Now, I think the reason for that probably was that some senators found so many other objectionable features about my record that they could attack that they had no need."

There's reason for Alito to be a little sensitive. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) last week told the New York Observer that his party's biggest failure during the last Congress was allowing Alito to take the bench.

On the Senate campaign trail this fall, the formula that many Democratic candidates used to show they would be judicious but not recalcitrant when it came to Supreme Court nominees was that they would have voted for Roberts but not for Alito.

Whether there will be that much difference between the two men in their judicial philosophies will be played out over the years.

Both, though, had similar messages last week. Alito said that "all public servants, not just judicial officers, play a role in shaping our law, interpreting our Constitution" and that it is wrong for "any public officials to ignore questions about the bounds of their authority in our constitutional system and simply say that the courts will sort that out for them."

Roberts said nearly the same thing. "The great gift of the founding generation was the right of self-government," he said. "We shouldn't give it up so easily to think that all the important issues are going to be decided by the Supreme Court."

High-Tech Defense Office Takes Lead On Telecommuting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The Defense Information Systems Agency describes itself as providing "global net-centric solutions" for the White House, the Pentagon and the armed forces.

In other words, it's the AOL, Google and OnStar for the Defense Department -- a crucial part of the government's national security operations.

Most of the engineers, computer scientists, telecommunication experts and technology wizards who work for DISA live in Northern Virginia and work in offices scattered through Arlington and Falls Church. Many are less than thrilled with the idea that by 2011 their jobs will be moved to Fort Meade, Md., as part of Defense Department base closures and realignments.

"A lot of those people want to stay with DISA but not uproot family because of schools and because of where their spouses work," said Jack Penkoske, DISA's director of manpower, personnel and security.

To keep from losing experienced employees, DISA has embraced telecommuting -- a way of working that the government has been slower to accept than the private sector.

Of the about 2,000 DISA jobs that have been identified as suitable for telecommuting, more than 500 employees have been cleared to work from home.

DOJ_NMG_0096082

"I think our numbers for telework will continue to grow, as we get more people comfortable with it," Penkoske said in an interview last week. "We've had a seven-fold increase in the last 10 months, probably a little more than that."

About 4,400 people -- military, civil service and contractors -- work for DISA in Northern Virginia, and more than half are civil service employees. DISA hopes that telecommuting will entice the civil service employees -- all have at least a secret clearance -- to stick with the agency.

Prior to the 2005 base-closing announcement, DISA employees could work from home one day per pay period, or every two weeks. Once it became clear that the agency would be relocated to Maryland, DISA's director, Air Force Lt. Gen. Charles E. Croom Jr., put together a new policy that permits employees to work from home two days a week.

Now, DISA employees who qualify to telework and are on a compressed work schedule (80 hours biweekly in less than 10 days) can be out of the office five of 10 work days.

"There are probably going to be more [telework] days being offered as we move down the line," Penkoske said.

DISA picks up half the cost of installing and subscribing to broadband Internet service. Employees are allowed to work on only nonclassified material while at home. The agency has ramped up purchases of laptop computers so that equipment shortages will not slow the telecommuting program.

Penkoske said officials will be paying special attention to network security and to productivity measures to ensure that employees keep up with their workloads.

Theresa Noll, a senior telework program analyst at the General Services Administration, said research has found that telecommuting programs help agencies retain workers and maintain or improve their productivity.

In contrast, she noted, "it's widely recognized in all managerial circles that when you lose employees or significant parts of your workforce, there is a break in productivity."

Although DISA anticipates that telecommuting will help it keep employees, Penkoske said that telework should also aid in recruiting the next generation of workers, who, by most accounts, are keen on employers that offer flexible work arrangements.

The agency hires about 100 recent college graduates as interns each year and spends $60,000 to $70,000 over three years to train them, an investment that the agency is not eager to lose, Penkoske said.

Terry Holzheimer, director of economic development for Arlington County, said officials are looking to partner with the federal or state government to set up a telework center for DISA employees in Crystal City as they near their 2011 deadline for moving to Fort Meade, where the military plans to build a 1 million-square-foot building for DISA.

"It is one thing to lose the jobs. We don't really want to lose the people," Holzheimer said. "Taking that many people off the Metro and disrupting their lives and commuting patterns is not good public policy."

Setting up a telework center in Crystal City would provide a workplace for DISA employees on those days they do not have to be at Fort Meade or for days when they have meetings at the Pentagon, he said.

Penkoske said DISA is looking into providing daily buses "from different places" in Northern Virginia to Fort Meade so that employees can have a mass transit option for getting to work. DISA also will help employees sell and buy homes if they decide to relocate to Maryland, he said.

Unknown, of course, is how many DISA employees will move, how many will try telecommuting, and how many will quit and take jobs with other government agencies and contractors.

What Ails The CDC (TIME)

By Christine Gorman

Time, November 27, 2006

Julie Gerberding was stillÂ a deputyÂ director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) in 2001 when someone started mailing anthrax spores to newsrooms and politicians' offices around the country. A telegenic personality who connected easily with journalists, Gerberding quickly became the public face of the CDC--a rare cool head among a parade of increasingly confused health bureaucrats. The fumbling she witnessed behind the scenes convinced her that the CDC's troubles extended beyond the need for better communications. She made her case to Tommy Thompson, then Secretary of Health and

DOJ_NMG_0096083

Human Services (HHS), and within a year was appointed director of the agency--the first woman to hold that job--with a mandate to radically reshape the CDC.

Five years later, Gerberding finds herself in the public eye once again, but this time she's under attack. The massive reorganization she ordered--combined with painful budget cuts in key divisions--seems to be tearing the agency apart. Six directors of the CDC's eight primary scientific centers have left. Researchers are sniping at one another in public and on the Internet. The agency has been targeted by three different congressional probes. And a blistering report, leaked last week, by an outside consultant who studied the agency's response to Hurricane Katrina found chaos and mismanagement at the very top.

Nobody is claiming that the CDC has become another governmental basket case like FEMA--at least not yet. Indeed, the speed with which this past summer's outbreak of lethal food poisoning was traced to spinach tainted by runoff from a particular herd of cows in California is testimony to the CDC's continuing expertise. But the bad publicity comes at the worst possible time for the agency and its director. Congress is wrapping up its final budget for 2007, and the Administration is starting to draw up a preliminary budget for 2008. If lawmakers believe that Gerberding is floundering, her institution's budget will suffer.

That's the last thing the U.S. needs. As the nation's premier guardian of public health, the CDC is responsible for researching, tracking and counteracting newly emerging infectious diseases like West Nile and SARS. Doctors rely on it to develop unbiased recommendations on a wide range of medical issues from when to vaccinate children to how best to battle obesity. It also directs funds to individual state and local public agencies to shore up their own community health efforts.

Ironically, it is increased CDC funding mandated by Congress for high-profile threats like bioterrorism and flu pandemics that has drained money from areas of public health that may actually be more pressing. Among the hardest-hit programs: AIDS prevention (down 19%), tuberculosis control (down 16%) and preventive-health block grants for outbreaks of West Nile disease and other unexpected events (down 17%).

But what really troubles the most vocal critics is their sense that the CDC's devotion to pure science--a long-established mandate to follow the trail of medical evidence wherever it leads--has been sabotaged. AIDS specialists today feel that they are being constrained not to say anything positive about condoms, while others complain that more cash bonuses are being given to administrators than to researchers. "It's the policies and the direction of the institute I'm most concerned about," says Dr. Brad Woodruff, an epidemiologist in the organization's Maternal and Child Nutrition Branch. Woodruff is particularly incensed that the agency's new jet, which is supposed to be for medical emergencies, was used by HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt to make promotional appearances on behalf of President Bush's Medicare drug plan.

The centerpiece of Gerberding's reorganization was her decision to replace the agency's 11 often insular centers with four coordinating bodies that would, in theory, respond to emergencies with more agility. Closer contact between infectious-disease and environmental experts, Gerberding says, has already resulted in faster tests for detecting botulism.

But some within the agency complain that the main difference they have seen so far is that their work is more likely to be second-guessed. "Scientists feel less empowered to make decisions," says Dr. Stephen Cochi, who has worked at the CDC for 24 years, currently in the Global Immunization Division. "There's more bureaucratic filtering." Decisions that were routinely made in Atlanta, he and others say, must now be approved by higher-ups in Washington. Requests for anything but emergency travel have to be made 90 days in advance.

As in so many other internecine battles, it can be hard to tell where the whining stops and the real problems begin. The CDC was due for a major overhaul, and it's human nature--even among scientists--to resist change. What started off as hallway grumbling, however, has grown into an ugly public ruckus, thanks to an unofficial employee blog www.cdcchatter.net and a few well-directed Freedom of Information requests from the Atlanta Journal-Constitution.

Through it all, Gerberding has stood firm. "The CDC was not broken," she says. "The reason to undergo this [reorganization] is that the world was changing so dramatically." As for charges of political interference, she is unapologetic. "This is a public-health agency, and by its very nature, we're never going to satisfy every single constituency," she says candidly. "I tell [Administration officials] this is the science. This is the recommendation. What they do with it is beyond my control."

Not everybody blames Gerberding for the turmoil. "I don't think anyone denies that there's a morale problem at the CDC," says Dr. Georges Benjamin, executive director of the American Public Health Association. But he attributes much of the upheaval to government-wide belt tightening rather than to Gerberding's reorganization, noting that core programs at the CDC have been cut 4.5% in each of the past two fiscal years. He and other experts believe that the agency needs at least $15 billion a year to do all the jobs it has been assigned--nearly twice the current budget of $8.5 billion.

Perhaps the most immediate problem is the number of senior-level people who are leaving. Part of that is an unavoidable function of aging--40% of the CDC's 9,000 employees will be eligible to retire in 2008. But there's also speculation that older scientists are being pushed to leave early. Either way, "you don't replace the experts at CDC easily," says Robert Keegan, deputy director of the agency's Global Immunization Division. "Management has said they've enacted better emergency standards, but until there's an emergency, you don't know."

State and local public-health officials are keeping a close eye on all the drama. "The most difficult organization in the world to change is a successful organization [like the CDC]," says Paul Halverson of the Arkansas department of health and human services. "If you're a company that is losing money every month, then it's easy to see the need to make a change." Of course, in this case, it's not just money but lives that are at stake.

Coin Of The Commanders In Chief (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Can George be successful where Sacagawea and Susan failed?

The U.S. Mint today is unveiling designs for its newest additions: dollar coins that will feature deceased presidents on a rotating basis, similar to the popular state quarters.

The coins will enter circulation with George Washington on Feb. 15, four days before President's Day, and will be gold in color like the Sacagawea to distinguish them from other coins. Like the Sacagawea, they will be slightly larger than the quarter.

While the presidential coins are expected to be popular with collectors, it's doubtful they will be used by consumers and businesses on a daily basis, some experts argue. Instead, with dollar bills still an easy alternative, they likely are doomed as a means of commerce, as Susan B. Anthony and Sacagawea before them, says David Sklow, a numismatic expert and former director of the library and research center at the American Numismatic Association.

“I hope it does get accepted, but I wouldn't hold my breath,” he says. “Americans do not like dollar coins, they just don't. You want to carry three or four of these around? If you are a man (and carry money in your pocket), I don't think so.”

A dollar coin hasn't widely circulated for more than 70 years, when the silver Peace Dollar was in use.

David Didriksen, owner of Willow Books & Cafe in Acton, Mass., says there's a reason for that. Dollar coins are often miscounted by customers, store clerks and banks, he says. He hopes people don't use them.

“As it is now, a typical trip to a bank involves carrying a bag of 20 or 30 pounds or more,” he says. “The last thing we need now is more coins.”

But many people, including Mint Director Edmund Moy and the lawmakers who sponsored the legislation to create the presidential dollar coins, beg to differ. They argue that the state quarter program has set the stage for acceptance and use of a dollar coin.

“We have an opportunity to build on the success of the state quarter program,” says Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H.

Greater use of dollar coins instead of bills would save the government hundreds of millions of dollars each year, even though the coins are more expensive to produce. That's mainly because coins last for about 30 years, more than 16 times longer than dollar bills.

The Federal Reserve estimated in 1995 that replacing dollar bills with coins would save $500 million a year. The savings would likely be much bigger today, because the number of $1 bills in circulation has risen 40% in the past decade. More than a third of U.S. circulating currency is dollar bills, according to the Fed.

Dollar coins “cost a lot less in the long haul,” says U.S. Treasurer Anna Escobedo Cabral, who oversees the nation's money production.

Studies, including those from the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, suggest consumers will embrace dollar coins only if dollar bills are pulled from circulation.

DOJ_NMG_0096085

But the idea of replacing the dollar bill with coins has met stiff resistance from lawmakers, printing unions and paper manufacturers.

The public has also opposed eliminating $1 bills. In a USA TODAY/Gallup survey of 1,002 adults conducted Oct. 20-22, more than half said it was a "good idea" that the Mint was introducing presidential dollar coins.

But when asked their opinions on replacing dollar bills entirely, 79% said they would oppose such a move. Even when told that replacing bills with coins would save the government $500 million a year, 69% said they still opposed making such a change.

"It's just easier to carry the bills," says retiree Ellen Barlow, 74, of Culbertson, Neb., who opposes replacing dollar bills with coins. "Five dollars of coins weighs a lot more than five dollars of bills."

Other countries have done away with their low-denomination bills. Canada has replaced its one-dollar and two-dollar notes with coins, while in Europe, some euro coins have replaced bills.

Machine repairman Patrick Lawson, 35, of Cold Brook, N.Y., says he liked using coins for lower denominations when he was stationed in Germany in the military. It makes sense for the USA to get rid of the dollar bill and use coins instead, he says.

"People are afraid of change," Lawson says. "If you get rid of the dollar bill and they actually start to use it, they will realize they are easy to use."

Says Francois Velde, co-author of The Big Problem of Small Change and senior economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, "Americans are creatures of habit."

The last dollar coin to be introduced, featuring Sacagawea, a Native American interpreter and guide on the Lewis and Clark expedition, was largely a failure. Due to lack of demand, the Mint stopped making the Sacagaweas in 2002, a little more than two years after they were first introduced with much fanfare.

Demand has been so minimal that the Federal Reserve and the Mint as of June 30 had more than 200 million Sacagawea dollars in combined inventory, according to the Fed. That's enough to meet current demand for 31/2 years.

The Mint's Moy says that when he was nominated to be Mint director this summer, he went to five banks and asked for a Sacagawea. None had one.

The Mint spent more than $67 million to promote the Sacagawea coin from 1998 to 2001, according to the GAO. The money was used for marketing, advertising and partnerships with a variety of industries, including banking and retail. A float promoting the coins was in the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade in 1999, and they were featured on boxes of Cheerios cereal.

More than $40 million of the funds were used for a national advertising campaign starring George Washington.

The Sacagaweas are gold in color to distinguish them from other coins. That decision came after repeated complaints that the Susan B. Anthony was too similar in size and color to the quarter, creating confusion.

But despite the changes and promotions, the public did not embrace Sacagawea.

"The Mint's new dollar coin marketing program raised public awareness of the new coin but did not produce long-tem increases in circulation," a 2002 GAO report said.

Instead, people had trouble finding the coins after the initial flurry, when they were handed out as change at Wal-Mart. Banks stopped ordering them, and they largely faded from view.

But supporters of the new dollar coins say this time, it's different.

That's because the new coins will rotate, introducing four new presidential dollars each year, starting in 2007. Plus, for the first time in more than 70 years, the coins will feature writing on the edge of the coin rather than just on the fronts and backs. The writing will be engraved, but will be detectable by touch.

Those two features, particularly the rotation of the coins, will lead to excitement about the money in a way that wasn't generated before, Moy says.

"Casual collectors will focus their attention on the dollar, just as they have with the 50-state quarter program," Moy says.

"If they start collecting them and seeking them out, we hope that one positive benefit of that is that they'll start using them more and say, 'Hmmm, this isn't as bad as we thought.' "

DOJ_NMG_0096086

The Mint is also planning a different approach in promoting the new coins. The plan is for a more bottom-up program, in which the goal is to get consumers excited about the coins, leading them to demand the dollar coins from banks, retailers and others.

With Sacagawea, the Mint tried a more top-down approach, in which banks and retailers were encouraged to use the coins to try to create a buzz among consumers.

The Mint is planning to spend approximately $5 million for the initial marketing campaign, far less than it did with Sacagawea.

The presidential dollar coins come as the highly successful state quarter program nears completion in 2008. From 125 million to 130 million people in the USA — or close to half the U.S. population — are collecting the state quarters, according to the American Numismatic Association.

The Littleton Coin Company has already sold thousands of specially designed folders with slots for the new dollar coins to collectors. Part of the interest is coming from people who became collectors with the quarter program, says Jeffrey Marsh, head of marketing for the Littleton, N.H.-based company.

"I definitely could see it as being as popular as the state quarters," Marsh says. "It's just another one that ties in nicely with education and history."

But being collected and being used are two entirely different things, says Beth Deisher, editor of the publication Coin World.

"The Mint is really in an uphill battle," Deisher says "No other nation has successfully circulated a coin equivalent of the paper money. It doesn't happen. Human nature is such that you would take the paper money."

But Moy says comparing the presidential coins with previous dollar coins is not fair. He notes that unlike with the Sacagawea, the Mint will have 10 years to generate buzz about the new coins.

"The better analogy is the 50-state quarter program than prior dollar coin programs," Moy says.

"If we can build on that sort of momentum, the chances of a dollar being successful really increases," he says.

"We really need to make it big."

Presidents, Well Known Or Not, Will Have Their Day On A Dollar (NYT)

By Matthew Healey

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The United States Mint is unveiling four designs for one-dollar coins today, featuring likenesses of the first four presidents. They begin a series that is to last a decade and portray every deceased president.

The first coin, displaying George Washington on one side and the Statue of Liberty on the other, will go into circulation in mid-February, in time for Presidents' Day. After that, coins with John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison will be issued at three-month intervals.

Four more will appear, in order of each president's service, every year until 2016. Designs are based on presidential medals made previously by the Mint and on portraits in the National Portrait Gallery at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, where today's unveiling takes place.

The size, color and metal content of the $1 coins will be identical to those of the current Sacagawea dollars, but their luster should last longer because of a new anti-tarnishing compound that will be applied to blank coins between the time they are annealed, or softened by heating, and struck with the design.

The date and some inscriptions will be stamped into the edge, airing out the designs.

The director of the Mint, Edmund C. Moy, said the number of each presidential dollar coin issued would depend on circulation demands forecast by the Federal Reserve, regardless of how well known a president was. "This could be a renaissance for some of our lesser-known presidents," Mr. Moy said in an interview.

The coins were authorized last year by a law that also provides for a series of 24-karat $10 gold coins honoring all the presidents' wives, which will be sold to collectors and investors rather than released for general circulation. The first of those, showing Martha Washington, will be issued before the end of 2007.

The law also calls for four new designs for the penny in 2009, to commemorate the bicentennial of Abraham Lincoln's birth.

Hopes are that the new dollars will be as popular as the state quarters, many of which have been taken out of circulation by collectors. The government has earned $4 billion to $5 billion on the state-quarter series since 1999.

The Mint made three billion state quarters in 2005 but only five million Sacagawea dollars. By law, it has to continue making the Sacagawea dollars, which will circulate along with the new presidential dollars and the Susan B. Anthony dollar.

Implants And Science (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

It took 14 years, but science finally trumped politics Friday, with the Food and Drug Administration's lifting of its longstanding ban on silicone-gel breast implants. Women will at last be allowed to make their own decisions about cosmetic surgery. This is especially welcome news for mastectomy patients.

The FDA removed them from the market in 1992 during the reign of Commissioner David Kessler, a politically ambitious bureaucrat who was courting support from the left. The agency cited health concerns that have long since been debunked, and silicone-gel breast implants have since been at the heart of one of the trial bar's biggest scams. Class-action lawsuits raked in billions of dollars and drove implant makers out of the business. Dow Corning went into bankruptcy. Throughout it all, the trial bar was abetted by a gullible press, only too happy to ignore the science and play up sensationalist stories of supposed "victims."

Meanwhile, as we reported in editorials at the time, study after study showed no linkage between silicone breast implants and cancer, lupus, the skin-hardening disease scleroderma or other serious illness. As far back as 1994, doctors at the Mayo Clinic found "no association between breast implants and the connective-tissue diseases and other disorders" that they studied. In 1999, the Institute of Medicine found no systemic health problems caused by implants. In 2003, an FDA advisory panel advised that the ban be removed.

Last week's FDA decision notes that women with implants still run the risk of complications from leakage -- a risk that the industry has never denied and that patients have always been informed of. In approving implants made by two companies, Allergan Inc. and Mentor Corp., the FDA urged patients to get regular MRI exams. That's surely wise, but in any case it's a risk that patients and their doctors are perfectly capable of weighing against the benefits of the procedure.

One of the ugliest aspects of the breast-implant controversy has been the irresponsibility of the feminist movement, whose championship of a woman's right to "choose" doesn't extend to breast implants. It's all the more outrageous given the tens of thousands of breast-cancer victims seeking reconstructive surgery each year. Silicone-gel implants tend to feel and look more natural than the saline alternative.

It would be nice to think that the FDA's move closes the chapter on this nasty episode, but given the anti-implant crowd's reaction to Friday's announcement, that's probably too much to hope for. Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, called it a "reckless decision" and promises to seek reversal "when the new Congress takes office." Sidney Wolfe, head of Public Citizen's Health Research Group -- the Naderite outlet that spearheaded the campaign against silicone in the 1980s and is a front for the trial bar -- called breast implants "the most defective medical device ever approved by the FDA." He also vowed to seek Congressional action.

While we're glad the FDA has overturned 14 years of politicized medicine by approving silicone breast implants, it's worth remembering the enormous price that has been paid: to the credibility of the legal system, in jobs lost, and in public health. And it's worth asking what is more toxic: the silicone implants preferred by thousands of women, or the trial bar that purports to "protect" them.

Hill Scrum Blues (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Americans had ethics on their mind when they took control of Congress away from Republicans. In fact, 41 percent of voters in a post-election survey said corruption and scandals were "extremely important" factors in their vote. And both the winners and the losers promised to heed the message; Republicans said they'd learned their lessons, while Democrats pledged substantive reforms. Steny Hoyer, the current minority whip, followed that lead in a meeting with reporters, as he talked of the Democrats' legislative priorities come January. Yes, the party had called for upping the minimum wage and passing the 9/11 commission recommendations. But last week, Hoyer seemed to have those midterm voters on his mind. "Clearly Iraq was a major reason for their vote," he said. "Corruption was also a very important reason."

That was then. As the week wore on, and both parties turned to the business of electing new leaders, the lofty rhetoric seemed in the view of many to be giving way to the same old thing. In fact, the internal wrangling on Capitol Hill gave more credence to Washington's age-old pursuit of personal politics, strong-arm tactics, and backroom dealing. Congress is a club, after all, and in the light of day, it looked plenty clubby-even if all the members weren't getting along. By week's end, reform-substantive or otherwise-was looking like a mighty tall order.

Misstep. There was, however, enough drama to fill a play of several acts. Democratic Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi indelicately stepped into her own party's leadership elections, managing to turn their first week after 12 years out of power into a divisive intraparty brawl. Pelosi put her chips on an old friend, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania. It was a matter of loyalty, she said, and an attempt to credit Murtha for pushing a new course in Iraq. But her bold initiative bombed, damaging not only her own leadership credentials but the unity of her caucus as well. Murtha lost in a landslide to Hoyer in the race for majority leader. Even Pelosi allowed afterward that it was a "stunning victory" for the 12-term congressman from Maryland.

Murtha, the Vietnam vet who ran Pelosi's own leadership campaign, had helped shift the Iraq debate when he called for troop redeployments this year. But the longtime power player on the Appropriations Committee, who has championed millions of dollars in earmarks, faced mounting questions about his murky ethics record. His leadership candidacy brought back stories of the 26-year-old Abscam bribery scandal, in which Murtha was implicated but never charged. He punctuated the doubts by telling a group of moderates that the lobbying reform bill pushed by Democrats this year was "total crap."

Hoyer has long-established roots within the party and had helped many of the freshman representatives raise money, but watchdog groups aren't wild about his independence, either. Public Citizen ranked Hoyer fifth in the House for receiving money from lobbyists, three spots behind Murtha. "I'm sure that many voters who voted on the issue of corruption were hugely disappointed by the Democrats this week," says Melanie Sloan of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "That this was the first action out of the box-putting up a guy with serious ethics problems-if I was a voter who had crossed over or was independent and then they did this, I'd be thinking, 'What did I do?'"

OTHER NEWS:

A Brisk Rise In American Wages (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, November 20, 2006

American paychecks are rising again at a pace not seen since the 1990s.

The pay increase amounts to 4 percent on average over the past 12 months, and it comes at a very helpful time for millions of households.

For three years, pay increases haven't kept pace with the rising cost of living. Then came this year's housing slowdown, which has further squeezed family finances.

Those setbacks, however, are now being offset by rising income. Four percent may not sound like much, but you have to look back to 1997 to find a calendar year with a gain that big.

Equally significant, tamer energy prices mean that the "real" wage gains, after inflation, are above 3 percent for the past 12 months. That, too, hasn't happened since the 1990s, even though the economy has been expanding over the past five years.

"The striking feature of this expansion has been that ... real wages for the typical worker haven't risen that much," says Richard Berner, US economist at the investment bank Morgan Stanley in New York. But with real incomes rising, he says, "you get a picture of an economy that can weather this housing storm."

The risk of recession hasn't disappeared, he and other economists say. But with a fairly tight job market and low unemployment, many expect that paychecks will keep rising solidly in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0096089

Sandy Nelson has seen the strength of rising incomes first hand this year.

She runs Mulberry Road, a children's store near Boston's trendy Newbury Street, and says traffic has been increasing.

More customers means more income for her - and more money to keep investing in her young business.

"I have more of what people are looking for," she says, pointing to racks of colorful clothing for toddlers.

In other words, Ms. Nelson is ready for the vital holiday season.

"I'm just hopeful that it will be as good as what they're saying," she says, citing retail forecasts that New Englanders will spend more than $700 on gifts this season, on average.

The average private-sector paycheck is now $573 per week, according to Labor Department figures that cover about 8 in 10 workers - those in production or nonsupervisory jobs.

As recently as this past October, weekly pay adjusted for inflation was below where it was when President Bush took office in 2001. In effect, rising prices for things like healthcare, college tuition, and especially for energy ate up all the wage gains of an expanding economy, and then some.

The spike in energy costs was extreme, but the pattern was a common one. Wages generally rise fastest when the economy is strong and inflation is low.

That's why this moderation in fuel prices is so important.

Dan Thompson, who drives a DHL delivery truck in Boston, can hardly remember the pay raise he thinks he got earlier this year. But lower gasoline prices lately have been like an instant addition to his income.

"Thank God for that," Mr. Thompson says. He fills his tank often, since he drives to work every day from Salem, N.H.

Although the wage trend nationally has been steadily upward this year, it's unclear how much the inflation side of the equation will continue to benefit workers. Last week, the Labor Department reported not just tame inflation but an outright drop in consumer prices. The more typical pattern - and the one expected in the months ahead - is modest inflation, not deflation.

Even so, many analysts see a climate that's promising for more growth in real income.

"Expect wages to maintain a decent clip at least through the first half" of 2007, says Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal-leaning research group in Washington.

Those gains lately have been fairly broad-based across all pay levels, but they come at a time when wage growth seems to be harder to come by than in the past.

One key reason, Mr. Bernstein says, is an increasingly global market for labor.

"If your work can be routinized and digitized, you're in global competition in a way that you weren't a decade ago," he says.

The key questions for the economy - and for worker pocketbooks - are whether the job and wage growth continues, whether the housing slump deepens, and what happens to energy prices.

"With oil prices down, we're less worried" about a recession, says David Wyss, economist at Standard & Poor's in New York.

Another positive sign: Companies are laying off fewer people this year, says John Challenger, who heads the outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas in Chicago.

Big Pharma On A Mission To Woo Democrats (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

The pharmaceutical industry was in the enviable position two years ago of having the right friends in the right places in Washington.

Billy Tauzin, the Republican lawmaker, and Thomas Scully, who ran Medicare during President George W. Bush's first term, were leaving their respective posts to lobby for the drugs industry after securing the addition of a pharma-friendly prescription drug subsidy in the federal healthcare programme for the elderly.

Another ally in the Senate, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, had emerged as a powerful player in Congress and was considered a presidential hopeful.

DOJ_NMG_0096090

The industry's mirrored that of other big companies and trade associations that had strengthened their ties with the Republican majority by hiring only Republican lobbyists for top positions – a practice championed by Mr Santorum that was known as the "K Street project".

Now the prospects of the industry's giants have taken a turn. After spending an estimated $10m (£5.3m, €7.8m) on Republican incumbent candidates ahead of this year's mid-term elections – Democrats received about $4.5m – no other sector is expected to face as hostile a reception on Capitol Hill after the Democrats take over in 2007.

Shares in US and European pharmaceutical companies tumbled in the days after the election, with Pfizer, Eli Lilly and Novartis each down 5 per cent or more. The New York Stock Exchange Healthcare Index recovered slightly last week after a sharp drop.

Nancy Pelosi, incoming Speaker of the House, who once accused Mr Tauzin of "selling seniors down the river" for $2m – the sum the Louisiana Republican was reportedly paid to join the association he now runs, PhRMA – says one of her priorities will be to give the government the power to negotiate Medicare drug prices.

Other lawmakers, including Henry Waxman, the representative, are expected to target the industry by calling hearings on issues ranging from marketing to drug safety. Congress is also expected to increase its scrutiny of the industry's chief regulator, the Food and Drug Administration. The industry will face this harsh new reality without the support of Mr Santorum, who lost his re-election bid.

"Clearly, it is a new day. After the election, we woke up to a new world and I think you will see industry-wide actions that will reflect that new world," says Ken Johnson, senior vice-president at PhRMA. "There will be a renewed emphasis on making new friends and reaching out to Democrats, and especially pro-business Democrats," he says.

The industry has already recruited at least one high-profile Democrat to help it make inroads with the incoming majority party. John Breaux, the former senator and Patton Boggs lobbyist who was also involved in the passage of the Medicare provision, told the Financial Times he was working with clients in the industry on strategies for the upcoming Congress, including spending a "great deal of time" with editorial boards explaining the positive attributes of the Medicare prescription drug benefit.

Steve Jenning, a Democratic drug lobbyist at Capitol Health Group, says the industry is seeking lobbyists who maintained "some semblance of a relationship with the minority" to gain influence, not only with rank-and-file Democrats on important congressional committees but also with the new leadership – Ms Pelosi and Harry Reid, incoming majority leader in the Senate.

Given the barbs the industry has traded with Ms Pelosi, in particular, Mr Johnson says it will "take some time to heal" the "old wounds".

But for all the emphasis some lobbyists pin on hopes of making new friends in the Democratic caucus, others privately admit that the Democrats' narrow victory in the Senate means the industry is not in dire straits. Instead of reaching out to Democrats, says one senior lobbyist, the drug industry will simply have to ensure it has 41 votes in the Senate to block harmful legislation, instead of the 60 votes they had been seeking in a friendly Senate.

"The Senate is a killing chamber, it always has been. The game you are going to play is, 'how do I stop that from happening?' " the lobbyist says.

But Mr Breaux disagrees with that strategy. "I would do more than that – not just play defence, play offence and send a positive message about what they [the pharmaceutical industry] do and why they do it. We have a good story to tell," he says.

Mr Breaux's task may be made easier by a recent changing of the guard at several big drugmakers, including Pfizer, the world's largest. Democrats may be more willing to lend an ear to chief executive Jeffrey Kindler than former chief executive Hank McKinnell, who was a large donor to the Republican party.

Records collected by the Center for Responsive Politics show that Mr Kindler donated $10,200 in this election cycle. The beneficiaries were all Democrats.

G.O.P. Explorers (TIME)

Time, November 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096091

Potential presidential candidates used to take their time deciding whether to run; now, you can't be coy. Several Republicans are already forming exploratory committees. Betting site Tradesport.com gives the odds for each to win the nomination.

John McCain Odds: 10 to 11 He's John McCain! War hero, anticorruption crusader, George W. Bush's best frenemy in the world. And it doesn't hurt that the press loves him. The G.O.P. base doesn't trust anyone loved by the media, and his liberal fan base may offend a few conservatives. Plus, he wants to send more troops to Iraq.

Rudy Giuliani Odds: 47 to 1 America's Mayor led New York City through 9/11; he has a no-nonsense attitude toward crime, budgets and basically anything else that annoys him. He might lose the family-values vote with two divorces behind him. He has supported gays but not guns. Republicans don't know his blue side now, but they will.

Tommy Thompson Odds: 124 to 1 Former Wisconsin Governor and Secretary of Health and Human Services under Bush. He's the original welfare reformer and loves health care. Wisconsin. Campaigning on health care and welfare? Not very exciting. And his other talking points--energy conservation and the Iraq war--aren't exactly original.

Duncan Hunter Odds: 142 to 1 House Armed Services chair co-wrote a bill to put a fence along Mexico's border. Will protect the unborn and military contractors too. Lack of name recognition may end up hurting his chances, plus he's been tainted with connections to disgraced former Representative Randy (Duke) Cunningham.

Bill And Hillary Clinton's War Plan (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

For right-wing conspiracy theorists, this is the belly of the beast—a dinner at the Four Seasons in New York for the 20th anniversary of Harvard's Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy. Portentous Ivy League professors, Upper East Side gazillionaires, Precambrian media pooh-bahs; Dan Rather and Al Franken and Paul Pelosi, spouse of the Speaker-elect. Almost all in attendance cheer the results of the midterms while bemoaning the demise of old media. Suddenly, shimmering over the tabletops, comes a vision of what was and might yet be again: in full plumage, arriving and departing separately per their insane schedules, Bill and Hillary Clinton—"two for the price of one," as the Arkansas governor liked to say back in 1992, before Dogpatch went global.

This audience knows about the ex-president's ability to put other people's money where his mouth is. Big money. At the second annual Clinton Global Initiative in September, he extracted more than $7 billion in commitments to address world problems. Hosting a conference of the Slate 60 largest charitable givers in the United States last week at his presidential library in Little Rock, he joked to the assembled billionaires, "I looked in the mirror and realized I'd become an NGO."

But can a "nongovernmental organization" like Clinton Partners retake the U.S. government? On this evening, Hillary is in the audience, Bill the featured performer. Even for a crowd of old friends unimpressed by his celebrity, the former president's seemingly offhand stump speech does not disappoint. In the past year, he has taken his already-impressive rhetorical game to a new level, offering a thoughtful synthesis of the world's problems and opportunities.

He's a master of display. Statistics that would be deadly in other hands ("Denmark's had a 50 percent increase in its economy with a zero percent increase in energy consumption") come alive. Describing fluorescent lighting, new windows and other ways to go green and get rich at the same time, he deadpans, "Boring, right?" before answering his own question with patented casual intensity: "But it's important." Like a high-tech camera circumnavigating a subject, he clicks images from a dozen angles, then defends complexity, flexibility, uncertainty.

The beauty of the Democratic Party midterm victory, Clinton muses, is that voters said no to ideology. They wanted to move past fearmongering and demonizing toward true debate. "America rejected shorthand," he says. "People are thinking again." But they are not thinking of a set of liberal policy prescriptions. He argues that the election was about more than Iraq and corruption; it turned on the unmet needs of middle-class voters for whom the country "isn't working anymore." And yet no one is exactly sure how to make it work again. "The people didn't give Democrats a mandate," the former president cautions. "They gave us a chance."

But a chance to do what? To compromise with the president to achieve something to show voters the next time? Or to lay out an agenda to run on in the 2008 campaign? (The first cattle-call primary debates, if you can believe it, are only six or seven months away.) The answer will be some of both, of course, with the calibration of the two approaches determined as much by Hillary Clinton and her husband as by Nancy Pelosi or Harry Reid. All that is clear so far is that "the chance" will inevitably take centrist form. Just as every Republican candidate has for decades been required to describe himself as a conservative, every Democratic candidate in 2008 will don the Clintonesque cloak of moderation. It's a vindication of Clinton's "Third Way" presidency, though ironic considering that the Democrats lost the Congress in the first place in 1994 in part because of the alleged excesses of "Hillarycare." Now the former First Lady, whose impressive 67 percent re-election to the Senate showed she could win the support of independent swing voters and even a quarter of Republicans, is betting that a moderate image will erase the phony national impression of her as a left-wing harridan.

Chance, as Louis Pasteur said, favors the prepared mind, and none is more prepared in the Democratic Party than that of HRC. Her orderly and substantive approach to issues has brought raves from colleagues in both parties. Her political orbit, dubbed "Hillaryland," is a frighteningly disciplined constellation of aides, none of whom (to the annoyance of the press) will talk out of school about a 2008 presidential race. While the campaign-in-waiting has not done as much recruitment of workers in Iowa as rivals assume, it would not take long to put the pieces in place. It's still possible that she'll forgo a 2008 campaign in order to stay in a job she loves in the Senate (and become majority leader within a few years). But unless personal concerns surface soon, the odds strongly favor her jumping in early next year.

If she does, it will not be because her party is clamoring for her to do so. While her celebrity and command of issues always draw friendly crowds, they cannot be fairly described as tumultuous. While Bill is a virtuoso at weaving together seemingly unrelated threads, Hillary is still too often what one of her biographers, Michael Tomasky, calls the "Laundry Lady," reciting a laundry list of worthy ideas that don't yet add up to a compelling vision.

One conventional take on Hillary is that while she is a prohibitive favorite to win the Democratic nomination, she cannot win the general election. But the reverse may be closer to the truth. With the map of the Electoral College shading blue, any Democrat strong enough to win the nomination can conceivably prevail in November. The last four Democratic nominees have all received more than 250 electoral votes (with 270 needed to elect). Bill Clinton used to tell friends that the first woman president of the United States would be like Margaret Thatcher in Great Britain—a conservative. He no longer makes that argument. The challenge in the 2008 general election might be less about Hillary's gender (or any collateral damage caused from a failure by Pelosi) than her core political skills. Could she avoid being Swift-Boated as a lefty? Probably so. Hillary has the thick skin and war-room experience to fend off the GOP demonizers, who are not quite so formidable after their 2006 wipeout.

The bigger problem for her would be getting past Barack Obama, who now seems poised to run. With much less name recognition than Clinton, he trails her by only 12 points in the latest Gallup poll (the rest of the Democrats are far back). And Obama won the first trial heat of '08: he was the biggest draw for other Democratic candidates this fall with a magnetism on the trail unmatched by anyone in politics. (HOT CHICKS DIG OBAMA read one button at a Nashville rally). His stump speech is rousing and redemptive and more compelling than, say, Bill Clinton's was in 1991.

Of course, Obama is inexperienced and untested: while he'd likely have enough Internet-generated money to be competitive, he could wilt under the relentless scrutiny of a presidential campaign. But the Illinois senator, who in 2008 will be three years older than JFK was when he was elected in 1960, brings two big advantages that have not been fully appreciated.

The first is on the war in Iraq. You know what's coming if he runs: "Obama is like a Grand Marnier soufflé still rising in the oven. It will taste delicious when it's finished, but it's not there yet. A trip to Israel and a trip to Africa are not going to give him foreign-policy credentials," says one Clinton backer unwilling to criticize Obama on the record. But should Hillary and other experienced candidates jab at Obama's lack of foreign-policy experience, he would quickly reply that he was right and they were wrong on the critical question of going to war in 2003. (Obama was an early and outspoken critic of the war before being elected to the Senate.)

More important, the primary schedule favors Obama. Hillary Clinton has no Rove-like master strategist yet (other than her husband), but the logic of her front-runner game plan suggests building a firewall in the South to recover if she's upset in Iowa or New Hampshire. Bill Clinton's popularity with blacks has been presumed to carry over to her and help her win the important

South Carolina primary, where nearly 50 percent of Democratic voters are African-American, and other similar Southern primaries critical to the nomination. But that doesn't account for Obama, who would likely crush her among black voters.

The larger danger for Hillary is that for all the novelty of her gender, she becomes a variation on former vice president Walter Mondale in 1984—strong on organization but weak on passion, a candidate of the past instead of the future. And Clinton Fatigue may be lurking in the party's central nervous system. If Hillary were elected and re-elected president, it would mean the presence of a Bush or a Clinton on every ticket from 1980 to 2016—36 years.

The team that would try to make that happen is mostly from the East Wing of the Clinton White House (Patti Solis Doyle, Caprice Marshall), not the West Wing. "Some of us who were with him will be with her; a lot of others won't be," says one former White House aide unwilling to publicly identify which is which. Pollster Mark Penn, fund-raiser Terry McAuliffe and media adviser Mandy Grunwald are onboard, and James Carville and Paul Begala would help from the sidelines. The Clinton camp is not the monolith conservatives make it out to be. Carville's call last week for the ouster of Howard Dean as chairman of the Democratic National Committee was his initiative, and came without the approval of the Clintons, who aren't spoiling for a fight with Dean. "I'm 62 years old and my parents are gone. I don't ask permission," Carville says.

Of course, the Democratic nominee could easily be neither Hillary Clinton nor Barack Obama. Two years before the 1992 election, the presumed Democratic front runners were Mario Cuomo and Al Gore. Virginia Gov. Doug Wilder, an African-American candidate, was considered an intriguing choice. Far down the list of possibilities, languishing in polls as Evan Bayh and Chris Dodd are today, was an obscure governor named Bill Clinton.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

Kissinger's view

Military victory is no longer possible in Iraq, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said in a television interview yesterday.

Mr. Kissinger presented a bleak vision of Iraq, saying the U.S. government must enter into dialogue with Iraq's regional neighbors -- including Iran -- if progress is to be made in the region.

"If you mean by 'military victory' an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," he told the British Broadcasting Corp.

But Mr. Kissinger, who has advised President Bush about Iraq, warned against a rapid withdrawal of coalition troops, saying it could destabilize Iraq's neighbors and cause a long-lasting conflict, the Associated Press reports.

"A dramatic collapse of Iraq -- whatever we think about how the situation was created -- would have disastrous consequences for which we would pay for many years, and which would bring us back, one way or another, into the region," he said.

Mr. Kissinger, whose views have been sought by the Iraqi Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, called for an international conference bringing together the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, Iraq's neighbors and regional powers such as India and Pakistan to work out a way forward for the region.

"I think we have to redefine the course, but I don't think that the alternative is between military victory, as defined previously, or total withdrawal," he said.

Dean's agenda

Howard Dean said the Democratic Party needs to look beyond getting homosexuals and minorities a place at the table and instead work toward getting them on the ballot.

"We've got to share power, not just responsibility, from now on," Mr. Dean told about 200 people in Houston on Saturday at the International Gay & Lesbian Leadership Conference, an annual gathering of homosexual public officials.

Mr. Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said little about issues such as same-sex "marriage" or discrimination laws, and instead addressed broader Democratic agendas, such as raising the minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0096094

Flush from big Democratic gains in the Nov. 7 elections, Mr. Dean emphasized that the "new Democratic Party" reaches out to all citizens, even those less likely to vote for them. The downfall of the "old Democratic Party," he said, had been its acceptance to represent half the nation.

"We've got to take the attitude: Everyone's our boss," Mr. Dean said.

He then outlined the issues he thinks the party should focus on now that Democrats control Congress, including increasing college financial assistance and passing an energy independence bill, the Associated Press reports.

Unusual attitude

"A postelection stay in the cool, cloudy capital reveals a sober Republican Party attempting every day in conversations throughout Capitol Hill a rancor-free analysis of why the party lost, and in a way that was so killingly close and yet brutally decisive," Peggy Noonan writes at www.opinionjournal. com.

"There is a general sense the loss was not undeserved -- this is an unusual attitude for runners just back from the race -- and that it was not so much a vote for something as against something: them. And roiling, rudderless Iraq. And an unpopular president," Miss Noonan said.

"There is a sense the nation's culture and politics are and have been changing, shifting, and agreement that the election was not a realigning one, but could yet prove to be if, among other things, Republicans fail to step back, refind and rethink their philosophy, style, priorities and meaning. They must develop a conservatism that speaks for and to the times. And stop being pigs -- i.e., earmarking careerists who started with belief and wound up with hunger.

"As for Democrats, they have a unique opportunity, one they haven't had in 14 years, to redefine for the public what their party is. It is their chance to change their public label. Now, with the cameras of the country trained on Capitol Hill, they can throw off the old baggage of the 1960s and '70s and erase the cartoon version of their party, which is culturally radical, weak in its defense of America, profligate, McGovernite, bitterly devoted to the demands of its groups as opposed to the needs of America."

No chips at the table

Reuel Marc Gerecht of the Weekly Standard is hearing the calls for an international conference on Iraq, from such quarters as Capitol Hill Democrats and possibly the Iraq commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. He is skeptical.

"Let us set aside for the moment the virulently anti-American Islamist ideology of Iran's ruling clergy and their praetorians, starting with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Let us also not inquire how much influence Iran's mullahs actually have over the Shia of Iraq ... . Let us put aside whether the Iraqis themselves would favor inviting foreigners to intrude further into their affairs; and, for those who care deeply about Sunni Arab participation in a new Iraq, whether legitimizing an Iranian role could possibly win Sunni friends.

"Let us also not ask how much pull Saudi Arabia and Jordan have with the Sunni rejectionist camp of Ba'athists, Sunni supremacists, Salafi and Wahhabi fundamentalists, and martyrdom-loving foreign holy warriors. None of these takes his orders from the royal families of Jordan and Arabia," he writes at the Weekly Standard's Web site.

"Instead, let us consider the question at the heart of any negotiation: What can be traded and bargained? What in the world can the United States give the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Alawite mafia of Bashar Assad in Damascus [Syria] that they do not have already?

"Or to put it in the vernacular of the region: Can the Americans actually hurt me, and will they refrain from doing so? What have Damascus and Tehran lost by the turmoil in Iraq? If the violence in Iraq diminished, would they lose or gain?

"For realists, the answers to all of these questions aren't good. When you're weak -- when you're seen to be weak and see yourself as weak -- you don't have much to offer."

By the numbers

"There's a lot of buzz in the cable TV world that having Democrats running Congress will hurt Fox and help MSNBC and CNN," Paul Bedard writes in the Washington Whispers column of U.S. News & World Report.

"It certainly looked like that election night when CNN won the key viewership demographic of 25-to-54-year-olds. 'We're clearly the place to go for information,' CNN boss Jon Klein tells us. 'Maybe the trick is that you have to actually cover politics. The public seems to be in the mood for facts and information -- not cheerleading.'

DOJ_NMG_0096095

"MSNBC, No. 3 but surging, also crowed: 'MSNBC is the place for politics.' So what about Fox? It simply turned to the numbers. And they show that Fox is still No. 1, with its audience growing. 'We'll let the two cable-news also-rans battle for second place, and we wish Jon and [MSNBC] well on their quest for relevancy,' say an amused Foxie."

When Religion Loses Its Credibility (USAT)

By Oliver "buzz" Thomas

USA Today, November 20, 2006

What if Christian leaders are wrong about homosexuality? I suppose, much as a newspaper maintains its credibility by setting the record straight, church leaders would need to do the same:

Correction: Despite what you might have read, heard or been taught throughout your churchgoing life, homosexuality is, in fact, determined at birth and is not to be condemned by God's followers.

Based on a few recent headlines, we won't be seeing that admission anytime soon. Last week, U.S. Roman Catholic bishops took the position that homosexual attractions are "disordered" and that gays should live closeted lives of chastity. At the same time, North Carolina's Baptist State Convention was preparing to investigate churches that are too gay-friendly. Even the more liberal Presbyterian Church (USA) had been planning to put a minister on trial for conducting a marriage ceremony for two women before the charges were dismissed on a technicality. All this brings me back to the question: What if we're wrong?

Religion's only real commodity, after all, is its moral authority. Lose that, and we lose our credibility. Lose credibility, and we might as well close up shop.

It's happened to Christianity before, most famously when we dug in our heels over Galileo's challenge to the biblical view that the Earth, rather than the sun, was at the center of our solar system. You know the story. Galileo was persecuted for what turned out to be incontrovertibly true. For many, especially in the scientific community, Christianity never recovered.

This time, Christianity is in danger of squandering its moral authority by continuing its pattern of discrimination against gays and lesbians in the face of mounting scientific evidence that sexual orientation has little or nothing to do with choice. To the contrary, whether sexual orientation arises as a result of the mother's hormones or the child's brain structure or DNA, it is almost certainly an accident of birth. The point is this: Without choice, there can be no moral culpability.

So, why are so many church leaders (not to mention Orthodox Jewish and Muslim leaders) persisting in their view that homosexuality is wrong despite a growing stream of scientific evidence that is likely to become a torrent in the coming years? The answer is found in Leviticus 18. "You shall not lie with a man as with a woman; it is an abomination."

As a former "the Bible says it, I believe it, that settles it" kind of guy, I am sympathetic with any Christian who accepts the Bible at face value. But here's the catch. Leviticus is filled with laws imposing the death penalty for everything from eating catfish to sassing your parents. If you accept one as the absolute, unequivocal word of God, you must accept them all.

For many of gay America's loudest critics, the results are unthinkable. First, no more football. At least not without gloves. Handling a pig skin is an abomination. Second, no more Saturday games even if you can get a new ball. Violating the Sabbath is a capital offense according to Leviticus. For the over-40 crowd, approaching the altar of God with a defect in your sight is taboo, but you'll have plenty of company because those menstruating or with disabilities are also barred.

The truth is that mainstream religion has moved beyond animal sacrifice, slavery and the host of primitive rituals described in Leviticus centuries ago. Selectively hanging onto these ancient proscriptions for gays and lesbians exclusively is unfair according to anybody's standard of ethics. We lawyers call it "selective enforcement," and in civil affairs it's illegal.

A better reading of Scripture starts with the book of Genesis and the grand pronouncement about the world God created and all those who dwelled in it. "And, the Lord saw that it was good." If God created us and if everything he created is good, how can a gay person be guilty of being anything more than what God created him or her to be?

Turning to the New Testament, the writings of the Apostle Paul at first lend credence to the notion that homosexuality is a sin, until you consider that Paul most likely is referring to the Roman practice of pederasty, a form of pedophilia common in the ancient world. Successful older men often took boys into their homes as concubines, lovers or sexual slaves. Today, such sexual exploitation of minors is no longer tolerated. The point is that the sort of long-term, committed, same-sex relationships that are being debated today are not addressed in the New Testament. It distorts the biblical witness to apply verses written in one historical context (i.e. sexual exploitation of children) to contemporary situations between two monogamous partners of the same sex. Sexual promiscuity is condemned by the Bible whether it's between gays or straights. Sexual fidelity is not.

For those who have lingering doubts, dust off your Bibles and take a few hours to reacquaint yourself with the teachings of Jesus. You won't find a single reference to homosexuality. There are teachings on money, lust, revenge, divorce, fasting and a thousand other subjects, but there is nothing on homosexuality. Strange, don't you think, if being gay were such a moral threat?

On the other hand, Jesus spent a lot of time talking about how we should treat others. First, he made clear it is not our role to judge. It is God's. ("Judge not lest you be judged." Matthew 7:1) And, second, he commanded us to love other people as we love ourselves.

So, I ask you. Would you want to be discriminated against? Would you want to lose your job, housing or benefits because of something over which you had no control? Better yet, would you like it if society told you that you couldn't visit your lifelong partner in the hospital or file a claim on his behalf if he were murdered?

The suffering that gay and lesbian people have endured at the hands of religion is incalculable, but they can look expectantly to the future for vindication. Scientific facts, after all, are a stubborn thing. Even our religious beliefs must finally yield to them as the church in its battle with Galileo ultimately realized. But for religion, the future might be ominous. Watching the growing conflict between medical science and religion over homosexuality is like watching a train wreck from a distance. You can see it coming for miles and sense the inevitable conclusion, but you're powerless to stop it. The more church leaders dig in their heels, the worse it's likely to be.

New Tactic In Fighting Marriage Initiatives (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

TUCSON -- A pair of retirees keeping house in a concrete bungalow, with snapshots of their 30 grandchildren and great-grandchildren in the living room and an American flag out front, may not look like the face of gay America.

But this month Al Breznay, 79, and Maxine Piatt, 75, were pivotal in defeating an Arizona initiative that defined marriage as the union of one man and one woman -- the only one of 28 such state measures ever to fail.

Breznay, a retired mechanic who still does odd jobs to bring in extra cash, and Piatt, a former bank teller, are at the forefront of a strategy to defeat a tide of same-sex marriage bans by talking about straight people.

Of those 28 state marriage initiatives, 17 have included language outlawing domestic partnerships. Gay rights advocates see this as an opening to highlight for heterosexual voters the impact such initiatives may have on them, and in Arizona, activists kept the spotlight on couples such as Breznay and Piatt, registered domestic partners whose faces appeared on fliers and television ads.

"The majority of people in Arizona don't support gay marriage. That's clear, they do not," said Marty Rouse, national field director of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy group. "Once you say gay and lesbian, people hone in on that. We have to focus on the majority of people that will be affected by this. And the majority of people are straight couples."

The campaign against the Arizona measure, Proposition 107, avoided almost any mention of gay marriage, except in small liberal pockets of the state. Instead, the message was about the section of the measure that would have banned government agencies from recognizing civil unions or domestic partnerships.

That apparently struck home in the state's sizable senior-citizen enclaves, where many older couples do not marry because their retirement income would be affected. The initiative was defeated, 52 percent to 48 percent.

"It's not a liberal-versus-conservative issue," said Steve May, a former Republican state representative who is gay and who served as treasurer of the campaign against Proposition 107. "It's about, 'I don't need to take away health care from Al and Maxine, this nice old couple in Tucson.' "

In fact, the couple's health coverage would not have been affected by the measure's passage, although their ability to pay for the coverage or to visit each other in intensive care would change, as they discovered when Piatt got sick two years ago.

Such generalizing upsets supporters of the initiative, who accuse opponents of fear-mongering.

"They misled voters. They scared seniors into believing they would lose Social Security benefits," said Cathi Herrod, spokeswoman for the pro-107 campaign. "Our problem was we did not have funds to respond to the attacks."

Her campaign spent about $1 million, she said, compared with the $2.1 million spent by the measure's opponents.

Talking to straight couples does not always work; the strategy failed in Virginia this year, where a marriage law passed with 57 percent of the vote.

The differences in Arizona were a longer campaign and a relentless focus on benefits and health care, Rouse said.

In Virginia, "most of the media coverage talked about a gay marriage ban," he said, "whereas in Arizona, you did hear about a ban on same-sex marriage, but it was still focused on health care."

This month's results may prove instructive in setting the debate in the next state where same-sex marriage is likely to appear on the ballot: Florida, in 2008.

"Florida might be able to learn from Arizona," Rouse said. But "campaigns are campaigns. If you do your research and you find out what voters care about, then you know what to focus on."

For some gay activists, it was bittersweet to defeat a same-sex marriage ban by avoiding the subject of homosexuality.

"To truly win the freedom to marry and end discrimination, we can't just play defense," said Evan Wolfson, executive director of the gay rights group Freedom to Marry. He added that proponents of same-sex marriage must "avoid messaging that blocks further attacks and does not move us further ahead."

Wolfson says he takes heart in the reelection of legislators who support same-sex marriage and in the narrowing margins by which initiatives banning same-sex marriage have passed. In 2004, 71 percent of voters voted for such initiatives on average; that dropped to 56 percent this year.

"Even if, in the short-term battles, we may have to emphasize the overbreadth, the dangers to non-gay people and the general unfairness, the trend is in our favor," Wolfson said.

That is not how it looks to Bill Maier, vice president and psychologist in residence at Focus on the Family, a proponent of state same-sex marriage bans.

Voters in states with marriage initiatives this year tended to be more libertarian than those voting in 2004, so they shied away from constitutional changes, he said.

"When you see more of these amendments pop up in 'red states,' I think you're going to see more of those large percentages," Maier said.

Maier also sees a backlash on the horizon. He points to New Jersey, where civil unions or same-sex marriage could be legalized in the next six months after an order by the state Supreme Court.

"When people see gay people standing on the courthouse steps saying, 'I'm getting married come hell or high water,' among the general population there tends to be a recoil," Maier said.

For their part, Breznay and Piatt are pleased that Arizona's initiative lost, though same-sex marriage has never been their cause.

"We didn't care one way or the other. It didn't involve us," Piatt said. "That's what makes me so angry, is people linked this gay marriage to domestic partnerships."

Foley Ends Treatment (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Sources tell us disgraced ex-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) ended his stay at a rehab facility in Arizona that treats alcohol addiction as well as sexual addiction and compulsion before he headed back to Florida to attend the funeral of his father.

“It was more for that,” said one source, referring to sexual addiction.

We’re told that Foley’s sister, Donna Winterson, went to fetch her brother and check him out of the facility, called Sierra Tucson, in the final days of their father’s struggle with cancer. Their father, Edward Foley Jr., died Tuesday at a hospice center in Palm Beach County, Fla.

DOJ_NMG_0096098

Foley, who now faces a Florida criminal investigation into his sexually explicit Internet messages, declared that he was an alcoholic in the days after he resigned over the page scandal. Sierra Tucson treats alcohol and drug addiction, as well as eating disorders, sexual addiction/compulsivity, obsessive-compulsive disorder and depression, among other mental health problems.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement reportedly has launched an active criminal investigation into Foley's instant message chit chats with male teenage pages, which cost Republicans that very safe GOP seat and may well have been the nail in the coffin for their majority.

Speaking of Which ... Kirk Fordham, who resigned as chief of staff to Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) amid the damning page scandal, was seen around Capitol Hill last week.

Fordham was spotted Thursday coming out of the National Republican Congressional Committee, chaired by Reynolds. On Friday, he was seen hanging around the Longworth House Office Building as House Republicans chose their new leaders.

Aides were surprised by Fordham's presence.

"What the hell is he doing here?" asked one, who requested anonymity. "He's one of the reasons we're in the minority."

Fordham was casually chatting up a reporter when approached by HOH. He said he had been "over at Reynolds' office" and wanted to come by Longworth to see what was happening.

Fordham was chief of staff in the New York Republican's personal office when the Foley scandal erupted. He served for several years as Foley's chief of staff.

"I've just been having some good downtime," he added.

Birthday for Old Blue Eyes. Winning his race for Minority Leader was the best birthday present Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) could get after losing the majority. Having his colleagues sing the famous "Boehner Birthday Song" that he wrote himself surely was second-best.

Boehner emerged victorious from the secret-ballot leadership elections on Friday, which coincided with his 57th birthday. The throng of reporters waiting for him outside demanded that he sing his famous birthday song.

"It's my birthday — I," Boehner said, pointing at himself indignantly, "shouldn't have to sing it!"

So the entire new leadership team sang it for him, perfectly off-key, with Boehner joining in to make sure they didn't screw up the lyrics: "This — is — your — birthday song, it doesn't last too long. Hey!" The second verse is the same as the first. "This — is — your —birthday song, it doesn't last too long. "Hey!"

The "Boehner Birthday Song" is so famous it's on YouTube, where you can see a video of Boehner singing the little ditty on the House floor to Rep. Ralph Hall on the Texas Republican's 83rd birthday in May. Everyone on the floor joined in, as poor Hall implored Boehner to stop.

Apparently the birthday song induces much cringing among Boehner's staff. Spokesman Kevin Madden said as soon as he walked back to the office after the little sing-a-long media availability, "Everyone was saying, 'Why did you let him sing the birthday song?'"

"Yeah right," Madden said. "Like I could have stopped him."

But they didn't mind singing along with the boss in the privacy of the office. "I'm shocked that some windows didn't crack," Madden said.

Kerry, Marines and Tequila. You might be able to accuse him of being the most boring guy IN the party, but ya can't really say he's the most boring guy AT the party. Not after Wednesday night.

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) was hanging out with about 30 staffers and former '04 presidential campaign alumni at the Senator's favorite Capitol Hill hangout, Finn MacCool's, down on Barracks Row by the Marines' headquarters. A group of Marines started chatting with the Senator and invited him to belly up to the bar with them. Kerry eschewed his button-downed staff for a good 20 minutes while he chatted with his new Semper Fi pals. They bought the Senator a tequila shot, which our trusty sources say Kerry downed in a flat second.

Food Banks Have Less To Work With As They Try To Meet Holiday Demand (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096099

The nation's food banks are scrambling to serve a growing demand for help during the holidays at a time when government food donations and private cash contributions have fallen.

More people are asking for food even as the amount of government commodities available — milk, cheese, canned goods and other staples — is down 55% from 2005, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. A second USDA program of emergency food aid has stayed about the same. Together, they supply about one-fourth of what food banks give away.

USDA buys fewer commodities when it has less need to boost farm prices. It gives 80% of purchases to America's Second Harvest, a network of more than 200 food banks.

The loss of USDA commodities is "huge," says Paul Ash of the San Francisco Food Bank. He says his group is increasing visits to stores to pick up food with "sell by" dates about to expire.

Ash says the Bay Area's cost of living is forcing more low-income workers to seek help. He has managed to increase his holiday distribution 35% this year but says that remains "far short" of the need.

High rents have increased demand in Hawaii, doubling it in some areas, says Dick Grimm, president of Hawaii Foodbank.

Demand is up 34% from two years ago in the Dallas area, says Colleen Brinkmann of the North Texas Food Bank, and 39% from five years ago in Washington, D.C., and its suburbs, says Brian Smith of the Capital Area Food Bank.

"We have a lot of empty racks in our warehouse. That's unusual," says Carey Miller of the Food Bank of Iowa.

Despite reports of higher demand, a USDA report last week said the number of people who couldn't put food on the table at least part of the year fell in 2005 to 35 million, down from 38 million in 2004. It was the first decline in six years. But the report found the number of those worst off increased slightly.

High fuel prices this year have hurt many low-wage earners by forcing them to choose between heating their homes or buying food, says Maura Daly of America's Second Harvest.

Daly says the network is trying to expand programs, relying partly on a 3% rise this year in private food donations. She says financial donations this year are down 9% from 2005, not counting relief funds received after Hurricane Katrina.

"Every food bank will tell you," she says, "they need more food."

Brother, Can You Spare A Word? (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

First the good news: the government's annual hunger report shows a slight decline last year in the number of citizens in need of food. Now the bad news: the annual hunger report has dropped the word "hunger."

Instead, there were 35 million Americans last year suffering from "low food security," meaning they chronically lacked the resources to be able to eat enough food. Of these, 10.8 million lived with "very low food security," meaning they were the hungriest among the hungry, so to speak.

Bureaucratic terminology about food security has always been a part of the hunger report, but so was the plain word "hunger." The Agriculture Department decided that variations of "hungry" are not scientifically accurate, following the advice of the Committee on National Statistics of the National Academies. The specialists advised that being hungry was too amorphous a way to refer to "a potential consequence of food insecurity that, because of prolonged, involuntary lack of food, results in discomfort, illness, weakness or pain that goes beyond the usual uneasy sensation."

The government insists that no Orwellian plot is in the works to mask a national blight. The goal has been to cut what we'll call the hungry households to no more than 6 percent of the population. But hungry people persist at nearly twice that rate, despite the slight drop last year. To the extent that more public empathy is needed to prod a stronger attack on low food security, we opt for "hunger" as a most stirring word.

Schools Slow In Closing Gaps Between Races (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

When President Bush signed his sweeping education law a year into his presidency, it set 2014 as the deadline by which schools were to close the test-score gaps between minority and white students that have persisted since standardized testing began.

DOJ_NMG_0096100

Now, as Congress prepares to consider reauthorizing the law next year, researchers and a half-dozen recent studies, including three issued last week, are reporting little progress toward that goal. Slight gains have been seen for some grade levels.

Despite concerted efforts by educators, the test-score gaps are so large that, on average, African-American and Hispanic students in high school can read and do arithmetic at only the average level of whites in junior high school.

"The gaps between African-Americans and whites are showing very few signs of closing," Michael T. Nettles, a senior vice president at the Educational Testing Service, said in a paper he presented recently at Columbia University. One ethnic minority, Asians, generally fares as well as or better than whites.

The reports and their authors, in interviews, portrayed an educational landscape in which test-score gaps between black or Hispanic students and whites appear in kindergarten and worsen through 12 years of public education.

Some researchers based their conclusions on federal test results, while others have cited state exams, the SATs and other widely administered standardized assessments. Still, the studies have all concurred: The achievement gaps remain, perplexing and persistent.

The findings pose a challenge not only for Mr. Bush but also for the Democratic lawmakers who joined him in negotiating the original law, known as No Child Left Behind, and who will control education policy in Congress next year.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Representative George Miller of California, who are expected to be the chairmen of the Senate and House education committees, will promote giving more resources to schools and researching strategies to improve minority performance, according to aides.

"Closing the achievement gap is at the heart of No Child Left Behind and must continue to be our focus in renewing the act next year," Mr. Kennedy said in a statement.

Experts have suggested many possible changes, including improving the law's mechanisms for ensuring that teachers in poor schools are experienced and knowledgeable, and extending early-childhood education to more students.

Henry L. Johnson, an assistant secretary of education, said: "I don't dispute that looking at some comparisons we see that these gaps are not closing — or not as fast as they ought to. But it's also accurate to say that when taken as a whole, student performance is improving. The presumption that we won't get to 100 percent proficiency from here presumes that everything is static. To reach the 100 percent by 2014, we'll all have to work faster and smarter."

The law requires states, districts and schools to report annual test results for all racial and ethnic groups, and to show annual improvements for each. It imposes sanctions on schools that do not meet the rising targets.

Many experts and officials, including the president's brother, Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, have supported the goal of raising all students to academic proficiency, but they have also called it unrealistic to accomplish in a decade.

But President Bush, who put education at the center of his 2000 campaign, has been insisting that it is not only feasible but that the gaps are already closing.

"There are good results of No Child Left Behind across the nation," Mr. Bush said last month at a school in North Carolina. "We have an achievement gap in America that is — that I don't like and you shouldn't like."

"The gap is closing," he said.

The researchers behind the reports issued last week in Washington, D.C., New York and California were far more pessimistic, though.

"The achievement gap is alive and well," said G. Gage Kingsbury, an author of the report issued in Washington by the Northwest Evaluation Association, a nonprofit group based in Oregon that administers tests.

Examining results from reading and math tests administered to 500,000 students in 24 states in the fall of 2004 and the spring of 2005, the study found: "For each score level at each grade in each subject, minority students grew less than European-Americans, and students from poor schools grew less than those from wealthier ones."

Minority and poor students also lost more academic ground each summer, the study said.

Ross Wiener, a principal partner at the Education Trust, a group that works to close achievement gaps and has consistently supported the federal law, called those findings "profoundly disturbing" and said it showed that schools continued to be a "significant source of disadvantage for minority students."

DOJ_NMG_0096101

"The Bush administration wants to hang a 'Mission Accomplished' banner over N.C.L.B., but a fair assessment is that progress thus far in closing achievement gaps is disappointing," Mr. Weiner said. He pointed to financing and teacher assignment systems that lead to schools with mostly poor and minority students getting less money, offering fewer advanced courses and having weaker teachers.

The 2005 National Assessment of Educational Progress, a battery of reading and math tests administered to thousands of students in every state, showed some rising scores for all ethnic groups, and the black-white score gap narrowed in a statistically significant way for fourth-grade math. But on fourth-grade reading, and on eighth-grade reading and math, the black-white and Hispanic-white gaps were statistically unchanged from the early 1990s.

Over the past three decades, the gaps narrowed steadily from the 1970s through the late 1980s but then leveled out through 1999. Since then, some have narrowed again, but at a rate that would allow them to persist for decades. That picture showed up in a separate National Assessment test devised to measure long-term trends, administered in late 2003 and early 2004.

That test showed that regardless of race, scores increased a bit over three decades for 9- and 13-year-old students, with the best gains coming between 1999 and 2004.

Test administrators warned against attributing those gains to the federal law, because it had been in effect for about only a year when the 2004 test was given. Prekindergarten programs, higher standards and increased testing carried out by many states during the 1990s also contributed, they said.

But Bush administration officials have routinely credited the law for the improved scores on that test.

A group that has supported the federal law, the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, whose leaders include former officials from the Reagan and the current Bush administrations, conducted a review of state exams and other indicators and issued a report this month. It found that none of the 50 states had made widespread progress in narrowing the gaps, and that eight states, including New York and New Jersey, had made "moderate gains."

Chester E. Finn Jr., the foundation president, said, "Poor and minority students are doing very poorly, and in most states are not making significant gains — and this in spite of N.C.L.B. and all the other reforms of the last 15 years."

Suggestions abound for ways to narrow the score gaps faster. Since scholars have documented that minority children enter kindergarten with weaker reading skills than white children, some experts advocate increased public financing for early education programs.

No Child Left Behind provides money for tutoring in schools where students are not succeeding, but critics say it does not provide sufficient financing to help states and districts turn the schools themselves around.

Several of the new reports urged better provisions to ensure that poor and mostly minority schools have quality teachers, to reward teachers who help struggling students improve, and to keep good teachers from leaving city schools for higher-paying suburban ones.

"If I'm in a bad school and make serious progress, I need a reward," Dr. Nettles said. "If you perform on Wall Street, you get a bonus."

But the news is not all bad. Individual schools in some states have made progress in narrowing the gaps between black and white, Hispanic and white, and the poor and more affluent, according to a Standard & Poor's unit that analyzes school performance.

The unit credited Morgan County Elementary School in Madison, Ga., with significantly raising the scores of black fourth and fifth graders. The principal, Jean Triplett, attributed that success in part to after-school tutoring by volunteers in black churches.

Edwin E. Weeks Elementary School in Syracuse was singled out for narrowing the gap between black and white students. Dare Dutter, the principal, credited a prekindergarten program and a school health clinic that helped keep poor students from missing class.

Standard & Poor's has sifted test data from 16,000 schools in 18 states, identifying 718 schools making significant progress toward the national goal.

"They are the classic diamonds in the rough," said Paul Gazzerro, director of analytics at Standard & Poor's School Evaluation Services. "But in general, schools are not closing achievement gaps."

One of the exceptions, the unit said, is Hoover Middle School in Lakewood, Calif., a community in Los Angeles County where the aircraft manufacturing industry has been hit by job losses. The school has raised Hispanic scores so much that in the spring of 2005 Hispanic students outperformed whites, said the principal, Michael L. Troyer. He said the progress resulted from focused instruction, frequent diagnostic testing and several tutoring programs.

"Some of it's after school, teachers do it at lunch, and we have people who tutor in the morning before school, too," Mr. Troyer said.

Across California, however, achievement gaps have not narrowed, and in some cases they have widened since 2001, according to a study of California test results released last week by Policy Analysis for California Education, a research center run jointly by the University of California and Stanford.

"Not only have all boats stopped rising, but the boats that are under water are sinking further down," said Bruce Fuller, an education professor at the University of California, Berkeley, who contributed to the study.

States Struggle To Pay For Roads (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, November 20, 2006

ATLANTA — Traffic delays in the 18-county sprawl that makes up Atlanta are the fourth-worst in the nation. The state gasoline tax, the primary funding source for road and transit projects, is being eroded by inflation. Fifty-three percent of 512 transportation projects scheduled have been delayed, according to the Atlanta Regional Commission, the area's chief planning agency.

Now, an influential lobbying group is proposing that Georgia eliminate the state's share of the gas tax and replace it with a 1% statewide sales tax to fund transportation. Georgians now pay 7.5 cents per gallon in state gas taxes.

"The problem with a gasoline tax, when it's not associated with the Consumer Price Index, is it continues to lose value," says Mike Kenn, president of Georgians for Better Transportation. "Unless we find a new source of revenue, we in the state of Georgia … are not going to be able to meet our transportation needs."

His group's proposal, which he says would raise more money than the state gas tax, is one of many local efforts around the country to bridge the gap between the federal, state and local funds available for transportation and what's needed.

Nationwide, the gap tops $100 billion a year, says Gary Maring of the transportation consulting firm Cambridge Systematics, which studied the issue last year for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The potentially most far-reaching financing initiative is a pilot program in Oregon that is testing the feasibility of a "virtual tollway" system that would replace the state gas tax with a road-user fee.

Volunteers driving vehicles equipped with state-installed Global Positioning System (GPS) devices pull into gas stations where a transmitter in their car "tells" the pump how many miles they have driven. They then pay for their gas and 1.2 cents for every mile they've driven since their last fill-up; they don't have to pay the 24-cent-per-gallon state gas tax.

The program is raising concerns that it's a way for the government to track motorists and that it penalizes drivers of fuel-efficient vehicles.

James Whitty, who's running the experiment for the Oregon Department of Transportation, says the GPS devices don't transmit or store location data. "This is a stripped-down receiving component that only collects and categorizes miles (driven) as in-state or out-of-state," he says.

If the state decides to adopt the system statewide, the Legislature could implement a lower rate-per-mile for fuel-efficient vehicles, Whitty says.

The year-long experiment began with 280 volunteer motorists who were divided into three groups. One group pays 1.2 cents for every in-state mile traveled. A second group pays 10 cents a mile during rush hour and 0.4 cents per mile during other times. A third group is paying the state's 24-cent-a-gallon gas tax.

DOJ_NMG_0096103

Alan Pisarski, author of an exhaustive study on commuting in the USA, expects other states eventually to duplicate the Oregon experiment.

"I think it's almost inevitable in 20 to 30, maybe 40 years," he says. "There will be an awful lot of public concern about vehicles being tracked. But in the long term, we're going to see more and more cars coming off the line with these tracking devices built in."

Public support for taxes targeted for road and transit projects generally did well in the Nov. 7 elections. Voters approved eight local initiatives to extend or renew an existing sales tax for transportation and approved eight of 12 new taxes for transportation, according to the American Road & Transportation Builders Association, a Washington, D.C.-based lobbying group for the transportation construction industry.

Gary Barnes, a transportation economist at the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota, says voters often will approve a new tax when it's targeted for transportation.

"It doesn't have to do with the money," Barnes says. "It's that people don't feel the (state) Department of Transportation is going to do the right thing with the money if you just raise the gas tax. But in some cases, the referendum passes because it raises taxes to do some specific thing."

Sam Williams, president of the Metro Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, says he thinks voters won't approve the Georgia tax proposal.

"I don't think a 1% state sales tax exclusively for transportation is going to fly," he says. "Places where the congestion is an issue are where people will vote for it. If you're stuck in traffic all day, you would vote for it. But if you're in a sparsely populated area, you have no inclination to vote for it."

Williams says local-option sales taxes for transportation, paid only in congested areas where the money would be used, are more likely to be approved if they meet three criteria: "You've got to tell the voters exactly what you're going to do with the money; you've got to set a sunset so people know the tax is not forever; and you've got to appoint a group of responsible civic watchdogs to look over their shoulder."

Let The Awards Begin: The Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006 (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

After every election, I offer a list of the best and worst, the most and the least. I started doing that the other day, but I ended up filling an entire column with a single category: The Worst Self-Inflicted Wound of 2006.

I will get back to a more exhaustive list of the best and worst campaigns and candidates before the end of the year, but since there were so many self-inflicted wounds this election cycle, I figure I might as well devote an entire column to the nominees, as well as to my logic in picking a winner.

So, without further DeLay, uh, I mean delay, here are the nominees this year:

Don Sherwood (R-Pa.)

Bob Ney (R-Ohio)

George Allen (R-Va.)

John Kerry (D-Mass.)

John Sweeney (R-N.Y.)

Mark Foley (R-Fla.)

I know, I know. This is an impossible choice. How can anyone choose from among these all-time, self-inflicted screw-ups? All of the nominees would be worthwhile winners, and in any other year any of them could have taken home the award. But, alas, life isn't fair, and I have to choose a single winner for '06.

I'm eliminating Foley right away, since his self-inflicted wound actually occurred well before his abortive re-election bid and over an extensive period of time, though it came to light only during his campaign. His problem was a series of wounds, not a single one, and frankly, I don't even want to spend time thinking of the things that Foley wanted to do.

Ney's problems also occurred over an extended period, though they obviously impacted his race for re-election. I guess we could call that golf trip to Scotland a decisive event, but it occurred in 2002. So, like Foley, he gets a pass.

That leaves four. The problem with Sherwood is that I'm not sure whether he had a self-inflicted wound or he inflicted a wound on his girlfriend. I am not sure whether we are talking about a single act or two, whether having a girlfriend (along with a wife) and allegedly (note my legal disclaimer) trying to choke her are two self-inflicted wounds or two parts of a single wound. Since Sherwood admits to one but not the other, he seems to come down on the side of the two separate incidents. Who am I to argue? He's off the hook.

Sweeney is in a bit of the same situation as Sherwood. Obviously, the suggestion that the New York Republican got into a physical scuffle with his wife damaged Sweeney's re-election prospects. But was that photograph of him drinking with college students necessary for the second alleged personal scandal to lead to his defeat? If so, then it was the two scandals together that cost Sweeney his seat, not a single self-inflicted wound. I'm afraid I have to drop him from contention.

That leaves us with Allen and Kerry, two Senators who did their best to destroy their reputations with stupid, ill-timed comments that meet the single "wound" criterion.

Somehow, it seems only right that two Senators are battling it out for the award.

On one level, the Kerry comment about getting good grades or you'll end up in Iraq was worse than Allen's "macaca" comment, since Kerry wasn't even on the ballot and, as my wife pointed out, he compounded his goof by insisting that he was trying to tell a joke when he almost certainly wasn't.

Moreover, Kerry's comment could have not only hurt his party's prospects in 2006, he could also have seriously derailed his own presidential hopes for '08. Impacting two election cycles, not just one, with a single comment is a stunning achievement, even for Kerry.

Having said that, even the Massachusetts Democrat couldn't keep his party from winning the House and the Senate. While some conservative talk radio windbags apparently got angry when I expressed doubt that Kerry's comment would have much of an effect on the midterm elections, most voters apparently shrugged off the Massachusetts Democrat's inept remark.

And if Kerry's comment undermined his potential presidential bid for 2008, I doubt it hurt him very much, since his chances weren't very good to begin with.

Allen's "macaca" comment, on the other hand, had a profound impact. It turned a laugher of a race into a close contest. And since Democrat Jim Webb eventually won the race — thereby giving Democrats control of the Senate and unified control of Congress — the Virginia Republican not only brought about his own defeat and destroyed his once considerable chances of winning the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 but he also realigned the nation's entire governing balance for the next two years.

Because of that jaw-dropping achievement, the award for worst self-inflicted wound must go to Allen. But it was a very close contest.

For MSNBC, Time To Get Political (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Preferably with lots of cameo appearances by big-name news stars from the mothership.

The perennial third-place cable news channel enjoyed a nice bump in the ratings during the midterm campaign, in part because the likes of Brian Williams, Tim Russert, David Gregory and Campbell Brown broke away from their NBC duties to help out.

"We've found a voice as of late, and a large part of that voice is politics," says MSNBC General Manager Dan Abrams. And although he doesn't plan to put on "all politics all the time until 2008," Abrams says he wants to continue "branding" MSNBC as a haven for political junkies.

Of course, MSNBC has done well in other campaigns, only to have the gains vanish after Election Day. All of cable news tends to get big spikes during major stories -- war, scandal, missing white women -- that fade when the news cycle moves on.

"The chronic problem -- and it will likely happen again in the days ahead -- is a big drop-off back to unpleasant, distant-third reality," says Erik Sorenson, a former MSNBC president.

There's no plan to transform the channel into an extended version of Chris Matthews's "Hardball," but MSNBC covered the House leadership shootout between Jack Murtha and Steny Hoyer with presidential-campaign intensity.

During the midterm campaign's stretch run, Abrams devoted two full days to politics and persuaded some of NBC's heavyweights to anchor hour-long programs. In October, MSNBC's ratings were up 14 percent over a year earlier, while Fox News was down 17 percent and CNN was down 8 percent. Of course, the NBC channel started from a much lower base. Fox averaged 792,000 viewers for the month, CNN 491,000 and MSNBC 287,000. (CNN scored a rare ratings win between 7 p.m. and 2 a.m. on election night, drawing 2.54 million viewers to Fox's 2.39 million and MSNBC's 1.58 million.)

NBC hotshots once looked down their noses at their cable sibling. But Andrea Mitchell, the network's chief foreign affairs correspondent, who made frequent MSNBC appearances during the campaign, is now anchoring an hour most mornings at 11. Although the cable audience is far smaller, "you would not believe the kind of reaction I've had from people I really respect," Mitchell says. As for potential guests, "many people want to do live interviews as opposed to edited interviews where they'll be a 15-second sound bite."

Mitchell also sees a certain synergy, such as when she was interviewing an Iraq expert last week on MSNBC and gleaned information for a piece she was preparing on the subject for NBC's "Today" show.

The network feasted on last week's Democratic infighting, from Matthews's midday appearances to a steady stream of analysts, including Newsweek's Jonathan Alter and Howard Fineman and The Washington Post's Dana Milbank. (The two Post-owned publications share a news alliance with MSNBC.) By contrast with its rivals, MSNBC essentially ignored the controversy over O.J. Simpson's maybe-I-did-it television special and the search for a missing 2-year-old in Florida, and provided modest coverage of a deadly tornado in North Carolina.

The effort by Abrams, the former legal-affairs commentator who took over in June, to tap more NBC talent will be getting an unexpected boost from a painful round of budget cuts at the network. Over the next year, MSNBC will abandon its Secaucus, N.J., campus and move in with its corporate parent at Manhattan's 30 Rock. A number of producers, bookers and others will be let go as job functions are combined. Abrams insists that the impact will be modest because his network is already thinly staffed.

Some of the election coverage was anchored by Joe Scarborough, a former Republican congressman, and Keith Olbermann, whose show "Countdown" has become a nightly feast of Bush-bashing.

"His program could become a model for the newscast of the future," Abrams says. "It's a mix of straight news reporting with lighter fare and occasionally with some opinion."

Some opinion? Not only does Olbermann steer clear of conservative guests, he has added an occasional "special comment" segment in which he recently urged President Bush to apologize to American troops for starting and mishandling the war, going on to suggest that "you are not honest" and "you are far more stupid than the worst of your critics has suggested."

Olbermann said last spring that he is not ideological but that his growing conviction about the administration's failings puts him "in the same part of the ballpark as a lot of liberals."

Scarborough, for his part, says: "I see my job now as someone who holds both parties accountable, and I think I've proven that over the last year. Probably I've held my own party to a higher standard than Democrats. The burden is on me to prove I'm fair and down the middle." Both Olbermann and Scarborough did put aside their views while anchoring campaign news shows.

Abrams, who was no shrinking violet back when he hosted his own show, says CBS is edging in a similar direction in trying to make Katie Couric "accessible and personable. . . . In cable news, the most honest thing we can provide for our viewers is the sense that you know where the host is coming from."Holding Back

For 10 weeks, Denver television reporter Paula Woodward tried to break the story about the Rev. Ted Haggard carrying on a gay relationship. She had the firsthand account of a male prostitute, Mike Jones, and copies of voice mails that Haggard, the head of the National Association of Evangelicals, had left for Jones. But Woodward was so cautious that she lost the scoop when Jones, frustrated by the delays, made his allegations -- under a pseudonym -- on a local radio show.

"We're very comfortable with the way we handled it," Woodward, a KUSA reporter, says. "We knew that the story, if true, would have a very dramatic impact on his life, his family's life and the church."

DOJ_NMG_0096106

The station contacted voice experts, who said they could not verify the phone messages without a "first generation" recording of Haggard's voice. So, as Columbia Journalism Review reported, Woodward and her news director decided to use hidden cameras to tape Haggard entering and leaving Jones's apartment. That plan failed because Haggard, who always initiated the visits, stopped contacting Jones.

After Jones went on the radio show this month, KUSA got an interview with Haggard -- who denied any misconduct -- and was able to use that tape to confirm the authenticity of the voice-mail messages. When the station reported that information the following day, Haggard resigned from the evangelical group and later admitted to sexual "immorality."

Woodward and her news director, Patti Dennis, insist they're not disappointed. "In my mind, we broke the story," Dennis says.Parting Words

It was a routine memo from USA Today's management, telling the staff that reporter Elliot Blair Smith would be leaving the paper for Bloomberg News and thanking him "for his excellent work."

But accidentally attached to the mass e-mail last week was a note from Smith, griping about how his last story was being handled. Smith, whose last day will be Friday, called the piece "the most powerful, the most explosive report on the most important financial story of the year. It required intense dedication. . . . It would take one hour of everybody's time to sit down and iron out any wrinkles that remain. One hour, I have that, don't you?" Smith said they should "close out the relationship with really substantial and meaningful actions, instead of these nice words below."

Well, at least everybody got both sides.

Howard Kurtz hosts CNN's weekly media program, "Reliable Sources."

AHIP Hop (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Rising costs, an aging population, and a Democratic Congress mean the coming years are sure to see pressure for a larger government role in health care. So it's encouraging that America's private health insurers are thinking about ways to preserve a competitive market for health services. We only wish the proposals they released this month under the banner of their lobby group -- America's Health Insurance Plans -- did more to promote a genuine free market in health care.

AHIP's one really good idea is the creation of something called a Universal Health Account, which would end the tax bias that lets employers deduct health care expenditures but doesn't let individuals do the same. The employer-based private health care system has contributed significantly to cost inflation, because individuals generally aren't sensitive to the price of their treatment decisions. It also contributes to the perceived problem of the "uninsured," because a very large number of the 40-some million Americans classed as such every year are merely between jobs.

Congress took an important step toward equalizing tax treatment and encouraging portable, individually owned polices by creating Health Savings Accounts in the 2003 Medicare bill. HSAs combine a tax-free, high-deductible insurance policy with a tax-free savings account to pay smaller expenses. But while their take-up rate has been impressive, HSAs still represent only a small portion of the market. A Democratic Congress also isn't likely to be friendly to further HSA expansion on the grounds that high-deductible plans are only for the "healthy and wealthy."

Studies of HSA purchasers provide little support for the "health and wealthy" charge. But AHIP's Universal Accounts proposal transcends that debate by suggesting that any type of insurance plan -- even first-dollar coverage, if an individual so chooses -- ought to qualify for HSA-type tax treatment. This is a genuinely innovative proposal.

It wouldn't merely go a long way toward making insurance more affordable for those who don't get it from their employers. It would provide incentives to move beyond the employer-based insurance system. Instead, companies would be free to fund portable insurance policies for their employees much like they fund portable 401(k) retirement accounts. Such a Universal Health Account system would provide more security than the current one, which often keeps sick people tied to jobs for fear of losing coverage. We hope the idea gets a fair hearing.

Now for the bad news. AHIP suggests that the federal government make substantial matching contributions to help lower- and middle-income people buy into the Universal Health Accounts. This isn't necessary to make them affordable, and it might contribute to general health care inflation, just as federal subsidies have done for higher education.

For those at the very low end of the income scale, AHIP proposes bringing more people into Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program (S-CHIP). This strategy was already tried in the 1990s, without making any dent in the number of uninsured. Much of the money simply displaced private spending, and millions of people eligible for Medicaid simply don't bother to sign up.

The biggest disappointment is that the insurers aren't calling for a national market in health insurance -- which is essential if their Universal Health Accounts are to work as well as they should. In addition to the tax code, one of the biggest obstacles to portability and individual policy ownership is that insurance is governed by 50 different sets of state regulations. These rules can make insurance needlessly expensive (as in New York and Massachusetts), and the balkanized market curbs innovation and prevents the development of larger risk pools and economies of scale.

Congressman John Shadegg (R., Ariz.) has a bill that would let individuals in any state purchase insurance that's passed muster with regulators in any other state -- the same way they do with banking products such as credit cards right now. And if that's considered a non-starter for the next Congress, another alternative would be to create an optional federal insurance charter in addition to the 50 sets of state regulations. The current system is a special-interest anachronism in this age of the Internet and global commerce, and some of those special interests are members of AHIP. The Blue Cross/Blue Shield Association, for one, likes fragmentation because it has been able to dominate a number of local markets.

We understand the internal political limitations of a diverse organization like AHIP, and at least it has proposed an innovative idea in Universal Health Accounts. But if AHIP wants to be taken seriously as a proponent of market-oriented health care solutions, it's going to have to get consistent about letting markets work -- even if that would expose some of its own companies to more competition.

The Taxpayers' Chauffeurs (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The answer to one question raised by the scandal involving State Comptroller Alan Hevesi should be easy: public officials could take public transportation as a matter of public policy.

Instead, a lot of them manage to move from place to place, even from home to work, as comfortably as the very rich. They come and go courtesy of cars and chauffeurs (they like to call them drivers) paid for by taxpayers. And even though it is very hard to figure out how much these fleets actually cost, you can be sure it would be cheaper if these officials took a bus, subway or taxi or even drove and parked their own cars like the rest of us.

Nobody wants to deny a strong car and a beefy driver to an official who needs security, but now that Mr. Hevesi is facing investigations for using a state car and driver for his wife, there should be questions for everybody else in government enjoying those perks. Why, for example, should state agency heads have such unrestricted access to cars and drivers that at least one top official has been accused of using her car and driver to go shopping? Or, if security is the measure, why does a local prosecutor or judge who puts a violent gang member in jail have to drive home alone?

In some cases, chauffeur-driven officials quickly pay the state and the Internal Revenue Service for any personal use. Since he was caught, Mr. Hevesi has so far paid out more than $170,000 to cover the state-financed transport. Other public officials have hastened to repay even modest amounts. State politicians have repeatedly assured reporters in recent weeks that state cars or drivers are not allowed for personal use, but the questions clearly make them nervous. For example, Joseph Bruno, the Senate majority leader, was so irritated and flustered at the very question that he denied having a driver and then reassured everyone that the driver he did have had never done anything inappropriate.

Gov. George Pataki's use of airplanes and limousines has always been hard to track, since his schedule, like much of his administration, is top secret. But that picture is even murkier these days as administration staff members refuse to talk about the policy for car and driver use. They say we might draw a "moral equivalent" between Mr. Hevesi's car use and Governor Pataki's transportation use.

None of this would be a problem if the state would follow Mayor Michael Bloomberg's lead. Mr. Bloomberg, who is rich enough to commute by helicopter, prefers the subway. Early in his first term, he also took away the lights and sirens from New York City administrators accustomed to turning every routine trip across town into a mock emergency.

There are no subways in Albany, and the bus and taxi services are meager. But there is something to be said for anything that reminds public officials that they are no different from other citizens who struggle with traffic jams and subway doors and the ordinary hazards of moving about.

Apec Closes Ranks On N Korea Threat (FT)

By Caroline Daniel, Alan Beattie And Amy Kazmin In Hanoi

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

The 21 members of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (Apec) forum on Sunday presented a united front to North Korea, urging it to start dismantling its nuclear weapons programme.

US officials had wanted a formal published statement to show the combined resolve of countries in the region surrounding North Korea.

But they could manage only an oral statement, which was read out at a private session of the Apec leaders by Nguyen Minh Triet, Vietnam's president. South Korea later issued a transcript.

"The statement was very firm in the need for full implementation of the Security Council Resolutions, 1695 and 1718. What was important was the leaders of Apec coming together in a common statement," said David McCormick, an official at the US National Security Council.

The pressing matter of North Korea overshadowed the supposed substance of the gathering: talks to encourage economic integration in the Asia-Pacific region.

However, the meeting agreed to commission a study on turning Apec, which stretches from Russia across Asia to the US, into a giant tariff-cutting "regional trade agreement", and gave rhetorical support for the resumption of the stalled Doha round of global trade talks.

But the Apec members made no new offers to reduce their own trade protection to get the Doha talks going again, and admitted that turning Apec into a so-called Free Trade Area of the Asia-Pacific was immensely complex and at best a long-term project.

The FTAAP plan evoked some opposition from business leaders, who said it was unworkable and had distracted attention from the Doha talks.

Apec, which contains a broad range of economies from poverty-stricken dictatorships through oil exporters to rich nations like the US and Singapore, has always taken a voluntary approach to liberalising trade.

Charles Morrison, international chair of the Pacific Economic Cooperation Council, a business grouping, said: "The trade-oriented Apec economies have no real alternative. Since Apec itself has no negotiating mechanism, it must depend on the WTO to achieve liberalisation."

Mr Morrison said that more concessions were needed from Apec members including Japan, Korea and the US in order to induce movement from the "laggards" outside the grouping, including India and the EU.

In bilateral meetings on Sunday, US President George W. Bush met Hu Jintao, China's president, and Vladimir Putin, president of Russia.

Mr McCormick said Mr Bush and Mr Hu had "a very lengthy and very positive discussion on North Korea" and had found "general agreement on the next steps".

Chinese officials ruled out any changes to the UN resolutions, which provide for sanctions against the reclusive communist state.

Liu Jianchao, foreign ministry spokesman, said the resolutions should not be "randomly interpreted" or expanded.

However, he added that the two leaders agreed that "North Korea should get the message that possessing a nuclear bomb will not have the support of the international community".

US officials have sought during the Apec talks to evoke the lessons of Vietnam, as an example to both North Korea and Burma, and to suggest a possible path to international approval.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said the Vietnamese experience was instructive.

DOJ_NMG_0096109

"If the leaders of Burma and North Korea were to follow the example of Vietnam, if they made the strategic choice and took the necessary steps to join the international community, then it would open a new path to peace and prosperity," she said.

At Close Of Economic Summit, Participants Offer Support For U.S. Policy On North Korea (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — — The United States and its partners in the campaign to force North Korea to end its nuclear weapons program won the support Sunday of a broad summit of Pacific Rim nations, the latest effort to step up pressure in slow-moving talks with the isolated Pyongyang government.

The declaration was issued as an informal statement delivered by the conference host, the president of Vietnam, rather than a as a formal paper — a distinction suggesting a less-authoritative step.

It was issued at the conclusion of the annual meeting of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation group, shortly before President Bush, who spent the weekend in Hanoi, flew to Ho Chi Minh City.

Bush came to Asia to attend the Pacific Rim economic summit. But issues of nuclear proliferation and security have formed the backdrop each day of his visit, from a speech in Singapore on Thursday in which he called for broad cooperation throughout the region to corral North Korea's nuclear weapons program, to the likely focus on Islamic-based terrorism this afternoon in Indonesia. Security concerns in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, were limiting his visit to barely six hours.

At the conclusion of the Hanoi meeting, President Nguyen Minh Triet of Vietnam read a statement saying that North Korea's test of a nuclear device on Oct. 9, and its missile launches three months earlier, posed "a nuclear threat" to peace and security and to the summit nations' goal of a nuclear-free Korean peninsula. He called for full implementation of U.N. Security Council resolutions, which include the threat of sanctions to pressure North Korea to renounce its nuclear weapons program.

The statement came a day after South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun told Bush that his government could not commit to boarding North Korean ships suspected of carrying nuclear-related cargo.

White House officials Sunday cited the statement as a sign that the United States and its allies remained on the same track regarding North Korea. And David McCormick, a deputy White House national security advisor, said the failure to present the declaration as a formal, written document was not a setback.

In a separate discussion, McCormick said, Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao had agreed "on the path ahead" in dealing with North Korea. McCormick and White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush and Hu had not set specific conditions to present to Pyongyang.

The Korean situation also formed a backdrop to a meeting between Bush and President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia.

China, Russia, Japan, the United States and South Korea, all members of the economic group, have been conducting on-again, off-again talks with North Korea over nuclear weapons. The North has only recently agreed to resume the six-party discussions intended to persuade it to end its weapons efforts, including such steps as the shutting down a five-megawatt nuclear reactor.

"The North Koreans have to demonstrate seriousness," Snow said to reporters aboard Air Force One as Bush flew south to Ho Chi Minh City. Bush has said that among the measures the United States would offer to entice North Korea to cooperate would be a formal declaration that the Korean War, fought more than 50 years ago between the North and South, was at an end. Such a statement has never been made in the past. The summit also produced what U.S. officials presented as a strong commitment to renewed global trade talks, which have broken down despite pledges to liberalize international trade practices through reduced tariffs and subsidies and greater market access.

Reflecting the political pressure that makes trade pacts increasingly difficult to achieve, the summit called for consideration of an already expressed goal of a free-trade zone encompassing the nations of the Pacific Rim in the Americas and Asia.

As expected, U.S. and Russian representatives signed an arduously negotiated trade agreement that is a key step in Russia's joining the World Trade Organization.

DOJ_NMG_0096110

The president plans to use his morning schedule today in this vibrant city, still remembered as Saigon — its name until the communists emerged victorious from the Vietnam War in 1975 — to draw attention to the Vietnamese government's program to modernize the economy through market reforms. The national economy grew 8.4% last year.

His planned stops included a visit to a capitalist institution with a decidedly communist name: The Ho Chi Minh City Securities Trading Center — the stock exchange, albeit a state-controlled agency, named after the revolutionary leader.

But while Bush's focus was on economic shifts, Vietnam's record on political and religious rights came into question.

Philosophy professor and political activist Nguyen Chinh Ket said in a conference call with reporters that police agencies prohibited him and several other dissidents from conducting a news conference at the Sheraton Hotel in the glitzy, but small, heart of Ho Chi Minh City. Ket said he was not allowed to leave his home, and another activist was detained by police. Police also interfered with plans of a Buddhist group to conduct a protest Sunday calling for greater freedom of religion in Vietnam, according to the activist.

Bush was to fly out of Ho Chi Minh City from Tan Son Nhat Airport, which was the main air operations center for the U.S. military during the Vietnam War.

Early Sunday morning in Hanoi, the president and Laura Bush attended an interdenominational worship service at the Cua Bac Cathedral that combined elements of the Roman Catholic liturgy and an evangelical service. It was conducted in Vietnamese and largely in song.

"A whole society is a society which welcomes basic freedoms, and there's no more basic freedom ... than the freedom to worship as you see fit," the president said, using his visit to the cathedral to signal continuing pressure on the communist government to allow unrestricted practice of religious beliefs.

His attendance, he said, was "our way of ... urging societies to feel comfortable with, and confident in saying to their people, if you feel like praising God you're allowed to do so in any way you see fit."

The church seats approximately 500 people in wooden pews; it was not full on Sunday.

Leaders Achieve Little On NKorea At Asia Pacific Summit: Analysts (AFP)

By Peter Harmsen

AFP, November 20, 2006

Closed-doors diplomacy at a regional summit in Vietnam came nowhere nearer to resolving the crisis over North Korea's nuclear dream, analysts say -- and may even have made matters worse.

The Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum meeting in Hanoi voiced its "strong concern" over Pyongyang's shock October 9 nuclear test -- unlikely to please the North's easily offended leader Kim Jong-Il, they argued.

Leaders endorsed UN sanctions and called for an early restart to six-party talks on dismantling the North's weapons drive.

"This is most likely to stiffen Kim Jong-Il's resolve," said Ken Quinones, a professor of Korean Studies at Japan's Akita International University.

"He wishes to avoid any appearance of bowing to international pressure."

A succession of nations attending in Hanoi condemned the North's test, with even old ally China agreeing Pyongyang "should get the message" that the world community would not let it possess nuclear weapons.

But amid the tough talk, the meetings in the Vietnamese capital made little headway beyond a call for "concrete and effective steps" to implement a 2005 deal that would have North Korea renounce nuclear weapons in return for aid.

"Nothing that was achieved at APEC with regards to North Korea could not have been achieved by officials working on the phone," said Paul Harris, an expert on US foreign policy at Hong Kong's Lingnan University.

Expectations had been inflated by the fact APEC brought together leaders from five of the parties in on-off six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program -- the United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia.

They managed to meet in a criss-cross pattern of bilateral and trilateral forums, but never sat down together.

It partly reflected fears that North Korea -- the sixth party -- might feel the rest were ganging up on it and extend a boycott that has left the process in limbo for more than a year.

It also reflected frustration at US international diplomacy, according to observers.

DOJ_NMG_0096111

"The assumption was that the Americans would enter the room and try to get everyone to come around to their position. That's not a negotiation," Harris said.

With five nations present but communicating imperfectly, and one absent and communicating hardly at all, there was no easy answer to when a next round of six-nation talks would take place.

Instead, officials came out of meetings with slightly altered versions of the same basic message: Talks should resume as soon as possible, meaning early December, if everyone agreed.

That would seem to rule out November, which had otherwise been raised as a possibility a fortnight before when North Korea agreed to return to the table, possibly forced to do so by UN sanctions triggered by its test.

US officials said Christopher Hill, the chief US delegate to the six-party talks, was to go to Beijing to meet his Chinese counterpart Wu Dawei early this week.

Another much-repeated appeal was for the next round to produce "substantive results".

No one actually described in more specific terms what was meant by this -- probably for good reason, according to observers.

"All of the parties would rather wait and see, so they can define success as whatever happens in the future," said Harris.

Some analysts saw the general absence here of results on North Korea as a failure of US leadership, following the Republican Party's defeat in mid-term elections earlier this month.

"Bush came to Hanoi a lame, walking, quacking duck. The Asian leaders have begun the process of distancing themselves from him," Jeff Kingston, director of Asian studies at Temple University's Tokyo campus, told AFP.

"The brief unity that we saw right in the wake of the nuclear test has unravelled a bit," he said.

As unity seemed ever more elusive, the fate of the six-nation talks may be hanging in the balance, caught in a complex game of bluster and make-believe that was only getting more complicated as time passed, observers said.

"Just like Bush does not wish to reveal that the US election outcome has softened him, Pyongyang likewise wishes to avoid any appearance that UN sanctions has softened it," said Quinones.

"The impasse appears to endure."

APEC Leaders Speak Out On N. Korea Nukes (AP)

By Paul Alexander

AP, November 20, 2006

They would not put it in writing, but the Pacific Rim's often-divergent leaders joined together Sunday to say they worry about North Korea's nuclear weapons program and to urge the reclusive country to resume disarmament negotiations.

The verbal statement capped five days of diplomatic discussions in the aftermath of the North's first nuclear test on Oct. 9, which raised concerns about proliferation in the region. But the method of delivery provided a curious culmination to the issue that overshadowed the economic topics that are the core of the 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum's mission.

Even some of the participants were unsure why the statement was not issued in written form, just orally at the end of the two-day leaders' summit and by Vietnam's president at a news conference after reporters asked him about it.

"We are seeking an explanation for that," Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said. "We don't understand why it wasn't included since it was a joint statement and it was unanimous."

David McCormick, an official with the U.S. National Security Council, denied that getting only an oral statement from the summit represented a setback, and said the White House was pleased with the toughness of the wording.

"The statement was very firm in the need for full implementation" of U.N. resolutions on North Korea, McCormick said. "What was important was that the members of APEC came together on a common statement."

The statement urged North Korea to take concrete steps to live up to earlier commitments to stop developing atomic bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0096112

"We express our strong concern over the July 4-5 missile launches and Oct. 9 nuclear test conducted by (North Korea), which poses a clear threat to our shared interest of peace and security and our shared goal of achieving a nuclear weapons-free Korean peninsula," it said.

Meanwhile, North Korea's Minju Joson newspaper on Sunday accused South Korea of building up arms in order to attack the country.

"The South Korean military is openly clamoring that the development and introduction of new weapons are to target the North," the paper said, according to the country's official Korean Central News Agency. "Confrontation with fellow countrymen is a suicidal act of digging their own graves. War knows no mercy."

Pyongyang accused South Korea of conspiring with the United States to attack the isolated and impoverished state, an accusation made frequently by the North and routinely denied by the U.S.

It appeared that some APEC members, worried about how security and political issues have increasingly impinged on the group's economic focus, felt that the U.N. and other forums are more appropriate for a written statement.

And while North Korea is not an APEC member, some countries are sensitive to the issue of interfering in other nations' affairs.

APEC provided a chance for the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea to try to work out a unified strategy as they prepare to resume nuclear negotiations with the North a year after it walked out. The talks could resume as early as next month.

President Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao met Sunday and agreed that "North Korea should get the message that possessing a nuclear bomb will not have the support of the international community, but rather will meet opposition," said Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao.

While virtually everyone agrees that North Korea's nuclear weapon and missile tests could lead down a dangerous path to further proliferation, differences remain on the best strategy for dealing with the North, which has used brinksmanship to gain aid and security guarantees.

"I don't think North Korea would want to give up something they regard as something precious to them, something that gives them a certain pride and position," Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi said.

"These are realities that we cannot deny, but if we can give them hope of something else they can get ... maybe it could pave a way to come up with a solution, but it's going to be very difficult."

It appeared that the U.S. did manage to get one North Korea-related addition in the summit's final written declaration which appeared to endorse the financial sanctions that Washington imposed on the North over alleged currency counterfeiting and money laundering. The sanctions sparked North Korea's boycott of the six-party talks.

U.S. Stance On North Korea Hits Hurdles At Summit (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam -- The Bush administration's efforts to raise international pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear program hit a series of roadblocks at a weekend Asian summit.

President Bush came to Vietnam for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi hoping to bolster the coalition of neighboring nations arrayed against North Korea, which sparked global fears after successfully testing a nuclear warhead. The U.S., Russia, China, Japan and South Korea are set to resume negotiations with North Korea in coming weeks, and the White House wants to maintain a united front there.

During his private meetings, Mr. Bush repeated that the U.S. is committed to finding a diplomatic solution to the stand-off and was prepared to give Pyongyang significant political and economic concessions if it dismantled its nuclear program. The other nations, however, made clear that they were unwilling to fully embrace the U.S. strategy, and several suggested they preferred to take a more conciliatory approach.

The U.S. was unable to persuade the other 20 APEC member states to issue a written statement about North Korea's nuclear program. The Bush administration settled for Vietnamese President Nguyen Minh Triet taking the unusual step of delivering a statement to reporters in Hanoi expressing concern about North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0096113

On Saturday, South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun told Mr. Bush that his country wouldn't be "taking part in the full scope" of a U.S.-led plan to interdict North Korean nuclear shipments, the latest sign of the ongoing dispute between Washington and Seoul over how hard a line to take with North Korea.

U.S. officials said they were satisfied with their diplomatic achievements on Mr. Bush's Asian swing, which continues today with a half-day visit to Indonesia. Administration officials noted Mr. Triet's statement was toughly worded and represented the unanimous view of the APEC countries.

White House officials said Mr. Bush used at least one of his private meetings with other leaders to detail the incentives the U.S. was prepared to give North Korea if it gave up its nuclear program. Administration spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Bush told Mr. Hu that the U.S. would be willing to declare an official end to the 56-year-old Korean War, which is technically in a ceasefire, and provide economic aid to communist North Korea. Mr. Snow and other officials have said that the U.S. would be amenable to holding an armistice signing ceremony.

Declaring the conflict at an end could allow Pyongyang to trim its massive military spending and use the money for economic development, officials said. Pyongyang has long sought a peace treaty that formally ends the conflict. Analysts say the North's leader, Kim Jong Il, may be attracted to sharing a stage with leaders from the U.S. and other countries that treat him as an outcast.

The diplomatic efforts follow North Korea's Oct. 9 test of a nuclear device, which provoked widespread condemnation and led the United Nations Security Council to impose new sanctions on the country. Three weeks ago, North Korea said it would return to six-party talks with the U.S. and other countries, which are expected to resume next month in Beijing.

Pacific Rim Statement On N. Korea Falls Short Of What Bush Sought (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam, Nov. 19 -- President Bush arrived in this bustling financial center Sunday after achieving mixed results in his effort to persuade Pacific Rim countries to press North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons.

The two-day Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Hanoi concluded with its members agreeing to an oral statement urging North Korea to follow through on pledges to dismantle its nuclear weapons program.

Bush pressed the leaders at the summit, including Chinese President Hu Jintao in meetings Sunday, to implement a coordinated effort on North Korea. Bush has restated his willingness to offer North Korea incentives, including security guarantees and economic help, if it agrees to disarm, but has promised further isolation if the country refuses.

Bush had hoped for a formal, written declaration from APEC members on the issue but was forced to settle for the statement read aloud by Vietnamese President Nguyen Minh Triet at the summit's closing session.

The statement expressed "strong concern" about North Korea's first nuclear test, which took place in October, and missile launches in July, and called on the country to take "concrete and effective" steps toward abandoning its nuclear weapons as called for in a U.N. resolution.

David McCormick, a deputy national security adviser, called the statement a step forward and said it reflected a "common view on the importance of successful implementation of the resolution."

Weeks after the nuclear test, North Korea agreed to resume negotiations with the United States, Russia, China, Japan and South Korea on ending its program. No date has been set to restart the so-called six-party talks, but Bush administration officials say they want to be certain that North Korea will not use a continuation of the talks to ward off international pressure while it continues to develop weapons.

Bush also met with Russian President Vladimir Putin after the signing of an agreement between the two countries supporting Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization.

"This is a good agreement for the United States," Bush said. "And it's an equally important agreement for Russia."

Bush and Putin discussed the North Korean nuclear question and a proposal for U.N. sanctions against Iran for its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0096114

Though the North Korea issue dominated Bush's agenda at the summit, APEC leaders agreed to explore several trade issues, including the possibility of establishing a free-trade zone that would span the Pacific Rim. The leaders also endorsed a plan aimed at preventing the spread of avian flu and AIDS.

APEC, which brings together the leaders of its 21 member nations, also serves as a meeting place for hundreds of leading business executives from around the globe who travel to its annual conferences in search of new opportunities and markets.

The event has served as an opportunity for Vietnam, a one-party Communist state, to showcase its dramatic economic growth and vast economic potential since embracing private enterprise over the past two decades.

During his brief visit to Ho Chi Minh City, Bush was scheduled to attend a meeting of business leaders and visit the stock market.

Three decades after this city, formerly known as Saigon, fell to Communist forces, ending the Vietnam War, its business center is bursting with activity. Gleaming hotels, chic coffee bars and neon-lit karaoke joints increasingly attract an international clientele to the high-paced hub of commerce.

Bush was set to travel next to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation. He is scheduled to meet with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono and attend a dinner, but not spend the night. Word of Bush's visit has sparked large protests in Indonesia, as well as threats against Bush from Islamic radicals.

After leaving Indonesia, Bush will fly to Honolulu, where he plans to have breakfast with U.S. troops and meet with military commanders before returning to Washington.

Trade Trumps Politics As U.S. Explores Vietnamese Markets (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — America's consumer culture is well on its way to doing what the U.S. military could not: win in Vietnam.

From the alleys of Hanoi to the boulevards of Ho Chi Minh City, the ancient arts of silk- and ceramic-making are joined by multinational products from Levi's jeans to KFC chicken to Nike sneakers.

ConocoPhillips has more than $1 billion in oil projects and Ford has a $100 million assembly plant in Vietnam, according to the U.S. Embassy here. Silicon-chip-maker Intel plans to build a $1 billion test-and-manufacturing plant here. Vietnam has a 1,000-plus-member American Chamber of Commerce.

Vietnamese consumers care most about making a living and providing for their families, says Vo Thi Bich Lan, a youth development coordinator in Ho Chi Minh City. “We don't care about the politics.”

Global trade issues dominated the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum President Bush attended this weekend in Hanoi. He sought to expand the U.S. business presence in Vietnam and other parts of Asia.

Bush met with leaders from Vietnam, China, Russia, Japan, Australia and South Korea, urging an expansion of free trade.

However, Bush headed to Vietnam without congressional approval to widen Vietnam trade more quickly.

Today, Bush plans to underscore U.S. commercial ties by visiting Vietnam's stock market before he heads to Indonesia, where crowds Sunday protested Bush's visit.

Normalizing trade relations would ramp up growing investment in Vietnam, three decades after helicopters plucked Americans from Saigon roofs as the communist army closed in.

It's still the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, but “the Vietnamese people are just inherently entrepreneurial,” says Chuck Searcy, an American who lives in Hanoi. Searcy, a Georgia native who raises money to find and disarm unexploded ordnance dropped during the Vietnam War, says locals have a saying about trade: “Three women and a duck make a market.”

Economic expansion helps political freedom, Bush said last week, adding that “by opening up to trade, countries build wealth and empower their citizens.”

Democratic change depends on more than increased economic opportunities, says Diem Do, chairman of the opposition Vietnam Reform Party. The Vietnamese people and international community must also push for change, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0096115

Vietnam is still no capitalist paradise, according to a U.S. Embassy report. U.S. companies that want to invest there complain of corruption, the lack of intellectual property rights and too much government bureaucracy, the report said.

U.S. companies are among the top three investors in Vietnam, despite the problems, said Virginia Foote, president of the U.S.-Vietnam Trade Council.

American attempts to reach potential customers can be seen on the narrow streets of Hanoi's Old Quarter, where the streets are named after silk, paper and silversmith guilds that have practiced for six centuries. Battalions of honking motorbikes roar past tube-shaped buildings apt to sell Pampers, Batman dolls or Levi's.

Business seems to be thriving in Ho Chi Minh City. Aggressive young peddlers follow visitors for blocks, selling bike tours, shoe shines or postcards with the same pitch: "Why don't you buy from me? Real cheap. One dollar!"

Though Vietnam has no McDonald's, not far from the former U.S. Embassy compound in Ho Chi Minh City sits Ga Ran Kentucky, a fried-chicken restaurant complete with the smiling, white-goateed visage of Col. Harland Sanders.

In Ben Thanh Market, Kouo Kiev My sells souvenirs, ceramic Buddhas and wooden elephants, and makes $100 a month.

She says the experience should help her move up in the world as she tries to learn English and how to run a business.

"I can meet the customers," she says. "And I like the money."

Bush Visits Now Bustling Symbol Of U.S. Defeat (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam, Monday, Nov. 20 — President Bush ventured into this booming, wildly capitalist commercial center of an ostensibly Communist Vietnam on Monday morning, speeding off to the stock exchange to talk with local business leaders before preparing for a quick visit to Indonesia.

His visit here, where he was also to tour the government-run Pasteur Institute to highlight work on avian flu and AIDS prevention and treatment, concludes three days in the country that have been dominated by his efforts to hold together reluctant partners — notably China, South Korea and Russia — to step up pressure to dismantle the nuclear programs of Iran and North Korea.

In both cases, he found progress agonizingly slow, though there was more evidence of unity in dealing with North Korea.

On Sunday, Mr. Bush formally signed an agreement that paves the way for Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, a step that China took years ago and that Russia has long struggled to match.

As he has throughout his trip, Mr. Bush has avoided dwelling on America's past with Vietnam, though it is difficult in a city like this one, filled with so much potent symbolism of American defeat.

For many Americans, the imagery of this teeming, chaotic place is fixed in 1975, when the last Americans were evacuated by helicopter. Mr. Bush sped past the evacuation spot on his arrival here, but made no stops that would invite comparisons to the current debate over whether the United States should stay or retreat from Iraq.

He steered clear of the other sites that so dominated American politics in his youth, and spent the night at one of the gleaming new hotels that dot the skyline, rather than one of the old haunts, like the Continental, the Rex and the Caravelle, where official Washington once struggled to manage a losing effort.

Instead, he made an unannounced stop for dinner with Prime Minister John Howard of Australia at a trendy restaurant in a neighborhood that symbolizes the new Saigon — the name local people insist on using for a city that was renamed immediately after the Communist victory.

After dinner, Mr. Bush mounted the running board of his waiting limousine and waved to a crowd of curious, mostly younger Vietnamese who jammed the streets as news of his arrival spread. There were muted cheers.

In a trip that has focused relentlessly on the future, Mr. Bush urged China's leader, Hu Jintao, to create "a nation of consumers and not savers, which will inure to the benefit of our manufacturers, both large and small, and our farmers, as well." It was an echo of what Mr. Bush's father used to urge in his visits to Japan, in hopes of closing the trade gap.

DOJ_NMG_0096116

At the meetings of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Hanoi over the weekend, Mr. Bush talked about exploring new free trade arrangements for Asia — a long-sought but still distant goal — and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice used the case of Vietnam as an instructive example of economic reform.

In a speech in Hanoi, she said that "20 years ago the leaders of Vietnam took a hard look at their isolated economy, and they made a strategic choice to begin reforms." In fact, they have turned to serious reforms only in recent years.

Mr. Bush's spokesmen said that he and the leaders of Japan and China saw "eye to eye" on steps needed to press North Korea.

But the spokesmen did not use those words to describe talks with the South Koreans, who have been particularly reluctant to fully join efforts to intercept suspected illicit shipments of arms, or to cut off economic links after the North's nuclear test.

Christopher R. Hill, the chief American negotiator with North Korea, is to fly to Beijing this week to try to work out a mix of incentives for the North and to persuade the Chinese to push for a symbolically important dismantling of part of North Korea's weapons complex. That last step is one the North Koreans have not yet indicated they are ready to take before negotiations resume.

Russia has continued to balk about imposing major sanctions against Iran, which has continued to defy a United Nations Security Council call for full suspension of its enrichment of uranium.

Rather than dwell on those differences in public, Russian and American officials celebrated an agreement to allow Russia to enter the W.T.O. after 10 years of stop-and-go negotiations, and talks that began shortly after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

"We support Russia's accession into the W.T.O.," President Bush announced in Hanoi after a meeting with President Vladimir V. Putin on the outskirts of the Asia-Pacific meeting.

American officials said the agreement with Russia was reached in principle more than a week ago, after the two countries gradually worked out nagging disputes on issues like agriculture inspections, chicken exports to Russia and intellectual property protection.

Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative, said the pact should bring a significant increase to global trade.

Her Russian counterpart, Economy Minister German Gref, was equally effusive at the signing ceremony on Sunday. "Undoubtedly, this agreement is a very substantial milestone in the full integration of Russia into the global economy," he said.

Mr. Putin has repeatedly said that joining the W.T.O. is a major foreign policy goal, although Russia's oil-driven economy will get few direct gains from membership in the organization, which sets the ground rules for globalization. But joining would give Russia a voice in world trade talks, with the potential to help set future trade policy.

The agreement with the United States means that Russia has passed the last major barrier to its entry into the 149-member world trade entity.

But Russia still must win approval from Moldova and Georgia, countries with grievances over a Russian ban on importing wine. Those countries could further delay a final deal on W.T.O. membership, although trade officials have said they expect that Russia will manage to find a way to resolve the issue.

Forum Vows To Revive Trade Talks (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

HANOI, Vietnam -- The U.S. and other Pacific Rim countries said they were prepared to cut farm subsidies and tariffs to revive stalled world trade talks, putting pressure on other economic powers such as the European Union, Brazil and India to follow suit.

Leaders at the summit of the 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum also said they would consider a free-trade area of their own if the global talks fail.

The initiative may not break the deadlock over politically sensitive farm subsidies that stalled the so-called Doha Round of talks, which began in 2001 under the auspices of the World Trade Organization. Some trade officials attending the summit say global trade talks could remain on hold despite the offer.

DOJ_NMG_0096117

Without detailing specific measures, the Pacific Rim countries said they would be ready to cut subsidies, but added that "other [countries] must also signal their readiness and resolve" to do the same.

The EU's trade chief said APEC's offer could lead to a fresh round of Doha discussions next year. "If all negotiating partners live up to the terms of that statement, then we have a greater hope of a resumption of negotiations," EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson told reporters in New Delhi.

In a closing statement of the APEC summit, the leaders warned that failing to secure a WTO trade deal could have "grave" economic consequences. In case global talks don't resume, APEC leaders agreed to study a possible backup plan: a free-trade area covering the Pacific Rim's largest economies and including countries that now account for about half the world's trade. APEC members include the U.S., Japan, South Korea, China, Russia, Australia, the 10 members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and several Latin American states.

Several leaders at the summit said the resumption of the WTO talks was the ideal way to push the free trade agenda, but they added they were willing to consider alternative options, such as a Pacific Rim free trade agreement, if necessary. "The key game has to be the WTO," said New Zealand Prime Minister Helen Clark. "But if Doha stumbles so badly that it went into suspension for years, then of course a [free trade] agreement which covers...60% of the world economy is very attractive for us."

The idea of an APEC free-trade area was introduced in 2004. It was quickly dropped, largely because hopes were still high the WTO negotiations could provide a more direct route to freer trade.

The U.S. revived the idea this year, in part, trade analysts say, to create momentum to nudge talks at the WTO back on track. President Bush pushed the plan during his meetings with several regional leaders, said the U.S. deputy national security adviser for foreign affairs, David McCormick.

The U.S. is also wary that China is pushing for its own free-trade pact with the dynamic economies of Southeast Asia, including Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

At the same time, Washington's own bilateral free-trade discussions with Malaysia, South Korea and Thailand have become bogged down.

The authority for American trade negotiators to seal deals without line-by-line scrutiny in Congress is also set to expire in the middle of next year. After the Democratic Party won control of Congress in the midterm elections this month, it is uncertain whether that authority -- which has already produced free-trade deals with Australia and Singapore -- will be extended.

Russia Signs Key Trade Deal With U.S. (AP-Y)

By Alex Nicholson

AP, November 20, 2006

Russia and the United States signed a key trade agreement Sunday, removing the last major obstacle in Moscow's 13-year journey to join the World Trade Organization.

The deal, inked on the sidelines of a gathering of Pacific Rim economies, is a powerful vote of confidence in Russia — the largest economy still outside the 149-member WTO — and signals its integration into the global trading system.

It also marks a bright spot in the two countries' relations that have been marred by disagreements over Iran's controversial nuclear program and Washington's fears of a roll back of democratic freedoms under Russian President Vladimir Putin.

"I am very pleased to be here today to have the opportunity to celebrate this very important milestone as Russia moves one important step closer to becoming a member of the WTO," said U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab.

"Russia belongs as a full-fledged member of the WTO," she said. "We look forward to continuing these efforts to improve the economic and commercial ties between our two nations."

Russia's Trade and Economic Development Minister German Gref called the deal a "historic step — the last step — that signifies the return of Russia to the market principles of the world economy."

As part of the deal, Gref said that Russia had pledged to cut import tariffs on a range of goods — including aircraft, computer technology, agriculture and machinery.

Speaking after the signing ceremony Gref defended those concessions. "I think we found the necessary balance. On all positions that were sensitive for us we found a compromise."

DOJ_NMG_0096118

The two countries also managed to overcome the high-profile question of Russia's shaky record on protecting intellectual property rights. Pirated films, music and software in Russia cost U.S. companies nearly $1.8 billion in 2005.

Schwab said that while talks with Russia on the piracy question would continue at the stage of multilateral negotiations, she expressed satisfaction with Russia's progress: "We believe that the bilateral agreement is very good."

Before it can join the WTO, Russia must consolidate the bilateral agreements it has forged with 57 countries. Gref said he expected that process to be completed by the middle of next year.

After that, the WTO needs to vote to approve its membership. But some questions remain.

Georgia and Moldova have threatened to block Russia's bid because Moscow has blocked key exports from those nations.

"Without Georgia's consent, Russia will not join this organization. And Georgia has not given its consent so far," Deputy Economic Development Minister Vakhtang Lezhava said on Georgian television.

Gref warned Georgia against "influencing trade issues through political means."

"Hopefully in the near future we will come to an agreement with Georgia," he was quoted as saying by the ITAR-Tass news agency.

Membership in the WTO would mean Russia, a big oil and gas exporter, would receive the same favorable tariff rates for its products as other members. Also, Russia and other member countries would have to follow WTO rules in trade disputes.

Freer trade would give Russian companies more opportunities to sell their goods on world markets. Joining the WTO also might make its sizable market of potential customers even more attractive to companies in the U.S. and elsewhere.

"This creates a favorable background for all our activities, including solving complicated international problems," Putin said after holding a bilateral meeting with President Bush after the conclusion of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit.

The deal was widely anticipated. On Nov. 10, both sides announced that all the main questions had been settled and all that remained was for a few technical questions to be nailed down.

Before the U.S. can trade with Russia under a WTO agreement, Washington must establish normal trade relations with Moscow.

For that, Congress would still have to pass legislation removing Russia from the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which ties Russia's trade status to whether the country is allowing Jews to freely leave the country.

Though the amendment is widely considered an anachronism, the newly elected Congress, which convenes in January, will be controlled by Democrats, who are less receptive to free-trade agreements than Republicans.

About four months ago, U.S. and Russia had appeared on the verge of an agreement. But in a major embarrassment for Moscow, it failed to materialize — right before the summit of leaders of the world's wealthiest countries that Putin was hosting in St. Petersburg.

Observers have suggested that the deal with the U.S. may have been used as a political incentive to encourage Moscow to back a U.S. proposed sanctions package, punishing Iran for its controversial nuclear program.

Beijing, Seoul To Talk Trade (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

BEIJING -- China and South Korea will start talks next year on the feasibility of a free-trade agreement, China's official Xinhua news agency reported.

Xinhua said an agreement on the talks was reached at a meeting late Friday between Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai and South Korean Trade Minister Kim Hyun Chong.

The negotiations will be held at government and industry levels.

The exploratory talks "will look into the effect of the FTA on the macroeconomies of both countries, the effect of trade liberalization on industries, [and] the arrangements for sensitive products and industries," Xinhua said.

China replaced the U.S. as South Korea's largest trading partner in 2004, while South Korea is China's sixth-largest trading partner and its fourth-largest source of overseas investment, Xinhua said.

South Korea is also working on a free-trade agreement with the U.S. The two nations held a fourth round of talks last month but won't wrap up negotiations on an agreement this year as originally planned.

Weakened Bush Must Wage Fight For Free Trade (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Having failed to convince fellow Republicans of the merits of comprehensive immigration reform, President Bush now faces the even more difficult task of defending free trade against protectionist Democrats.

A tide of populism, protectionism, nationalism and xenophobia is washing over the country, fueled by right-wing radio talk show hosts, CNN firebrand Lou Dobbs — and legitimate concerns that U.S. workers are falling behind in the global struggle for jobs and good wages.

Anti-globalization is a worldwide phenomenon, in fact, that's being exploited by populist demagogues such as Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, whose influence is spreading in Latin America.

Even though his influence is at its all-time lowest ebb, Bush somehow needs to mount a campaign to convince Americans that their continued prosperity depends on an open world trading system.

Election exit polls confirmed that the country generally supports Bush on immigration — 57 percent of voters said illegal workers should have a chance to stay in the country — but other polls indicate Americans are fearful about trade.

A Gallup Poll in April showed that by a margin of 65 percent to 30 percent, Americans believe workers are "mostly hurt by increased trade between the United States and other countries."

Last July, the House passed the Central American Free Trade Agreement by a mere two votes, with only 15 Democrats in support. That history bodes ill for Bush's upcoming trade agenda, including renewal of "fast-track" negotiating authority and the already-negotiated agreements with Peru and Colombia.

The House last week even declined to pass an agreement with Vietnam that totally benefited the U.S. by opening Vietnam's markets to U.S. goods, in the process embarrassing Bush as he was headed to the Asian economic summit in Hanoi.

The rejection stemmed partly from other reasons, such as antipathy toward the high-handedness of outgoing House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), and the bill is slated to pass eventually. But it was still a symbolic post-election bash to the idea of free trade.

By one estimate, 27 victorious Democratic House candidates campaigned at least partly against free trade. Ohio's winning Senate candidate, Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), is one of Congress' most vociferous opponents of trade agreements, including those promoted by the administration of former President Bill Clinton.

What's more, with the ascendancy of China critic Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to Speaker, U.S. relations with that trading giant likely will come under pressure. Congress may well pass an across-the-board 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports as punishment for China's manipulation of its currency.

Bush almost certainly would veto the measure, which is sponsored by Sens. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), but the exercise will put the administration on defense.

Moreover, a Democratic Congress is likely to increase farm subsidies, making it all the more difficult to win the market-opening concessions from Europe that are needed to revive the stagnant Doha round of world trade negotiations.

The administration needs to mount a four-part strategy: a vigorous public education process to change attitudes on the merits of trade, an aggressive effort to fight trade cheating by China and other rivals, a serious upgrade of programs to help workers cope with the effects of trade, and a change of policy on including labor and environmental standards in future trade agreements.

Bush, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and others have delivered their share of speeches on trade, but Bush needs to devote a substantial portion of his State of the Union address to the subject and motivate pro-trade forces in the country to educate the public.

The fact is, exports of goods and services accounted for 10.4 percent of U.S. gross domestic product in 2005 and 20 percent of GDP growth for the year.

Manufacturing exports have increased 82 percent over the past decade, and they provide more than 5.2 million jobs, one-sixth of all the manufacturing jobs in the country. One-third of all agricultural acreage in the U.S. is planted for export.

DOJ_NMG_0096120

Moreover, imports help control prices in the U.S. — a benefit that makes Wal-Mart a boon to the middle class, not a blight — and U.S. investments in the U.S. ("insourcing") are responsible for 6.4 million jobs.

If U.S. markets are closed to foreign products, other countries will close their markets to U.S. exports, costing jobs and economic growth both here and all over the world. Developing countries, especially, will be doomed to poverty — and discord — if they cannot sell their products in the developed world.

Bush administration officials insist they are doing all they can to combat unfair trade practices by China and other countries, but they will have to be more public — and, if needed, confrontational — as part of an effort to win public support for free trade.

As even Paulson acknowledged in his first public speech in August, "Many Americans aren't feeling the benefits" of the expanding U.S. economy. Productivity gains are benefiting upper-income and well-educated Americans, but not average workers.

Wage growth was stagnant for the first five years of the Bush administration. Real wage growth for the past year was 2.8 percent, but it has come late in the recovery, amid signs that the economy already is softening.

Administration officials say the productivity-wage lag for less-educated workers is a 25-year phenomenon and that the answer is improving worker skills. If that is the administration's only answer, it needs to be more aggressive in promoting it.

At the same time, it ought to work with Democrats to find other solutions, such as Brookings Institution scholar William Galston's idea for a wage-insurance program, akin to the unemployment insurance system, which would protect workers against income losses.

In the new Congress, incoming House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) says he foresees cooperating with the administration on trade, but Democrats will demand more attention to trading partners' labor and environmental standards.

Administration officials say other nations aren't willing to have the U.S. dictate their wage rates or emissions levels — as the AFL-CIO seems to demand — but the U.S. will have to win some new concessions or risk having trade pacts rejected by Congress.

Expansions in free trade have caused the U.S. and the world to advance economically and politically since the end of World War II, but those gains are in danger of coming to a crashing halt unless there's a counter to ascendant protectionism.

Breaking The Trade Deadlock (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The trick in the new era of divided government is to find deadlock-breakers: issues that advance the agendas of both sides as well as the interests of the country.

In domestic economic policy, the best deadlock-breaker is tax reform. The existing tax deductions for health care, home mortgages and savings are outrageously skewed in favor of the rich, so Democrats should want to restrict them. Restrictions would save the Treasury billions, advancing the Republican goal of keeping marginal tax rates as low as possible.

In international economic policy, the right deadlock-breaker is less obvious. The two parties have opposing attitudes on the subject of trade: Republicans see it as a source of growth, Democrats as a source of inequality. This split is undermining the U.S. ability to play its traditional postwar role in driving global trade liberalization. And if anti-trade Democrats can win elections when unemployment stands at 4.4 percent, they may do even better next time.

To an extent that neither party acknowledges, the popular formula for bridging this divide is bankrupt. Ever since the passage of the North American Free Trade Agreement in 1993, this formula has consisted of jamming labor and environmental protection into trade pacts. But the real reason Democrats oppose trade has little to do with foreigners' stance on union rights or endangered species and a lot to do with the fact that trade harms some U.S. workers. Mexico could abide by every convention of the International Labor Organization and still undercut U.S. wages -- and Democrats who represent displaced American workers would still detest NAFTA.

So labor and environmental clauses will never reconcile Democrats to trade. To forge a bipartisan consensus, we need a different approach. Here is a three-part formula.

First, Democrats need to be honest about development in the poor world. It's wrong to pretend that labor regulations, whether inserted in trade agreements or adopted by governments, are a powerful engine of rising living standards in developing countries: Weak governments have no means of enforcing them. Some of the greatest anti-poverty success stories -- South Korea in the 1970s, Indonesia in the 1980s, China over the past 15 years -- took place in authoritarian countries where labor regulations were puny.

The real key to raising living standards is economic growth. And growth, in turn, is highly correlated with trade openness. One World Bank study showed that poor countries whose trade grew as a share of the economy recorded gains in income of 5 percent per year in the 1990s; by contrast, poor countries whose trade did not expand had no income gains whatever. So Democrats need to accept that holding up trade agreements to insert labor protections is going to harm workers, not help them.

Instead, Democrats should be frank about their real reason for ambivalence on trade, which is that some Americans suffer from it. This gets to the second part of the formula: Republicans need to get serious about the fact that, since 1980 or so, real incomes for the majority of Americans have stagnated. Republicans cannot expect support for trade unless they do more to compensate workers who get hit by globalization. They should be working with Democrats to improve the social safety net, linking progress on that front to continued trade liberalization.

Finally, both parties should cooperate on overhauling the nation's farm program, which comes up for renewal next year. The existing subsidy regime lavishes more than $20 billion a year on farmers, almost twice what gets spent on subsidizing college for poor children. About 70 percent of the money goes to the richest 10 percent of farmers, so the rhetoric about supporting struggling family farms is hogwash. This is corporate welfare for agribusiness, and neither party should defend it.

But a burst of farm reform would not just be good in itself. It would unlock trade liberalization. The Doha round of global trade talks, which promises benefits far greater than the bilateral and regional deals now pending in Congress, has bogged down over agriculture: The Bush administration proposed some cuts in subsidies, but not enough to shame the Europeans into offering serious tariff reductions, and so the whole deal faltered. If the new era of divided government produced a bipartisan push for farm reform, Doha could be resuscitated.

Of course, it's a long shot. But the Bush administration now has a pragmatic deal maker at Treasury who is passionate about trade, and the Democratic leadership in Congress has no particular love for farm subsidies. Meanwhile, anti-poverty groups are planning a lobbying drive on farm reform. Bread for the World, a faith-based alliance that claims to generate half a million constituency contacts with Congress annually, aims to focus half of these on the farm bill next year.

Bush Spreads Gospel Of Religious Freedom (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 20, 2006

Though no sermon was delivered Sunday in the church where President Bush took a "moment to converse with God," he offered his own precept outside.

"A whole society is a society which welcomes basic freedoms," Bush said, adding that there's none more basic than "the freedom to worship as you see fit."

Bush and his wife, Laura, visited Cua Bac Church, a Catholic basilica on a tree-lined street in the diplomatic district, to show support for Vietnam's faithful, who live under a government that tightly controls religious institutions.

"It's our way of expressing our personal faith and at the same time urging societies to feel comfortable with and confident in saying to their people, `If you feel like praising God, you're allowed to do so in any way you see fit,'" said Bush, on his first visit to communist Vietnam to attend the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

Music dominated the Vietnamese-language ecumenical service. English-speaking parishioners understood a few words, including "Amen" and "alleluia."

Just this month, the United States removed Vietnam from a list of the world's worst violators of religious freedom.

But human rights groups say restrictions remain.

DOJ_NMG_0096122

Nguyen Quoc Khanh, the priest at Cua Bac Church, reported that Bush said nothing during the service.

"We all had a silent dialogue with God," Khanh said.

Bush beamed in baby blue. So did Chinese President Hu Jintao. Russian President Vladimir Putin, too.

Diplomacy over, world leaders faced one final, inescapable task at the end of their annual summit — donning the host country's costume.

Leaders at the APEC summit were invited to slip traditional Vietnamese "ao dai" silk tunics over their Western-style suits for the annual group photo — by far the most colorful ritual on their agenda.

The normally dour Hu was positively beaming. Putin joked cordially with Bush. The wide pink turbans worn by the three women leaders gave diminutive Philippine President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo a few extra inches of height.

The custom-tailored, ankle-length ao dai, pronounced "ow zai," usually has a snug fit that is said to "reveal everything but show nothing."

But those the leaders wore appeared designed not to reveal too much. Fashioned by famous Vietnamese designer Minh Hanh, they afforded the leaders — most of whom have ample girths — a fairly comfortable fit.

Sky blue was the most popular color among men, with a smattering of reds, greens and yellows for a diplomatic rainbow effect.

The traditional ao dai includes a long tunic with slits up the sides.

The custom of posing in clothing symbolic of the host country began when the leaders wore leather bomber jackets at the first APEC summit in Seattle in 1993.

Buried in a White House list of accomplishments from the summit was cheery news for foreign travelers: A faster way to get through U.S. airports.

It's the APEC Business Travel Card. Don't leave home without it.

The U.S. plans to start recognizing the card, which has existed since 1997.

Business travelers carrying one can look forward to speedier processing in fast-track lanes at major U.S. airports.

Cardholders must have a passport from a participating country, travel regularly to conduct trade in the APEC region and have no criminal record.

They also don't have to apply individually for visas or entry permits every time they travel to a country in the program. The card becomes their visa.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking to world business leaders at the summit on Saturday, touted the card as a way to foster trade and travel.

"Everywhere I go, I hear about the visa issues," Rice said. "Let me assure you that the United States of America wants to be open — open and secure — but open to a free flow of people."

Indonesians Protest Ahead Of Bush Visit (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 20, 2006

Warmly greeted by world leaders in Vietnam, President Bush drew a different reaction Sunday at his upcoming stop in Indonesia, where thousands angrily protested America's policy in the Middle East and wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The White House said it was confident about security precautions for Bush's visit Monday despite police warnings of an increased threat of attack by al-Qaida-linked groups.

The president was to spend just six hours in Indonesia, most of it at Bogor Palace, a presidential retreat outside the capital of Jakarta and far from the scene of protests Sunday where Bush was denounced as a "war criminal' and "terrorist."

While President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono is a close U.S. ally in the war on terror, Bush is highly unpopular in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation.

DOJ_NMG_0096123

Wrapping up three days in Vietnam, Bush was taking a quick look around this city once known as Saigon. He planned to drop by the stock exchange, meet with business leaders and visit the Pasteur Institute for a briefing on its research on HIV/AIDs and other public health problems.

It was Bush's first appearance on the world stage since his Republican Party lost control of Congress and was rebuked for the unpopular war in Iraq.

The White House said Bush was pleased by the results of a 21-nation Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi although the administration was left struggling to explain how it ended.

To Bush's dismay, he was unable to deliver a promised agreement on normal trade relations with Vietnam. It was snarled in Congress but the administration expressed confidence it eventually would be approved.

Vietnam's economy is booming, the fastest growing in Asia, and the country is the world's second-largest exporter of rice. But the benefits have not reached most people. The per capita income is less than $700 a year.

In a city usually teeming with motorcycle traffic, streets were cleared for Bush's motorcade. As he rode by, people waved, laughed and cheered. It was a contrast to the subdued reaction of residents in Hanoi, where Bush participated in the summit and conferred with the leaders of China, Russia, South Korea and Japan.

The White House pronounced itself satisfied with the summit statement prodding North Korea to return to nuclear disarmament talks and urging nations to keep the pressure on by enforcing U.N. Security Council sanctions.

But the administration was at a loss to explain why the statement was simply read as part of the chairman's wrap-up statement, and not issued as a written document. Another oddity was that the section about North Vietnam was not translated into English when the statement was read.

"He read it in Vietnamese, but for whatever reason the translation was not given in the consecutive English translation at the time," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. "We have double checked. The Vietnamese said `Yes, he did read it.'"

Bush met separately with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao to discuss strategy for yet-to-be-scheduled talks with North Korea. The administration sent U.S. envoy Christopher Hill to Beijing for further consultations.

In their public remarks, Bush and Putin celebrated a U.S.-Russia agreement for Moscow's entry into the World Trade Organization. Bush said Russia's admission to the group was "good for the United States and good for Russia."

With Putin and Hu, Bush also pressed for a U.N. Security Council resolution to pressure Iran to abandon nuclear weapons. It was unclear whether Bush made any headway in persuading China and Russia to drop their reluctance to go along.

Describing Bush's discussions with Putin, Snow said the leaders did not discuss specifics "but they understand that you need a strong resolution that will send the Iranians the clear message that we're not only united, but serious, and at the same time are going to offer them the opportunity to have civil nuclear power, which is of some importance to the Iranian people."

Bush Protesters Gather In Jakarta (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam -- Thousands of protesters took to the streets of Jakarta and hundreds of police erected a barbed-wire barricade around the presidential palace a day before President Bush visits Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim country.

While Mr. Bush spent the day in Vietnam, more than 10,000 angry Muslims marched in Indonesia's capital, where one protester held a sign with a photo of the American president and the slogan, "Wanted: Dead or Alive." Another placard said in English, "Bush: Muslim's Enemy No. 1."

Dozens of trucks and buses full of police and military troops were dispatched to put up a makeshift barricade on the street at the front of the Bogor Palace, which is guarded by hundreds more police. Mr. Bush arrives in Indonesia today for a six-hour visit before flying on to Hawaii, the last stop on his Asian tour.

Despite the protests in Jakarta, the United States is viewed positively by many Indonesians for its swift response to the tsunami that struck the islands nearly two years ago, killing 100,000. Almost 60 percent of Indonesians surveyed nationwide said that American assistance made them favorable to the United States, according to Terror Free Tomorrow, a nonpartisan group that includes Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, as an adviser.

Meanwhile yesterday, the president urged Chinese President Hu Jintao to join forces with his neighbors to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear program.

Keeping up pressure on member countries of six-party talks that have fallen apart, the president urged Mr. Hu to use China's clout to persuade reclusive leader Kim Jong-il to stop North Korea's atomic expansion.

"China is a very important nation, and the United States believes strongly that by working together, we can help solve problems such as North Korea and Iran," Mr. Bush told Mr. Hu in a meeting on the margins of the 21-nation Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit.

While Mr. Hu made no mention of North Korea in his remarks, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said that the Chinese president had called for "wisdom and patience" in dealing with Pyongyang, whose Oct. 9 nuclear test and July missile launches shocked the world.

China is the second nation to pull back slightly from the goals of the six-party talks, in which China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and United States seek to force North Korea's hand. South Korea said on Saturday that it could not endorse a call to search ships coming and going from North Korea, the world's largest nuclear exporter.

After his bilateral talk with Mr. Hu, Mr. Bush stressed the need for U.N. member states to comply with a U.N. Security Council resolution that bans trade of goods and transfer of funds to the North that could aid its nuclear arms programs.

But again, China expressed reservations. "We don't really think that sanctions are the purpose, rather it is the means. The U.N. Security [Council] resolution should not be randomly interpreted and should not be expanded," Mr. Liu said.

In Hanoi, before departing the APEC meetings for Ho Chi Minh City, David McCormick, an official of the White House National Security Council, said that the two leaders had agreed "on direction and next steps" on North Korea, but he declined to be more specific. Another White House source said that loose agreements had been made, but that North Korea's neighbors do not want to roil the water by making demands on Mr. Kim.

Later yesterday, Mr. Bush met Russian President Vladimir Putin and again discussed both North Korea and Iran. At the conclusion of the APEC forum, the members issued only a verbal statement that said in part: "We express our strong concern over the July 4-5 missile launches and October 9 nuclear test conducted by [North Korea], that poses a nuclear threat to our shared interest of peace and security and our shared goal of achieving a nuclear weapons-free Korean Peninsula."

Mr. Bush, who will visit the stock exchange in Ho Chi Minh City before flying today to Indonesia, also gave Mr. Hu a gentle nudge on trade. The U.S. trade deficit with China so far this year is expected to exceed last year's record of $202 billion. Mr. Bush said that disputes between the two nations are inevitable but that they could be addressed in a "spirit of mutual respect and a desire to work through our problems."

A few hundred miles south, across the Java Sea, Indonesians clashed with police and planned to disrupt the president's visit. Indonesia is a key regional ally for the United States, but many Muslims there oppose the president's Middle East policies and the war in Iraq.

Aside from Jakarta, demonstrations were also reported in South Sulawesi province, Yogyakarta and Bogor, the site of Mr. Bush's visit. The short stop will be his last in Asia before returning home from a trip that also took him to Singapore and Vietnam.

The president has tried to mute criticism before going to Indonesia, securing $55 million in U.S. aid for anti-corruption and childhood immunization programs.

Indonesia has seen several deadly bomb attacks in recent years against Western targets and blamed on Islamic militants, including the 2002 Bali bombings that killed 202 persons, mostly foreign tourists.

Indonesia's Promise (WSJ)

By Sadanand Dhume

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

When President Bush arrives in Indonesia today, he'll find perhaps the most dramatic reversal of fortunes in recent times. Barely a decade ago, the country was a poster child of the East Asian miracle, lauded by the World Bank for having pulled tens of millions out of poverty and increasingly mentioned in the same breath as Korea and Taiwan. Today, to the extent that Indonesia occupies any space in the popular imagination, it is viewed as a sort of Southeast Asian Bangladesh: a cesspool of corruption, buffeted alternately by terrorist violence and natural disasters.

Yet, for all its exceptional problems, the world's most populous Muslim country also presents an exceptional opportunity. Apart from Turkey, it is the only major Muslim country where modernity stands a fighting chance, or to put it starkly, where the options are not between bad and worse, but between good and bad.

To be sure, as in other parts of the Muslim world, both orthodox practice and Islamist politics have metastasized over the past three decades. But Indonesia boasts advantages that others lack: an innate tolerance bequeathed to its people by nearly a millennium and a half of Hindu-Buddhism that predated Islam's arrival in the 1400s, and a non-sectarian national ideology, Pancasila, that departs from the Islamic norm of treating non-Muslims as second-class citizens. In practical terms this means that the cornerstones of modernity -- women's rights, respect for minorities, room for a skeptical view of faith -- have not been entirely eroded. Building upon these to create a beacon of moderation on Islam's eastern flank, a twin for Kemalist Turkey in the West, remains an achievable goal.

It won't be easy. Homegrown Islamists and their wealthy Arab patrons have invested decades of effort in triple-distilling the gentle folk Islam of Java into an approximation of its desert variant. The simple certitudes of Islamism, encapsulated in the slogan "Islam is the solution," deeply appeal to many who have found themselves propelled from the rice paddy to the office tower in the space of a generation. Add to this the peculiar subculture of Western academia and NGOs, whose efforts to inoculate themselves against that mysterious new ailment, Islamophobia, often lead to an embrace of the absurd, the irrelevant and the downright dangerous: headscarved feminists, Kant-spouting mullahs confined to the diplomatic cocktail circuit, and assorted "moderates" who mouth the occasional homily against terrorism while remaining wedded to an Islamist worldview.

It's little wonder then that Abu Bakar Bashir, the leader of al Qaeda's local franchise, Jemaah Islamiyah, and the alleged mastermind of the 2002 Bali bombings, is back on the streets preaching jihad after a slap-on-the-wrist 26-month jail term. Or that some regional and local governments have begun experimenting with shariah, complete with public floggings and Taliban-inspired vice squads. Or that physical intimidation and assaults on their churches and mosques have become facts of life for Christians and "heretical" Ahmadiyya Muslims.

But all is not lost. Miniskirts in the malls and booze on restaurant menus show that the Islamist dream is only partially fulfilled. They have yet to banish Jakarta's secular elites behind high bungalow walls so an alternative message, however muted, still lives. Amplifying it requires the help of the U.S., like-minded allies such as Australia and Singapore, the still largely non-sectarian Indonesian army and genuine Muslim moderates such as former president Abdurrahman Wahid. Their success or failure will determine whether Indonesians fulfill their East Asian promise or go down the path of political mayhem and economic stagnation of their co-religionists in Nigeria, Pakistan and the Palestinian territories.

Nations Meet On Denying Iran Nuclear Aid (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, November 20, 2006

A Western push to deny Iran technical help in building a plutonium-producing reactor has gathered enough support to be approved by the 35-nation board of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, diplomats said Sunday.

Still, differences both within the Western camp and more broadly among different factions on the International Atomic Energy Agency on how harshly to punish Iran for its nuclear defiance persisted on the eve of the opening meeting Monday, said the diplomats.

Normally, the United States takes the lead in demanding tough action against Tehran for defying U.N. Security Council demands that it freeze uranium enrichment, a possible pathway to nuclear arms.

DOJ_NMG_0096126

But with council agreement on sanctions mired down because of Russian and Chinese efforts to block tough punishment, diplomats said the Americans have taken a back seat to the France at the upcoming Vienna meeting in calling for harsher penalties.

Like their European allies, the Americans were calling for Iran's request for help in building the Arak research reactor to be denied when the IAEA board meets in committee starting Monday — and later in the week in full conference to formally approve committee decisions.

But France was demanding even more, said the diplomats — all accredited to the IAEA, who demanded anonymity in exchange for discussing strategies ahead of the meeting. They told The Associated Press that Paris was asking the IAEA to probe the seven other projects Iran had submitted individually — and possibly reject any or all of them, if they were found to be risks to nuclear proliferation.

Even countries traditionally supportive of Iran were likely to want to deny some help to Iran — probably through a compromise that defers a decision on the issue. Both the Security Council and the IAEA board have issued resolutions urging Tehran to stop construction of the facility.

Arak produces plutonium waste, which, like enriched uranium, can be used for warheads, but the other seven projects that Iran has asked help with are less problematic.

One asks for help in developing nuclear capabilities for medical use. Another seeks legal help for the Russian-built Bushehr reactor which even the Americans have agreed does not pose a threat to nuclear proliferation. The five others ask for assistance in administrative or safety aspects of nuclear power, according to a list made available to the AP.

With most nations backing approval of all other projects except Arak, France would likely be forced to modify its position once the meeting opened, the diplomats said.

A diplomat familiar with the U.S. stance said the Americans were not backing the French because of recognition that the board would agree to nothing more than denying Iran help with Arak.

Others pointed to recent changes in the top echelons of the French government agencies dealing with Iran and proliferation threats, saying new, more hardline leadership could explain why Paris was out front in seeking tougher action.

Denying Iran help with Arak — where it is seeking agency assistance to make sure the reactor is environmentally safe — would do little to slow construction of that facility, which is expected to be completed within the next decade. And it would not affect Tehran's other potential avenue to weapons production — uranium enrichment.

Still, it would send a signal at a time that the Security Council is mired down in how harshly to penalize Tehran and allow the West to continue exerting some pressure during the council deadlock.

Once in full session Wednesday, the board also will hear a report from IAEA chief Mohamed Elbaradei that faults Tehran for continuing to deny full cooperation with agency inspectors probing suspect aspects of its nuclear program and outlines new finds of potentially worrying traces of plutonium at a waste facility.

As Iran Seeks Aid, Atom Agency Faces Quandary (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

At a place called Arak in the desert southwest of Tehran, behind barbed wire and antiaircraft guns, Iran is building a heavy-water nuclear reactor. The government says it will produce radioactive isotopes for medical treatments. As an unavoidable byproduct, it will also make plutonium, one of the primary fuels for atom bombs.

At the International Atomic Energy Agency, inspectors are trying to make sure that Tehran never uses its nuclear infrastructure to make weapons. Indeed, for just that reason, the agency's board has repeatedly called on the Iranians to abandon the Arak reactor. Yet when the board meets this week in Vienna, it will consider an Iranian request for technical help in safely completing the reactor, which is to go online as soon as 2009.

Traditionally, technical aid has been routinely granted, part of the agency's efforts to nurture the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Now, though, amid growing international suspicion about Iran's real nuclear intentions — and especially about a far more publicized part of its nuclear program, the enrichment of uranium — the Arak proposal is provoking bitter and unusual debate.

Calling the reactor an arms threat, the United States and its allies say the agency should deny Iran's request. Helping make Arak's operations safe, they say, would only speed the reactor's completion — and Iran's emergence as a nuclear power.

But some developing nations say that a rebuff to the Iranians would set a bad precedent that could threaten their own peaceful atomic pursuits. Echoing an argument that Iran has often used in its recent nuclear diplomacy, they frame Arak as a new front in a war between the world's nuclear haves and have-nots.

In recent days, the dispute has produced a rush of speeches, lobbying and behind-the-scenes arm twisting among members of the agency's 35-nation board.

"It's a big deal," said Daryl G. Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, a private group in Washington. "This is the first test of the I.A.E.A.'s resolve to pressure Iran to halt this project. If it moves forward, it could give Iran a second track to making nuclear material for bombs."

Agency officials say a rejection of technical assistance would be unprecedented, and some of them want to press ahead. Last week, the agency's secretariat said it had found no legal basis to deny the request, diplomats said.

Arak, in short, shows the increasingly delicate nature of the atomic energy agency's long-running balancing act — part nuclear policeman, part promoter of atomic science and safety. By its nature, the same nuclear technology that lights cities can, with a little extra effort, fuel bombs. A question Arak poses for the agency is whether it must adjust its dual role in a time of heightened concern about nuclear proliferation, not just in the Middle East, but worldwide.

Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the agency, based in Vienna, denied that the Arak reactor had any use for weapons, saying it would aid hospitals, agriculture and industry.

"The world should know the other side of the coin, not just what the White House says," he said in an interview. "The international community has the right to see the reality of the exclusively peaceful nature of our activities and our full cooperation with the agency."

Mr. Soltanieh said Iran had won support for agency assistance to Arak from such international bodies as the group of developing states known as the G-77. "Technical cooperation should not be politicized," he said. "Iran should be encouraged to use the agency's technical expertise for nuclear safety."

But Robert J. Einhorn, who directed nonproliferation at the State Department from 1999 to 2001 and now works at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said the agency's board should reject aid to "a project conceived long ago as providing Iran another route to a nuclear weapons capability." Arak, he added, "will be capable of producing enough plutonium for about two bombs a year."

Mr. Einhorn conceded that the reactor could have peaceful uses, though implausibly so. "A 12-inch hunting knife," he said, "also could be used to spread jam on your toast in the morning."

To opponents of the Arak project, it would be surprising were the board to approve the Arak proposal just days after the atomic energy agency reported that inspectors had found unexplained traces of plutonium in Iran, and that Tehran continued to withhold answers to important questions about its nuclear activities.

And it was the agency's board that, in February, after Iran defied agency demands to halt its uranium enrichment program, decided to report the case to the United Nations Security Council. That set in motion a search for sanctions that still divides the world's nuclear powers.

The agency's aid to Iran is part of a wide program of "technical cooperation" that is poorly known outside specialist circles. Still, it accounts for about one-third of the annual agency budget; the agency is spending roughly $100 million on such programs this year. In a way, the projects are a carrot the agency offers to offset its intrusive policing of civilian technologies to bar nations from the secret pursuit of atom bombs. But critics say the deal is intrinsically bad. "Atoms for peace," they insist, is an illusion that no amount of policing can make real, with dishonest states always able to turn civilian nuclear technologies to destructive ends.

Today, the technical aid program involves more than 100 nations. The agency assisted Iran's hunt for uranium in the 1980s and currently has 14 cooperative projects with Tehran, including helping it prepare to operate its Bushehr reactor, which is designed to make electricity.

DOJ_NMG_0096128

"We provide expert services, so they can learn to do things for themselves," said M. Peter Salema, an agency official who helps run the Iranian projects. The paramount aim, he added, is reactor safety. "If there is a bad incident, it affects the whole nuclear industry everywhere, like Chernobyl."

Iran's new request seeks agency aid not in designing or building the 40-megawatt Arak reactor, but in ensuring its safe operation. Western diplomats say that includes everything from helping Iran learn how to avoid catastrophic plant failure to minimizing radiation dangers in the handling of spent fuel rods, which would bear the plutonium.

That plutonium is the reason Arak has been a subject of concern since construction first came to light in 2002. Atom bombs use two main fuels — plutonium and uranium. In recent years, world attention has focused mainly on Tehran's efforts to enrich uranium. But weapons designers often prefer plutonium, because it takes less to produce a significant blast, making it ideal for compact missile warheads.

What's more, experts say heavy-water reactors like Arak are inherently dangerous for nuclear proliferation because they are better at producing weapons-grade plutonium than light-water reactors like Bushehr. Heavy water, so called because it contains a heavy form of hydrogen, slows down speeding neutrons so uranium fuel can absorb them. In some cases, this merging splits uranium atoms in two. In other cases, the uranium is transformed into plutonium. Engineers remove the plutonium from spent fuel in a step known as reprocessing.

The Arak reactor, experts say, is similar in design to heavy-water reactors that Israel, India and Pakistan use to make plutonium for nuclear arms.

The Arak complex holds both the half-built reactor and a sprawling plant for the production of heavy water that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad formally inaugurated in August, saying, "The Iranian people are determined to take big steps."

The wrangling over aid to Arak began last week at preparatory meetings in Vienna. Egypt and some other developing nations argued for preserving the status quo and trusting the secretariat's judgment that there was no basis for denying the aid.

The American ambassador to the atomic agency, Gregory L. Schulte, said in an interview that objections had arisen because Arak made little sense from a civil perspective but great sense for making weapons. Moreover, he said, Iran had failed to explain inconsistencies that the agency uncovered in a clandestine Iranian program to separate plutonium from spent reactor fuel.

"The United States and other board members," he said, "cannot agree to have the I.A.E.A. assist the project."

Some Western diplomats suspect that Iran expected to have the reactor aid denied, and that its real goal was to show that the United States and its allies want to keep the developing world in a state of atomic backwardness.

In a speech last Thursday at the University of Vienna, Mr. Schulte predicted that the agency's board "will not fall for Iran's attempt to politicize and misuse the I.A.E.A.'s technical cooperation program." He stressed his country's longstanding financial support for technical aid, saying the United States had contributed more than $200 million since 2003. But he added, "Technical cooperation is meant for peaceful purposes, not to help countries build nuclear bombs."

At the meetings last week, Iran also warned against the politicization of technical aid. An Iranian representative said conservatives in Iran would use a decision to deny the aid as evidence of the West's malice. "Don't give fuel to the hard-liners, who are ready to put everything in jeopardy," he said, according to a diplomat present.

In the interview, Mr. Soltanieh said Washington was wrong to see Arak as a step to acquiring nuclear weapons, insisting that Iran had no plans to build a reprocessing plant that could extract plutonium from Arak's spent nuclear fuel. "Their calculations and physics are very weak," he said of American officials. "They make so many mistakes."

From Monday through Wednesday, a committee of the agency's board is to study hundreds of proposed aid projects, and the full board is to vote on them when it meets Thursday and Friday. The board, currently led by Slovenia, does not include Iran.

While the United States has lobbied hard on the Arak issue and says it expects to prevail, there are countries on the board that may back Iran, including Bolivia, Cuba and Syria, diplomats said. It takes a simple majority of the board to back or kill a measure.

A possible compromise, some said, would have the issue of Arak aid deferred rather than rejected outright.

Diplomats said that only twice before had technical aid projects drawn political fire. The United States questioned aid to Cuba around 1990 and to North Korea in 1991, but both projects moved ahead, the diplomats said.

DOJ_NMG_0096129

Nuclear experts doubt that an aid denial would do much to slow the eventual completion of Arak, given the growing skill of Iranian engineers and Iran's aggressive nuclear stance.

"No matter what, we are going to continue the construction," Mr. Soltanieh said. "There's no way to stop it."

U.S. Sets Up A Perch In Dubai To Keep An Eye On Iran (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 19 — High atop a 1970s-style high-rise building in the heart of this desert city, a group of State Department officials has been setting up offices as part of an ambitious effort by the United States to better monitor Iran and encourage political change there.

The State Department announced early this year that it would open the office in Dubai and set up an Iran desk in Washington to make contact with Iranians and improve its institutional knowledge of the country at a time when tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions are high.

American officials decided to locate an Iran office here because of the city's large community of Iranian businesspeople, many of whom maintain relationships in Iran and return there often. Dubai, which is about 100 miles from Iran, has also long been popular among Iranians seeking to shop, vacation or catch flights elsewhere.

The State Department's program is only the highest-profile effort here. The United Arab Emirates, the confederation that includes Dubai, has become a nexus of political activity concerning Iran, as numerous governments and groups have seized on the country's location and its longstanding ties with Tehran to get a better understanding of Iran and its people.

Dubai has become a main stop-off point for researchers and analysts seeking to meet Iranians, analysts here say, and regional research and advocacy groups have held numerous high-level conferences here in recent months focused on Persian Gulf security and Iran. At least one nongovernmental group run by Iranian-American opposition figures has also used this city to hold workshops to train Iranians in techniques of civil disobedience aimed at eventually forcing political change inside Iran.

"The problem with Iran is you cannot operate inside the country, so you have to operate in the neighboring countries," said Mustafa Alani, senior researcher at the Gulf Research Center, a Dubai research organization. "But a place as open as Dubai naturally attracts people and intelligence agencies from all over the world. Of course, they're not really visible so you cannot pinpoint them in any one location."

On Friday, R. Nicholas Burns, under secretary of state for political affairs, said the Dubai office was created in the spirit of the Riga station in Latvia, which became a critical source of knowledge about the Soviet Union at a time when the United States did not have diplomatic relations with Moscow.

"We sent a young kid from Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1926 out to Riga station: George Kennan," he said, referring to the man who would become one of the world's foremost Soviet experts. "We said: 'Go and learn Russian. Sit in Riga. You be our window into the Soviet Union.'

"That is what we are saying to these young kids today. 'You go to Dubai. We can't be in Iran. You interview every Iranian you can find, get to know them — all the Iranians who come out and do their banking there and do their weekends there — and you tell us how we should understand Iran.' "

The United States broke off diplomatic relations with Tehran after the takeover of the American Embassy there in 1979. When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice joined the department last year, Mr. Burns said, it had only two people working on Iran issues.

Today eight are assigned to the Iran desk in Washington and six in the Dubai office, which is within the American consulate. In May, Mr. Burns said being in Dubai was "the next best thing" to being in Iran. About 200,000 Iranians live in Dubai, and contacts with them are considered especially useful because they are not political refugees, as in some other cities outside Iran with Iranian populations.

Iranians in Dubai have been attracted here in large part because of the city's openness and freewheeling business climate. The emirate is an important transshipment point for goods and products headed to Iran. And Iranians can use its banks and financial institutions to do business with other countries more easily than from home because of trade sanctions and United States pressure on banks to restrict business with Iran.

Among the nongovernmental groups seizing on those links is the Iranian Center for Applied Nonviolence, which invites Iranians to workshops here to teach them how peaceful revolts in Georgia, the Philippines and elsewhere were set off. The center, led by Ramin Ahmadi, an Iranian-American opposition figure, holds the training sessions on civil disobedience every three months or so, hoping to foment a nonviolent revolt in Iran. The International Center on Nonviolent Conflict, a separate organization based in Washington, helped organize one of the training sessions.

"We wanted to find a place where we were safe, where they can't send paramilitaries to gun you down, and where large numbers of Iranians go," said Dr. Ahmadi, who is a physician in the United States. "The last thing the Iranian regime will want to do is cause themselves trouble in Dubai. So it provides us with a degree of protection."

Critics of Dr. Ahmadi's work say it threatens to taint opposition figures inside Iran with appearing to cooperate with outside agitators. At least two people were imprisoned after attending one of his sessions last year.

So far, the State Department's work here remains low-level as officials try to build relationships. Much of it has been focused on easing the way for Iranians applying for visas to the United States and helping them arrange scholarships for study there, Iranians here say.

Abbas Bolurfrushan, president of the Iranian Business Council in Dubai, a nonpolitical group, said he had been in contact with some of the officials to help find ways of reducing the number of trips Iranians have to make to Dubai in order to obtain a visa to travel to the United States.

Beyond working to better monitor Iran and increase interactions with Iranians in Dubai, the Bush administration is also working to increase other forms of outreach. It requested tens of millions of dollars from Congress for outreach programs, and now has about $76 million for those programs, according to Mr. Burns.

The money is being used to increase the hours of Persian-language radio and television beamed into Iran; to support exchange programs of athletes, artists and professionals to the United States; and for other democratization programs.

Extremist Vying To Become Top Ayatollah (WT)

By Colin Freeman

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

TEHRAN -- A hard-line cleric who opposes all dialogue with the West is a leading contender to become Iran's next supreme spiritual leader.

In a move that would push the country even further into the diplomatic wilderness, Ayatollah Mohammad Taghi Mesbah-Yazdi, 71, who publicly backs the use of suicide bombers against Israel, is campaigning to succeed Grand Ayatollah Ali Khameini, 67, as the head of the Islamic state.

Considered an extremist even by fellow mullahs, he was a fringe figure in Iran's theocracy until last year's election of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a fellow fundamentalist who views him as his ideological mentor.

He is known to many Iranians as "Professor Crocodile" because of a notorious cartoon that depicted him weeping false tears over the imprisoning of a reformist journalist.

Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi and his supporters will attempt to tighten the fundamentalists' political stranglehold next month, by standing in elections for the Assembly of Experts, an 86-strong group of theologians that would be responsible for nominating a replacement for Ayatollah Khamenei, whose health is rumored to be failing.

Opposing them will be a coalition of moderate conservatives led by Hashemi Rafsanjani, a former president, and members of the increasingly marginalized reformist movement, who have formed an alliance to prevent what both groups fear is a drift toward political extremism.

Appointing Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi as supreme leader would be a massive blow to Western efforts to get Iran to cease its nuclear program and backing of militants in Lebanon and Iraq and among the Palestinians. Although he has never spoken publicly on the issue, Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi is thought to support the idea of an Iranian nuclear bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0096131

Ali Ansari, an Iran specialist at the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London, said: "Mesbah-Yazdi is on the hard right and very authoritarian. He doesn't even believe in democracy. Having him in power would lead to a much more hard-line, puritanical rule in Iran. It would not be good news for the West."

The Assembly of Experts is elected every eight years and has the power to appoint, supervise and impeach the supreme leader, who, in practice, wields ultimate power. Although Ayatollah Khameini, who has been in office since 1989, is expected to remain for the time being, the assembly elected next month is almost certain eventually to decide his successor.

The run-up to the vote has been marred by complaints of rigging in favor of hard-liners. The Guardian Council, a hard-line body that vets candidates, is accused of vetoing reform-minded clerics from taking part. Around half of nearly 500 applicants have been barred from standing.

In a letter to the council last week, Mehdi Karroubi, a reformist cleric, accused the council of "injustice" and misjudgment, saying that it would lead to "people's distrust in the authorities and the clergy."

The reformists' despair has been deepened by fears that few of their disillusioned supporters will vote, despite the possible consequences of a hard-liner victory. Constant political interference in the electoral process has persuaded many Iranians that it is not worth voting, an attitude that many reformists concede helped Mr. Ahmadinejad to win the presidency last year.

"Many reformists have lost faith, although the hard-liners will hope to organize a mass turnout among their own supporters," Mr. Ansari said.

Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi, who will be standing for election to the Assembly of Experts, regularly meets with Mr. Ahmadinejad, whose presidential bid he endorsed in a fatwa, or holy order.

The cartoonist whose drawing earned "Professor Crocodile" his nickname suffered the same fate as the journalists whose frequent imprisonment was depicted. He, too, was sent to prison.

Israel Holds Fire As Gazans Rally At House (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 19 — Israel called off an airstrike against the house of a suspected Palestinian militant in Gaza late Saturday, after the inhabitants ignored a telephoned warning and neighbors flocked to the house to prevent the bombing, the military said.

On Sunday, hundreds of Palestinians, including the prime minister from the militant faction Hamas, stayed around the house and on its balconies and roof throughout the day. They declared a victory for “popular resistance,” but Israel, under criticism for killing civilians in such strikes, called it another example of Palestinians using civilians to shield military activity.

“We see it as a cynical exploitation of our attempt to avoid harm to civilians,” said a spokesman for the Israeli military, who, according to usual practice, spoke on condition of anonymity. “They are using them as human shields.”

But Palestinians celebrated it as a possibly potent new defense against air raids that Israel might find difficult to counter.

“We are so proud of this national stand,” Prime Minister Ismail Haniya said Sunday while visiting the house, in the town of Jabalya, in northern Gaza. “It’s the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children.”

Israel said the house had been used by leaders of a militant group, the Popular Resistance Committees, which was active in firing Qassam rockets from Gaza into Israel. Last week, a 57-year-old Israeli woman from the nearby Israeli town of Sderot was killed by one of the rockets, and over the weekend, Israel carried out several small-scale operations against militants suspected of being involved in firing them.

The Israeli military spokesman said the attack on the house had been called off after a routine telephone warning from the military urging inhabitants to evacuate the house was ignored. “We didn’t want to harm civilians,” he said.

Israel has had an increasingly difficult time ending the rocket fire, the most contentious issue between Israel and Palestinian militants. Nearly two weeks ago, Israeli artillery fire killed 19 civilians in Beit Hanun, prompting a United Nations resolution to open a fact-finding mission into the episode.

DOJ_NMG_0096132

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, during his weekly cabinet meeting on Sunday, attacked the resolution, saying it did not sufficiently condemn the Palestinians' rocket fire against Israeli civilians. He said Israel would not cooperate with any international inquiry.

On Sunday, reprisals continued. An 80-year-old Palestinian man was killed in Gaza City and a dozen others were wounded by an Israeli strike on a car carrying two Hamas militants. The Israeli spokesman said the militants had been involved in making rockets.

The office of the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, said Sunday that he had called the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to ask him to help end the rocket fire.

Mr. Peretz lives in Sderot, the town hit hardest by the rockets. A member of his security detail was hit and had both legs severed by the same rocket that killed the Israeli woman last week.

Palestinian Shields Foil Israeli Strikes (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, November 20, 2006

Hundreds of Palestinians serving as human shields guarded the homes of two top militants Sunday, a new tactic that forced Israel to call off missile strikes on the buildings and re-evaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza.

In recent months, the Israeli air force has repeatedly struck the homes of militants after warning residents by phone to clear out. Israeli security officials said they did not know how to respond to the human shield tactic, but pressed ahead with other airstrikes Sunday.

In Gaza City, an aircraft fired a missile at a car, killing one man and wounding nine, including two Hamas militants. Four of the wounded were children, ages 5 to 16, who suffered shrapnel injuries, hospital officials said.

The military said the target of the strike was a vehicle carrying senior members of the Hamas rocket launching operation.

The standoff over the homes of the militants began late Saturday when Mohammed Baroud, local leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, was informed by the army that his house would be hit. The three-story building is home to 17 people from Baroud's family. Another militant from Hamas also received a warning.

Instead of fleeing, though, the two decided to stay in their homes and called in reinforcements. They were quickly joined by crowds of supporters, including dozens of armed men, who gathered on balconies, rooftops and in the streets outside.

"Death to Israel. Death to America," the crowds chanted. Local mosques and Palestinian TV and radio stations also mobilized supporters.

Baroud, involved in rocket attacks on Israel, said he and his fellow militants had planned the response a few days earlier when another house was destroyed in a missile strike.

The army said it called off the nighttime airstrikes because of the crowds. It condemned what it said was a cynical exploitation "by the terrorists of uninvolved people as human shields."

Israeli military officials acknowledged they had no solution for the standoff. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the media.

By Sunday afternoon, about two dozen women were milling around on Baroud's roof, shielded from the sun by green tarp. One story below them, about a dozen men were resting on mattresses.

Baroud's mother, Umm Wael, said shifts had been organized in preparation for a long standoff. "Where should we go?" she said. "We will stay here or die in the house. Let them bring it down on our heads."

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas stopped by to show support. "We are so proud of this national stand. It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children," he said.

Also Sunday, Hamas militants in Gaza fired eight rockets at the Israeli town of Sderot, seriously wounding one person. Last week, a Sderot woman was killed in a rocket attack.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz called Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and demanded he invoke his authority to put an end to the rocket fire, the Defense Ministry said. Peretz told Abbas that Israel would not tolerate continued barrages.

DOJ_NMG_0096133

Abbas responded by telling Peretz to stop Israel's military escalation in the Palestinian territories, according to the Palestinian news agency, WAFA.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert criticized a U.N. resolution that calls on Israel to pull its troops from Gaza and requests a fact-finding mission into the death of 19 members of an extended family killed in an Israeli artillery attack earlier this month.

The resolution — which passed the General Assembly on Friday — received support from all members of the European Union after last-minute changes were made to soften the tone. Israel, Australia and the United States voted against it.

Olmert said Israel will not halt its five-month offensive in Gaza, which he said is a response to rocket fire from Palestinian militants, even though civilians are frequently caught in the crossfire.

He lashed out at members of the international community "who on their moral high-horse and eye-rolling ways view it as correct to initiate a U.N. resolution condemning us."

Hamas and Abbas' more moderate Fatah have been at loggerheads since the Islamic group came to power after winning January parliamentary elections. In recent weeks, the sides have been trying to put aside their differences and form a unity government in the hopes of ending international sanctions imposed on the government.

Israel and Western donor nations have demanded that Hamas renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept past peace deals. Hamas rejects the conditions, and the emerging coalition government is expected to take a vague position toward Israel.

Haniyeh acknowledged that despite progress in the talks, there were no guarantees the new government would persuade the international community to lift sanctions.

"We want to feel more secure, to be more comfortable that they are going to be committed to these guarantees and lift the siege," Haniyeh told reporters after visiting the Baroud home.

Israel Calls Off Strike On Militant's Home After Palestinians Form Human Shield (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux And Rushdi Abu Alouf

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

JABALYA, Gaza Strip — Israel said today that it had called off a planned aerial bombardment of a Palestinian militant's home after about 200 of his supporters, in a new defensive tactic, rushed to form a human shield around the residence.

The mass mobilization in the Gaza Strip is believed to be the first employed by Palestinians to prevent an Israeli air strike. It is part of a growing use of civilians, including women and children, against an Israeli offensive aimed at halting rocket fire into Israel from Gaza.

Israeli officials said the tactic spells a new difficulty for their 5-month-old offensive, which has been largely ineffective so far.

Saved by the action late Saturday night was the home of Mohammed Wael Baroud, identified by both sides as an operative of the Popular Resistance Committees who has overseen some of the ongoing rocket attacks. Israel considers him a wanted terrorist.

Capt. Noa Meir, a spokeswoman for the Israeli military, said it targeted the home as part of a "terrorist infrastructure," but canceled the planned air strike because of the large crowd.

She said the military would continue fighting to root out weapons caches and logistical centers of Baroud's organization, as well as those of Islamic Jihad and the armed wing of the Hamas movement that leads the Palestinian Authority.

All three groups are involved in launching crude Kassam rockets, nearly 1,000 of which have fallen in or near Israeli cities and towns this year. Today, one rocket wounded a taxi driver in Sderot, near the Gaza border. Another killed a 70-year-old woman there Wednesday.

At midday today, an Israeli aircraft attacked a car carrying two Hamas gunmen in Gaza City, killing an 80-year-old man and wounding six other passersby, hospital officials said. The Hamas members, identified by Israel as rocket makers, escaped unharmed, fleeing on foot into a nearby mosque after the first missile missed the car.

The Israeli army often attacks the vehicles of Palestinian militants without warning, aiming to kill, but says it routinely orders occupants out of targeted buildings before striking, in case civilians are among them.

Such a warning came by telephone to Baroud's two-story home in the Jabalya refugee camp in northern Gaza, giving the 15 members of his and his brothers' families half an hour to get out.

Instead, Baroud holed up inside with relatives and informed his superiors and the local mosque. The Barouds were quickly joined by neighbors and supporters, responding to appeals from the mosque and from Palestinian radio and television.

"Death to Israel! Death to America!" the demonstrators shouted from the roof of the house and the streets outside.

Nizar Rayan, a Hamas leader in northern Gaza, said the demonstration was part of a new method of "popular action to protect the fighters and their homes" and said it would be repeated whenever a Palestinian home is threatened by Israeli bombardment.

Supportive crowds remained at the Baroud home today and formed pre-emptively around the residences of several other Gaza militants who had been targeted by Israel in the past.

On Nov. 3, Hamas orchestrated a similar rescue when about 200 unarmed women swarmed past an Israeli military cordon around a mosque in the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun and shielded the escape of 73 Palestinian gunmen who had been trapped inside. Two women were killed by Israeli gunfire that, the Israeli army said, was aimed at armed men in their midst.

Meir, the army spokeswoman, said the mosque incident and the demonstration at Baroud's home "are part of the same cynical use of Palestinian civilians as human shields."

"They're forcing us to face a very difficult dilemma," she said. "While they have no regard for their own civilians, we're the ones who have to make the choice of how to defend our civilians on the one hand and keep theirs out of harm's way on the other."

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a senior Hamas leader, portrayed Saturday night's demonstration as an act of self preservation. "Those people intervened to protect their own houses as well," he told reporters outside the Baroud home.

Some of the demonstrators were members of armed Palestinian groups including Hamas, Fatah and other rivals of Baroud's organization.

Nassem abu Ajena, a 45-year-old local commander in Hamas' military wing, climbed to the roof of Baroud's home Saturday night with two of his sons, Khalil, 17, and Samer, 19.

"If I protect my neighbor's house today, he will protect my house tomorrow," Ajena explained.

Palestinian officials say Israeli warplanes have destroyed nine homes in Gaza in stepped-up strikes since Wednesday's fatal rocket attack on Sderot.

Israel has turned increasingly to its air force since a long-range artillery barrage killed 19 civilians in Beit Hanoun on Nov. 8. Israel said the shells went off course because of problems with the targeting system.

Israel unilaterally withdrew its army outposts and settlements from Gaza in September last year but has made frequent military incursions into the coastal territory since the capture of one of its soldiers along the border in late June. The soldier is still missing.

As the incursions have become longer and more frequent, Israeli officials have debated whether to intervene even more aggressively in Gaza. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said last week that while Israel would continue targeted attacks, a large-scale assault would not necessarily stop the rockets.

Today, Olmert criticized a U.N. General Assembly resolution that calls on Israel to pull its troops from the Gaza Strip and requests a fact-finding mission into the Beit Hanoun deaths.

"The state of Israel is not the one that has to provide answers about hitting civilians," Olmert said. "We have expressed our deepest regret over this. But those who preach morality and roll their eyes have yet to condemn those [Palestinians] who are shooting with the goal of hitting civilians as a systematic policy."

Palestinian Shields Foil Israeli Strikes (AP-Y)

Hundreds of Palestinians serving as human shields guarded the homes of two top militants Sunday, a new tactic that forced Israel to call off missile strikes on the buildings and re-evaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza.

In recent months, the Israeli air force has repeatedly struck the homes of militants after warning residents by phone to clear out. Israeli security officials said they did not know how to respond to the human shield tactic, but pressed ahead with other airstrikes Sunday.

In Gaza City, an aircraft fired a missile at a car, killing one man and wounding nine, including two Hamas militants. Four of the wounded were children, ages 5 to 16, who suffered shrapnel injuries, hospital officials said.

The military said the target of the strike was a vehicle carrying senior members of the Hamas rocket launching operation.

The standoff over the homes of the militants began late Saturday when Mohammed Baroud, local leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, was informed by the army that his house would be hit. The three-story building is home to 17 people from Baroud's family. Another militant from Hamas also received a warning.

Instead of fleeing, though, the two decided to stay in their homes and called in reinforcements. They were quickly joined by crowds of supporters, including dozens of armed men, who gathered on balconies, rooftops and in the streets outside.

"Death to Israel. Death to America," the crowds chanted. Local mosques and Palestinian TV and radio stations also mobilized supporters.

Baroud, involved in rocket attacks on Israel, said he and his fellow militants had planned the response a few days earlier when another house was destroyed in a missile strike.

The army said it called off the nighttime airstrikes because of the crowds. It condemned what it said was a cynical exploitation "by the terrorists of uninvolved people as human shields."

Israeli military officials acknowledged they had no solution for the standoff. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the media.

By Sunday afternoon, about two dozen women were milling around on Baroud's roof, shielded from the sun by green tarp. One story below them, about a dozen men were resting on mattresses.

Baroud's mother, Umm Wael, said shifts had been organized in preparation for a long standoff. "Where should we go?" she said. "We will stay here or die in the house. Let them bring it down on our heads."

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas stopped by to show support. "We are so proud of this national stand. It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children," he said.

Also Sunday, Hamas militants in Gaza fired eight rockets at the Israeli town of Sderot, seriously wounding one person. Last week, a Sderot woman was killed in a rocket attack.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz called Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and demanded he invoke his authority to put an end to the rocket fire, the Defense Ministry said. Peretz told Abbas that Israel would not tolerate continued barrages.

Abbas responded by telling Peretz to stop Israel's military escalation in the Palestinian territories, according to the Palestinian news agency, WAFA.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert criticized a U.N. resolution that calls on Israel to pull its troops from Gaza and requests a fact-finding mission into the death of 19 members of an extended family killed in an Israeli artillery attack earlier this month.

The resolution — which passed the General Assembly on Friday — received support from all members of the European Union after last-minute changes were made to soften the tone. Israel, Australia and the United States voted against it.

Olmert said Israel will not halt its five-month offensive in Gaza, which he said is a response to rocket fire from Palestinian militants, even though civilians are frequently caught in the crossfire.

He lashed out at members of the international community "who on their moral high-horse and eye-rolling ways view it as correct to initiate a U.N. resolution condemning us."

Hamas and Abbas' more moderate Fatah have been at loggerheads since the Islamic group came to power after winning January parliamentary elections. In recent weeks, the sides have been trying to put aside their differences and form a unity government in the hopes of ending international sanctions imposed on the government.

DOJ_NMG_0096136

Israel and Western donor nations have demanded that Hamas renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept past peace deals. Hamas rejects the conditions, and the emerging coalition government is expected to take a vague position toward Israel.

Haniyeh acknowledged that despite progress in the talks, there were no guarantees the new government would persuade the international community to lift sanctions.

"We want to feel more secure, to be more comfortable that they are going to be committed to these guarantees and lift the siege," Haniyeh told reporters after visiting the Baroud home.

Human Shields Foil Air Strikes (WT/AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

BEIT LAHIYA, Gaza Strip -- Hundreds of Palestinians serving as human shields guarded the homes of two top militants yesterday, a new tactic that forced Israel to call off missile strikes on the buildings and reevaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza.

The Israeli air force repeatedly has struck the homes of militants after warning residents by phone to clear out. Israeli security officials said they did not know how to respond to the human-shield tactic, but pressed ahead with other air strikes yesterday.

Israel PM Lashes Out At UN Over Resolution (AFP)

AFP, November 20, 2006

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has criticised a UN General Assembly resolution calling for a fact-finding mission to probe an Israeli artillery strike that killed 19 Palestinians this month.

DOJ_NMG_0096137

"I view it severely," Olmert told the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem on Sunday, 11 days after shells slammed into private homes in Beit Hanun in northern Gaza, killing mostly women and children.

"We have no doubt that it is the State of Israel which must respond to attacks on civilians. We have expressed our deepest regret over this.

"But those who preach morality and roll their eyes have yet to see fit to initiate a resolution in condemnation of those who are shooting with the goal of hitting civilians as a long-range, systematic policy," Olmert added.

The UN General Assembly on Friday overwhelmingly passed a resolution urging an immediate end to all acts of Israeli and Palestinian violence, including an Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip and Palestinians firing rockets into Israel.

In Gaza, the director of the United Nations refugee agency defended the resolution and accused Israel of using excessive force, a day after he said two children in a UN-run school in northern Gaza were wounded by stray bullets.

"The results of (Israel's) acts speak for themselves and the results are indicative of the fact that they are not taking care as they are bound to do," John Ging told reporters after touring the school in Beit Lahiya.

"There is disproportionate use of force and due care is not being taken for the civilian population," he added.

"That there isn't even safety in an UNRWA school sends a very clear message that ties in to what the UN General Assembly thankfully voted on, which is that there is a need to protect the civilians in Gaza."

Friday's resolution also urged the UN secretary general to set up a fact-finding mission to probe Israel's shelling of private homes in the Gaza town of Beit Hanun on November 8 which killed 19 Palestinians.

Israel has said a technical error was responsible for the artillery incident and expressed regret for the "tragedy".

Hezbollah's Leader Calls For Street Protests (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 19 — Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, pressed his case for bringing down Lebanon's government in a message broadcast Sunday, once again calling for peaceful demonstrations to topple what he described as an "illegitimate and unconstitutional" government controlled by Washington.

Sheik Nasrallah used his televised appearance to try to win political support by playing to the deep resentment many Lebanese harbor against the United States for having refused to press for an early end to Israel's war with Hezbollah. Sheik Nasrallah sought to characterize his goals in purely domestic terms, insisting that Hezbollah was not doing the bidding of Iran or Syria — as his opponents have charged.

In a taped speech broadcast on Al Manar television station run by Hezbollah, Sheik Nasrallah called on his supporters to be "psychologically" ready to protest for days, weeks or however long it would take to force the government to step down. But he also offered a prescription to avoid the protests.

"There are two solutions to resolve the crisis: either the formation of a government of national unity in which all political movements take part, or early parliamentary elections," he said to an audience of followers on the taped message. "Come and let us form a national unity government. Nobody is raising arms. Nobody is making a coup or popular revolution."

He also insisted that Hezbollah was not advocating violence or a power grab, adding, "Civil war is a red line. Clashes are a red line."

While Sheik Nasrallah has won widespread credibility for doing what he promises to do, it appeared he was mindful of the risks involved in taking to the streets and was looking to build so much pressure on the government that such a move would not become necessary.

The struggle for power in Lebanon took a new turn after the war with Israel ended in August, and Hezbollah emerged emboldened by its ability to survive the Israeli attack and bloody Israeli forces. Hezbollah, a militant Islamic organization with a powerful political and aid operation, has pressed its case for changing the makeup of the government to include more of its allies, including the party of Gen. Michel Aoun, a Christian.

But the governing March 14th coalition, a group of Sunni, Druse and Christian leaders that is allied with the West, has vowed not to give Hezbollah as much as it is asking for because that would put veto power for all government actions in the

Hezbollah coalition's hands. Members of the governing coalition have said that would paralyze the government and give Syria and Iran undue influence in Lebanese affairs.

Though the conflict is a domestic battle for power, it also has an international component that could influence the future far beyond Lebanon's own borders. The governing coalition is allied with the United States and France, while Hezbollah is a close ally of Syria and Iran. Throughout the conflict, each side has accused the other of being a puppet of foreign interests, while denying such accusations against itself. The White House recently issued a statement charging that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah were planning to bring down the government together.

Sheik Nasrallah addressed those charges directly, using his speech to insist that his goal was unity, not the empowerment of Hezbollah, Syria or Iran. The governing coalition has repeatedly accused Hezbollah of wanting to block the creation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Sheik Nasrallah denied that was the case.

He also indicated that no matter what happened, even if security forces attacked the demonstrators, his militia would not be goaded into fighting a domestic battle.

"When we take to the streets we hope that they don't mobilize their forces in front of ours," he said. "If they insult us we will tell them, 'God forgive you.' If they beat us we will tell them, 'God forgive you.' "

His speech was punctuated by chants from the crowd: "Labbeik ya Nasrallah" or "We follow you, O Nasrallah."

A member of Parliament for the March 14th coalition, Akram Chehayeb, dismissed Sheik Nasrallah's statements as nothing more than propaganda, saying his was "a decision to fulfill Iran's wishes."

He showed no sign that the coalition would back down to the demands of Hezbollah and its alliance. He also said there would be counterdemonstrations, illustrating just how entrenched the sides are.

"The government will not prevent them from practicing their democratic right if their protests remain peaceful, but if they attack public or private property, the security forces will have to interfere to protect the country," Mr. Chehayeb said. "We will defend the government of independence and we will prevent any coup from toppling it."

The Druse leader, Walid Jumblatt, took a position exactly opposite of Sheik Nasrallah's. "The opposition groups are on the verge of announcing a coup in the country," Mr. Jumblatt said Sunday at a televised news conference. "They will start with gradual street protests, then mass demonstrations, then riots and resignation from Parliament. We are until this moment still calling for a compromise."

Hezbollah Urges Mass Protests In Lebanon (AP-Y)

By Hussein Dakroub

AP, November 20, 2006

Hezbollah's leader urged his followers to prepare for mass demonstrations to topple the government if it ignores the militant group's demand to form a national unity coalition.

In a speech broadcast Sunday, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah railed against President Bush's administration, calling Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice a "bloodsucker" and claiming the current Lebanese government is a puppet of Washington.

He did not set a date for the anti-government protests, which he said should be nonviolent. But he told supporters and political allies to get ready to take to Beirut's streets for days or even weeks to force the resignation of the government.

"We, all of us, must be psychologically and morally ready to take to the streets. It is one means for the required movement," Nasrallah said in a speech Saturday which was aired Sunday on Hezbollah's TV station Al-Manar.

"We do not want riots ... We must respect private and public property. We will not allow any clashes even if (anti-Syrian groups) stage a counter street demonstration," he said. "We are capable of taking to the street and staying there for a day, two, or three, or a week, or two or three weeks, or for more or less until we eventually impose by our peaceful, civilized and democratic means the toppling of an illegitimate and unconstitutional government."

Political and sectarian tensions have been mounting in Lebanon as a result of a power struggle between rival factions intensified by Hezbollah's 34-day war with Israel this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0096139

The Shiite guerrilla group, which is backed by Syria and Iran, has demanded the formation of a national unity government that would essentially give it and its allies veto power over major decisions. But negotiations among groups broke down last week, and six Cabinet ministers, including two from Hezbollah, resigned.

Shortly after Nasrallah's speech was broadcast, the sounds of gunfire and fireworks reverberated across Beirut's predominantly Shiite southern suburbs, a Hezbollah stronghold heavily bombarded by Israel during the fighting in July and August.

Nasrallah accused the government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, which is backed by the anti-Syrian parliamentary majority, of falling under the influence of the President Bush's administration. He said the government had become "illegitimate" and "unconstitutional" after the ministers resigned.

"This is the government of Feltman and not the government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora," Nasrallah said, referring to the U.S. Ambassador to Lebanon Jeffrey Feltman who has repeatedly reaffirmed his country's support for the Saniora government. The remark drew applause and chants of "Death to America" from Nasrallah's audience made up of Hezbollah members charged with organizing the protests.

"We want to liberate our country from the hegemony of Ambassador Feltman and the bloodsucker Rice," he said.

Hezbollah has accused Rice and the Bush administration of foiling Arab efforts in the U.N. Security Council to arrange an early cease-fire in Israel-Hezbollah war, claiming Washington wanted to give Israel time to try to destroy Hezbollah's military infrastructure. The fighting ended with a U.N.-brokered cease-fire resolution on Aug. 14 and more than 1,000 people died on both sides of the border.

Lebanon's political crisis has deepened since late October when Nasrallah began threatening mass protests unless Hezbollah's demand for a national unity government was met.

Saniora, backed by the anti-Syrian coalition, has vowed to stay in power and refused to give veto power to Hezbollah and its allies.

Nasrallah repeated his demand for the unity government to include Christian leader Gen. Michel Aoun's faction, a Hezbollah ally, as a way out of the current political deadlock. The move would also reduce the sectarian appearance of the exclusively Shiite group's bid for greater political power.

"We have two options to break the political deadlock: formation of a national unity government in which the country's major political forces participate in an effective way, or early parliamentary elections," he said.

But Nasrallah insisted he was not trying to cause radical change.

"Come let's form a national unity government. ... Nobody is raising arms, nobody is making a coup or popular revolution," he said.

The demonstrations are not aimed at changing the ruling system or causing a "radical political coup" in Lebanon, he said. "All we want is to have a national government that will not make Lebanon an American or an Israeli tool."

Nasrallah ruled out civil war, undermining Lebanon's stability or Sunni-Shiite strife, all of which he said were "red lines" Hezbollah would not cross.

Washington has accused Hezbollah backers Iran and Syria of seeking to topple the Saniora government and attempting to block the formation of an international tribunal to prosecute the suspected killers of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Both Iran and Syria have denied the charges.

The Lebanese government last week approved the draft agreement for the tribunal's formation, and the U.N. Security Council was expected to discuss the draft on Monday. Lebanon's pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud opposed the Cabinet's decision, saying it lacked legitimacy after the ministers resigned.

Hariri was killed with 22 others in a suicide truck bombing in February 2005. The assassination sparked huge protests against Syria, which was widely seen as culpable. Syria denies it was behind the killing.

India, Too, Tests A Medium-Range Missile (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096140

BHUBANESHWAR, India, Nov. 19 (AP) — India on Sunday successfully test-fired a medium-range missile capable of carrying nuclear warheads days after its rival, Pakistan, had launched a similar missile.

The Indian missile, called the Prithvi, was fired into the Bay of Bengal from a test range in Chandipur in the eastern state of Orissa, a Defense Ministry official said, speaking on condition of anonymity under ministry rules. The test came three days after Pakistan carried out a similar test of its nuclear-capable Ghauri missile, also known as the Hatf-5.

The two countries recently concluded a crucial round of peace talks in New Delhi in an effort to resolve their differences, including the thorny issue of their territorial dispute over the Himalayan region of Kashmir. India and Pakistan have fought three wars, two over Kashmir, since 1947.

The missile test Sunday was "routine" and "part of the country's air defense exercises," an unidentified official said, according to the Press Trust of India news agency.

India routinely test-fires missiles it is developing for military use, as does Pakistan.

A Pakistan Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, said Sunday that India had informed Pakistan ahead of time, as is its standard procedure.

On Saturday, district authorities in Chandipur evacuated about 2,750 villagers living near the testing range to two large shelters about a mile away, the news agency said.

Britain And Pakistan To Work More Closely (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 19 — Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan agreed Sunday to strengthen their nations' cooperation on counterterrorism and other fields, and they stressed the need for political and economic measures along with the use of military force to bring peace in Afghanistan.

The two leaders met in the eastern city of Lahore on the second day of Mr. Blair's visit to Pakistan. At a news conference, Mr. Blair said relations between Pakistan and Britain were at "their highest point."

"We also discussed the work that we are doing together in counterterrorism, which again is improving and strengthening," Mr. Blair said.

Afghanistan figured prominently in the talks held by Mr. Blair and General Musharraf. Pakistan's support and willingness to curb resurgent Taliban activity in Afghanistan is essential and often emblematic of what Mr. Blair called "the tremendous challenges" that confront other countries in stabilizing Afghanistan.

Mr. Blair also said that a lasting resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was essential to defeating extremism.

General Musharraf brushed off criticism from Afghanistan and the West that Pakistan was not doing enough to curb cross-border infiltration by fighters linked to the Taliban, Afghanistan's ousted rulers.

Saying that his country was doing more than was expected and "suffered 600 dead," General Musharraf said: "The Taliban problem is an Afghan problem. The solution lies in what you do in Afghanistan, not what you do in Pakistan. The battle has to be won on the Afghan side."

General Musharraf said millions of dollars should be poured in for development in the southeastern part of Afghanistan, "which is under turmoil at the moment."

He also defended his government's policy of entering peace agreements with local militants sympathetic to the Taliban, in the rugged semiautonomous tribal regions that straddle Afghanistan. He suggested that this model should be replicated in Afghanistan with "those elements who want peace."

Mr. Blair said more work needed to be done.

"In fairness, we should say that the cooperation with Pakistan in dealing over these issues has been transformed over these past few years," he said. "There is no doubt about that, at all. Of course, everyone always wants more to be done."

Britain has about 5,000 troops in Afghanistan, part of the 31,000 NATO-led forces. NATO officials have repeatedly complained that the Taliban find safe haven in Pakistan after mounting attacks against British and NATO troops inside Afghanistan.

Mr. Blair's visit included an assistance package intended to revamp the country's religious schools, which are often criticized for fomenting militancy and intolerance.

Britain and Pakistan signed a long-term partnership arrangement to reduce poverty and help Pakistan achieve United Nations goals for development. Under the agreement, the British government will provide 480 million pounds, or about $900 million, in the next three years through Britain's Department for International Development.

The two countries agreed to increase cooperation between their intelligence services to combat terrorism, illegal immigration and transnational organized crime.

Britain has offered support in countering terrorism, including forensic training, investigating the financing of terrorism and sharing crisis management expertise, a joint statement released by the Pakistani Foreign Office said.

Britain plans to deliver two MI-17 helicopters in April to the Pakistani antinarcotics force for their antismuggling operation along the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

During his visit, Mr. Blair also met with Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and with moderate Islamic religious leaders and went to the Faisal Mosque.

6 Ethiopians Are Killed In Somalia Ambush (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Nov. 19 (AP) — Islamic fighters ambushed an Ethiopian military convoy on Sunday, killing six Ethiopian soldiers and wounding 20 others, witnesses said, in the first known fight between the rival forces maneuvering for control in Somalia.

Two Ethiopian trucks were destroyed by land mines before Islamic fighters opened fire on the convoy, which witnesses said was made up of more than 80 vehicles and headed for Baidoa, the headquarters of the so-called transitional government. The attack occurred about 50 miles southwest of Baidoa.

Sheik Abdirahim Ali Mudey, a spokesman for the Islamic Courts Union, which controls the capital, Mogadishu, and much of southern Somalia, said four Ethiopian trucks were destroyed and some soldiers were killed, but he denied that his group was responsible. He described the fighting as "a popular uprising" by villagers opposed to Ethiopian troops in Somalia.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew Mohamed Siad Barre, then turned on one another. The interim government, formed two years ago, controls just one town.

Terror's Playground (TIME)

By Sam Dealey

Time, November 27, 2006

On a dusty side street in Somalia's former capital, there's little that distinguishes Mohammed's stall from the others. A grenade rests against a box of ammunition next to a row of AK-47s, and still more rifles hang from nails beneath a patch of tin roofing. His booth occupies prime real estate in the center of Mogadishu's Bakaraaha Arms Market, and he obsessively polishes his guns with an oil-stained rag in a battle against sand and grit. But few passersby show interest. Once one of the most bustling, bristling arms bazaars in the world, the Mogadishu weapons market is weathering a down cycle, with business a mere fraction of what it was in the days when warlords settled internecine grudges in the city's streets. Mohammed's average daily sales have dropped from 15 AKs to just three--and prices have fallen by almost half, to $300. "The only good job was selling guns," says Mohammed, 24. "Now I don't know what I'll do."

In most strife-torn parts of the world, a bear market for weapons would be cause for relief. But tranquillity rarely lasts long in Somalia. Since the overthrow of dictator Mohammed Siad Barre in 1991, the country has been a byword for dysfunction, less a nation-state than a destitute, unremittingly violent land ruled by the barrel of a gun. Last June the warlords' grip on power was finally broken by a dedicated confederacy of fundamentalist Muslim militias that fought their way into the former capital and sent the warlords fleeing.

Since then, the Muslim militias, which call themselves the Islamic Courts Union (ICU), have consolidated their claim to Mogadishu and expanded their control to include most of Somalia, particularly the fertile lands and strategic ports in the country's south. Meanwhile, the U.N.-backed transitional government is unraveling. Confined to the squalid town of Baidoa near the Ethiopian border, the government is dependent on foreign money and security and crippled by internal dissent and mass resignations.

The fear is that Somalia, a country with nearly 9 million Muslims and one that the U.S. has long suspected is a haven for al-Qaeda, may fall further into the hands of Islamic fundamentalists sympathetic to terrorist organizations. A report by the U.N.-chartered watchdog group on Somalia, which was submitted to the U.N Security Council last week, says the ICU has developed extensive ties with groups and states steeped in terrorism.

The report states that the ICU sent "approximately a 720-person-strong military force to Lebanon to fight alongside Hizballah against the Israeli military" during this summer's monthlong war. In exchange, Hizballah's leadership "has made arrangements" for governments like Iran's and Syria's to contribute arms and supplies to the ICU. And senior leaders within the ICU, including co-leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, allegedly have direct ties to al-Itihaad al-Islamiya, a radical group suspected of links to al-Qaeda.

Leaders of the ICU deny such allegations, but it's telling that they don't seem particularly bothered by them. "We believe the war against terrorism is a war against Islam," says the hard-line ICU national security chairman, Sheik Yusuf Indahaadde. "Those who are making trouble are not based here." Then, in English, the sheik adds forcefully, "Bush is the mother and father of terrorism."

And yet, in spite of the Islamists' disreputable allies, many Somalis cannot remember a time when they felt safer. For Americans, the single, searing image of Somalia was formed in October 1993, after two U.S. Black Hawk helicopters--part of a U.S. mission to provide humanitarian relief and restore order--were felled by militias loyal to warlord Mohammed Farrah Aidid. Eighteen U.S. special forces were killed, and the world community's involvement in Somalia effectively ended. What followed was a decade and a half of intermittent war that reduced Mogadishu to rubble. Along the "green line," the architectural gem of the former Italian colony that bore the brunt of the warlords' reign, the once proud edifice of the National Bank is obliterated, and only a stone shard remains of the cathedral's twin bell towers.

But over the past few months, there have been glimpses of progress. In the clearings between bullet-pocked buildings and along the city's broad, leafy avenues, children play soccer and a decade's worth of trash is slowly being hauled away. Extortionate militia checkpoints and roving bands of technicals--pickups mounted with heavy artillery and carrying armed thugs--have been replaced by disciplined Islamic troops. The city's ports have reopened, buses travel the roads by day, and Somali families stroll the sidewalks by night. Barring the notable exceptions of a Swedish journalist and an Italian nun who were recently murdered, there's no denying Mogadishu's new semblance of order. "This is an area of the world that we would obviously like to see stable, and [the Islamists] are doing that to some extent," says a Western diplomat. "So if what you see is what you get, then maybe it isn't the worst thing in the world."

The Islamists who control the city occupy a whitewashed compound in Mogadishu. They are eager to present their domination as a fait accompli. "We are ready to be a nation," says Foreign Minister Ibrahim Hassan Addou. "We want Somalia to be peaceful, and we want to establish good relations with the rest of the world." With both hands, he beckons toward the open window in his office. "Feel free to look around," he says. "You can go where you want to go and see what you want to see."

Well, not quite. The Islamists have instituted Taliban-style rules banning drinking, cinemas, dancing and women swimming, as well as curbing the press. Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, the ICU's co-leader, insists these restraints are the product of spontaneous acts of piety by the public. "We don't have any rules issuing from the Islamic Courts to stop any of this," he insists. "The people are doing this by themselves without intervention by us." That seems open to dispute. Just last week, after protests erupted over the shortage of khat, the seemingly ubiquitous narcotic chewed in Somalia, the Islamists ordered a ban on the drug. It's unlikely to go over well. "It's good to stop hashish and harder things," says a man at a khat stall in Mogadishu, "but cigarettes and beer? There will be a day when people say, Wait, they have gone too far. I am sure of it."

The Islamists' takeover is a parable of the unintended consequences of the U.S.'s war on terrorism. After Sept. 11, the U.S. intelligence community, acting on concerns that Somalia's lawlessness could be exploited by al-Qaeda, initiated the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism, a covert program that funneled aid to warlords in return for their assistance in capturing suspected terrorists. One of those warlords approached by U.S. operatives was Osman Hassan Ali Atto. Once a top financier of warlord Aidid--Atto was captured just a week before the downing of the Black Hawks in 1993--he is the last independent warlord in Mogadishu, a testament to his ability to play both sides of the net. Blunt-spoken and avuncular, Atto disparaged the U.S. cash-for-warlords program. "It was a waste of money," he says at his junkyard in Mogadishu, where the rusting hulks of dozers and pavers are still scarred by flak from U.S. missiles some 15 years ago. "I always told them that America's interests [should be] a government that is put in place without the pressure of money. They had their own ambitions to capture certain individuals. But I told them to f___ off. We are not for sale."

But other warlords were. Payments totaling several hundred thousand dollars were funneled to various militia groups, according to U.N. sources. The program was an open secret in Somalia and among the African diplomatic corps, but its only success was to bolster support for the Islamic Courts among a population weary of anarchy and opposed to foreign meddling. "It was a spectacular disaster," says John Prendergast of the International Crisis Group. "Not only were the militia leaders routed, but the U.S. and CIA support for these militias led to strengthened support for the Islamic Courts."

Poorly trained and addled by khat, Mogadishu's bands of thugs were no match for the highly regimented and dedicated Islamic soldiers. After just three months, the warlords were decisively routed this summer. "The warlords, they did not know how to fight," an ICU militia trainer says during a tour of his training camp just outside Mogadishu. "They had the guns and the money and the khat, but they did not have the heart. For many months we have not been paid to fight, whether in money or in khat. We fight with our hearts."

Those aren't their only weapons. The U.N. watchdog report circulated to the Security Council last week says Syria has equipped and trained the ICU military. On July 27, the report says, "200 fighters from the ICU were transported by aircraft to Syria to undergo military training in guerrilla warfare." The report also says a Syrian plane delivered a "large quantity" of arms, including surface-to-air missiles, to the ICU in early September. On at least two occasions, Iran supplied the ICU with arms, including a shipment on July 25 of 1,000 machine guns and grenade launchers, an unknown quantity of mines and ammunition, and 45 shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles.

In mid-August, a large dhow originating in Iran and carrying arms, medical supplies and food arrived at a Mogadishu seaport. Included in the shipment were 80 man-portable surface-to-air missiles and launchers. The U.N. also charges that "at the time of writing of this report, there were two Iranians in Dhusa Mareb engaged on matters linked to the exploration of uranium in exchange for arms to the ICU." In separate letters written to the U.N., Syria and Iran denied having any involvement.

Foreign diplomats warn that the arms buildup may be a prelude to a wider war. Despite being sidelined by the Islamists, the transitional government still enjoys the full-throated backing of the international community and is being armed to the teeth by neighboring Ethiopia--a necessary violation of the country's arms embargo if the transitional government is to survive, but hardly endearing to most Somalis, for whom Ethiopia is a blood enemy. Meanwhile, Ethiopia's main rival in the region, Eritrea, has funneled arms and forces to the ICU. Peace talks between the Islamists and the transitional government have largely collapsed, and skirmishes are increasing.

The African Union plans to deploy some 7,000 African peacekeepers to keep the two sides at bay. But the Islamists have made clear they will consider this an act of war. "If they come, we will view them as invading troops," said Ahmed. "And we are ready to defend ourselves because we are not ready to be colonized again by any sort of troops in the world." Without those peacekeepers, however, the two sides seem destined to clash. A face-off would surely drag Ethiopia and Eritrea into a proxy--if not outright--war. The Islamists' stated aim to unite all of Somalia is believed to include the secular breakaway territories of Puntland and Somaliland, as well as portions of Kenya and Ethiopia. Once fighting has begun, there's little to prevent Somalia from becoming a conflict that could engulf the Horn of Africa, cause horrific loss of life and create the continent's next major humanitarian crisis.

With those storm clouds gathering, the Islamists in Mogadishu are intent on solidifying their hold on power, dispensing their harsh brand of justice and leaving no doubt about who's in control. A reminder of that came on a clear blue morning in mid-October, when thousands of Somalis gathered at the parade ground of the old police barracks on the city's battered coast. Guards led a tall, undernourished man, condemned to death for killing another man, to a clearing in the center. After a reading from the Koran, the man conducted his ablutions, said a prayer and was led to a post facing eight soldiers in balaclavas and armed with AKs. His hands and feet were tied and his eyes blindfolded. With the bright blue sea behind him and puffy white clouds above, and to the jubilant shouts of Allahu akbar (God is great) from the crowd, the man's head and stomach were ripped by bullets.

The Passion Of The Pope (TIME)

By David Van Biema, Jeff Israely

Time, November 27, 2006

For the traveling Pontiff, it was not a laid-back Turkish holiday. The citizens of the proud, predominantly Muslim nation had no love of Popes. To the East, the Iranian government was galvanizing anti-Western feeling. The news reported that an escaped killer was on the loose, threatening to assassinate the Pontiff when he arrived. Yet the Holy Father was undaunted. "Love is stronger than danger," he said. "I am in the hands of God." He fared forward--to Ankara, to Istanbul--and preached the commonality of the world's great faiths. He enjoined both Christians and Muslims to "seek ties of friendship with other believers who invoke the name of a single God." He did not leave covered with garlands, but he set a groundwork for what would be years of rapprochement between the Holy See and Islam. He was a uniter, not a divider.

That was 1979 and Pope John Paul II. But when Benedict XVI travels to Turkey next week on his first visit to a Muslim country since becoming Pope last year, he is unlikely to cloak himself in a downy banner of brotherhood, the way his predecessor did 27 years ago. Instead, Benedict, 79, will arrive carrying a different reputation: that of a hard-knuckle intellect with a taste for blunt talk and interreligious confrontation. Just 19 months into his tenure, the Pope has become as much a moral lightning rod as a theologian; suddenly, when he speaks, the whole world listens. And so what takes place over four days in three Turkish cities has the potential to define his papacy--and a good deal more.

Few people saw this coming. Nobody truly expected Benedict to be a mere caretaker Pope--his sometimes ferocious 24-year tenure as the Vatican's theological enforcer and John Paul's right hand suggested anything but passivity. But this same familiarity argued against surprises. The new Pontiff was expected to sustain John Paul's conservative line on morality and church discipline and focus most of his energies on trimming the Vatican bureaucracy and battling Western culture's "moral relativism." Although acknowledged as a brilliant conservative theologian, Benedict lacked the open-armed charisma of his predecessor. Moreover, what had initially propelled John Paul to the center of the world stage was his challenge to communism and its subsequent fall, a huge geopolitical event that the Pope helped precipitate with two exhilarating visits to his beloved Polish homeland. By contrast, what could Benedict do? Liberate Bavaria?

Well, not quite. But this year he has emerged as a far more compelling and complex figure than anyone had imagined. And much of that has to do with his willingness to confront what some people feel is today's equivalent of the communist scourge--the threat of Islamic violence. The topic is extraordinarily fraught. There are, after all, a billion or so nonviolent Muslims on the globe, the Roman Catholic Church's own record in the religious-mayhem department is hardly pristine, and even the most naive of observers understands that the Vicar of Christ might harbor an institutional prejudice against one of Christianity's main global competitors. But by speaking out last September in Regensburg, Germany, about the possible intrinsic connection between Islam and violence, the Pontiff suddenly became a lot more interesting. Even when Islamic extremists destroyed several churches and murdered a nun in Somalia, Benedict refused to retract the essence of his remarks. In one imperfect but powerful stroke, he departed from his predecessor's largely benign approach to Islam and discovered an issue that might attract even the most religiously jaded. In doing so, he managed (for better or worse) to reanimate the clash-of-civilizations discussion by focusing scrutiny on the core question of whether Islam, as a religion, sanctions violence. He was hailed by cultural conservatives worldwide. Says Helen Hull Hitchcock, a St. Louis, Mo., lay leader who heads the conservative Catholic organization Women for Faith and Family: "He has said what needed to be said."

But Benedict now finds himself in an unfamiliar position as he embarks on the most important mission of his papacy. Having thrust himself to the center of the global debate and earned the vilification of the Muslim street, he must weigh hard options. Does he seize his new platform, insisting that another great faith has potentially deadly flaws and daring it to discuss them, while exhorting Western audiences to be morally armed? Or does he back away from further confrontation in the hope of tamping down the rage his words have already provoked? Those who know him say he was clearly shocked and appalled by the violent reaction to the Germany speech. Yet it seems unlikely that he will completely drop the topic and the megaphone he has discovered he is holding. "The Pope has the intention to say what he thinks," says a high-ranking Vatican diplomat. "He may adjust his tone, but his direction won't change."

APPOINTMENT IN ANKARA

If the test of a new act is to see how well it plays in a tough room, Benedict has certainly booked himself into a doozy. In the racial memory of Western Europe, the Turks were the face of militant Islam, besieging Vienna in 1529 and 1683 and for centuries thereafter representing a kind of stock bogeyman. In 2002, after nearly a century of determinedly secularist rule, the country elected a moderate Islamist party. For many in the West, that makes Turkey simultaneously a symbol of hope (of moderation) and fear (of Islamism).

The Pope's original invitation came in 2005, from the Ecumenical Patriarch of the Eastern Orthodox Church, which represents a nervous 0.01% of the country's population. The Turkish government, miffed that as a Cardinal, Joseph Ratzinger had opposed Turkey's urgent bid to join the European Union, finally issued its own belated offer for 2006. But even now, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has discovered a previous engagement that will take him out of the country while Benedict is in it. Although modest, sales of a Turkish novel subtitled Who Will Kill the Pope in Istanbul? (the book fingers everyone but Islamists) have increased as his trip approaches. The country is expected to place about 22,000 policemen on the streets of Istanbul while he is there. "This is a very high-risk visit," says Cengiz Aktar, a Turkish political scientist. "There is a vocal nationalist movement here, and there is the Pope, a man who likes to play with fire."

Actually, Benedict will probably try to stay away from matches during his successive stops in Ankara, Ephesus and Istanbul. Speculation about what the Pope will say and do on this visit has consumed Rome for weeks. Papal watchers say Benedict cannot out-Regensburg himself, but gauzy talk about the compatibility of Christianity and Islam isn't likely either. Over the course of his career, Benedict has been averse to reciting multifaith platitudes, an aversion that has sharpened as he has focused on Islam. And that's what could make his coming encounter with the Muslim world, says David Gibson, author of The Rule of Benedict, either "a step toward religious harmony or toward holy war."

A BRIGHT-LINES KIND OF GUY

In 1986, Pope John Paul convened a remarkable multifaith summit in the medieval Italian town of Assisi. Muslims and Sikhs, Zoroastrians and the Archbishop of Canterbury, among others, convened to celebrate their (distinct) spiritualities and pray for peace. It was a signature John Paul moment, but not everybody caught the vibe. "It was a disaster," sniffs an observer. "People were praying together, and nobody had any idea what they were praying to." The witness, whose view undoubtedly reflected that of his boss, was an aide to Cardinal Ratzinger.

Unlike John Paul, who had a big-tent approach, Ratzinger has always favored bright theological lines and correspondingly high walls between creeds he regards as unequally meritorious. His long-standing habit is to correct any aide who calls a religion other than Christianity or Judaism a "faith." Prior to his papacy, the culmination of this philosophy was his office's 1999 Vatican document Dominus Jesus, which described non-Catholics as being in a "gravely deficient situation" regarding salvation. The fact that this offended some of the deficient parties did not particularly bother him. Notes the same assistant: "To understand each other ... you have to talk about what divides."

That approach includes Islam. In Ratzinger's 1996 interview book Salt of the Earth (with Peter Seewald), he noted that "we must recognize that Islam is not a uniform thing. No one can speak for [it] as a whole. There is a noble Islam, embodied, for example, by the King of Morocco, and there is also the extremist, terrorist Islam, which, again, one must not identify with Islam as a whole, which would do it an injustice." This sophisticated understanding, however, did not keep Ratzinger from slapping down a bishop who wanted to invite peaceable Muslims to a papal ceremony in Fatima, Portugal, or, in 2004, from objecting to Turkish E.U. entry on grounds that it has always been "in permanent contrast to Europe," a contrast his other writings made clear had much to do with religion.

Islam played a particular role--as both a threat and a model--in the drama that probably lies closest to Benedict's heart: the secularization of Christian Europe. In the same 1996 book, he wrote that "the Islamic soul reawakened" in reaction to the erosion of the West's moral stature during the 1960s. Ratzinger paraphrased that soul's new song: "We know who we are; our religion is holding its ground; you don't have one any longer. We have a moral message that has existed without interruption since the prophets, and we will tell the world how to live it, where the Christians certainly can't."

After Sept. 11, Ratzinger's attitude toward Islam seems to have hardened. According to Gibson, the Cardinals in the conclave that elected Ratzinger made it clear that they expected a tougher dialogue with the other faith. After the London subway bombings in July 2005, the new Pope responded to the question of whether Islam was a "religion of peace"--as George W. Bush, among others, has always stressed-- by saying, "Certainly there are also elements that can favor peace." When he met with moderate German Muslims in the city of Cologne that August, Benedict delivered a fairly blunt warning that "those who instigate and plan these attacks evidently wish to poison our relations." In Rome, he removed Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, a relatively dovish Islam expert, as head of the Vatican's office on interreligious dialogue and replaced an ongoing study of Christian violence during the Crusades with one on Islamic violence today. And he has stepped up the Vatican's insistence on reciprocity--demanding the same rights for Christians in Muslim-majority countries that Muslims enjoy in the West.

All of this led observers to expect him to eventually make a major statement about Islam, although most assumed that it wouldn't stray too far from John Paul's fraternal tone. Nobody anticipated what happened in southern Germany.

THE POINT OF NO RETURN

On Sept. 12, 2006, the day after the world had marked the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, Benedict threw himself into the maelstrom. The unlikely venue was his old teaching grounds, the University of Regensburg. His vehicle was a talk about reason as part of Christianity's very essence. His nominal target was his usual suspect, the secular West, which he said had committed the tragic error of discarding Christianity as reason-free. But this time he had an additional villain in his sights: Islam, which he said actually did undervalue rationality and which he strongly suggested was consequently more inclined to violence.

To show that Islam sees God as so transcendent that reason is extraneous, Benedict cited an 11th century Muslim sage named Ibn Hazm. To establish the connection between this position and violence, he quoted a 15th century Christian Byzantine Emperor (and head of the Byzantine, or Eastern, Church) named Manuel II Paleologus. Paleologus criticized Muslims for "spreading [their faith] by the sword," both because "God is not pleased by blood" and because true conversion depended on reason. "Show me just what the Muhammad brought that was new," Paleologus said, in a passage quoted by Benedict, "and there you will find things only evil and inhuman."

It remains unclear whether Benedict was deliberately trying to raise the temperature. Many analysts, especially in Rome, think he knew exactly what he was saying and regard the Islamic section of the 35-min. speech as a brave and eloquent warning of Islam's inherent violence and of a faithless West's inability to offer moral response. Yet Benedict's argument was slapdash and flawed. His sage, Ibn Hazm, turned out to have belonged to a school with no current adherents, and although reason's primacy is debated in Islam, it is very much part of the culture that developed algebra. Paleologus' forced-conversion accusation misrepresents the sweep of Muslim history, since more often than not, Islam has left religious groups in conquered territory intact, if hobbled. And assuming that a punctilious scholar like Benedict really wanted to engage on Islam and violence, why do it through the idiosyncratic lens of an embattled king in the 1400s who made his name partly for his efforts at drumming up enthusiasm for a new Crusade?

The reaction to the speech was intense. Small bands of Muslim thugs burned Benedict in effigy, attacked the churches in the Middle East and, on Sept. 17, murdered the nun in Somalia. Over the course of a month, Benedict issued a series of partial apologies and corrections unprecedented in the papacy. He expressed regret to those offended, summoned a group of Muslim notables to make the point personally and disowned the "evil and inhuman" slur on Muhammad as Manuel's sentiment but not his own. He even issued a second version of the speech to reflect those sentiments.

But he never retracted his more basic association of Islam with unreason and violence. Indeed, if he had, it would have caused considerable confusion--if only because the behavior of the extremists seemed, at least to some, to prove his point. No editorialist could express frustration with him for initiating the row without condemning the subsequent carnage--and a good many decided his only fault was in speaking truth. Says a high-ranking Western diplomat in Rome: "It was time to let the rabbit out of the can, and he did. I admire his courage. Part of the Koran lends itself to being shanghaied by terrorists, and he can do what politicians can't." In late October, Benedict received a different kind of validation in an open "Your Holiness" letter from 38 of the best-known names in Islamic theology. The missive politely eviscerated his Regensburg speech but went on to "applaud" the Pope's "efforts to oppose the dominance of positivism and materialism in human life" and expressed a desire for "frank and sincere dialogue." At a time when the credibility of Western political leaders in the Muslim world has sunk to new depths, the letter treated Benedict as a spokesman for the West.

Says a Vatican insider with a shrug: "Everyone's asking, Did the Pope make a mistake? Was it intentional? It doesn't really matter at this point." Whether Benedict had actually intended Regensburg to be the catalyst, he had become a player.

THE PAPAL MEGAPHONE

After Regensburg, the mainstream Italian daily La Stampa ran the headline THE POPE AND BUSH ALLIED AGAINST TERROR. The association with the Iraq war and U.S. interrogation methods must have horrified the Pontiff, if only because it could undermine the church's honest-broker role in regional conflicts. "It's easy to say, 'Go Benedict! Hit the Muslims!'" says Gibson. "But that's not who he is. He is not a Crusader." Shortly before Regensburg, Benedict had endured Western criticism for repeatedly demanding a cease-fire after Israel's invasion of Lebanon. Angelo Cardinal Scola, a protÃ©gÃ© of the Pope's who edits Oasis, a Church quarterly on dialogue with Islam, says the fact "that radical Islam can turn to violence does not mean we must respond with a crusade."

The Pope's pursuit of his newfound calling as Islamic interlocutor will be tricky, theologically and politically. Unlike the holy books of Judaism and Christianity, the Koran and Hadiths contain verses precisely regulating the conduct of war and exhorting Muslims to wage battle against various enemies. The bellicosity of some Koranic passages owes much to the fact that they were written at a time when Muslims were engaged in almost constant warfare to defend their religion. But when suicide bombers today go to their fates with the Koran's verses on their lips, it invites questions about Islam's credentials as a religion that is willing to police its own claims of peace and tolerance. As conservative Catholic scholar Michael Novak points out, the Vatican's pacifism gives Benedict unmatched moral standing to press this point. "Being against war, he can say tougher things ... than any President or Prime Minister can. His role is to represent Western civilization."

Perhaps so, but then he might have to represent its past as well, including all the historical violence done in Jesus' name (despite the Gospels' pacifism). Discussion of Christianity's dark hours has not been his penchant. Moreover, the position Benedict took in Regensburg--that Islam and violence are indeed essentially connected--worked as an opening gambit but doesn't leave much room for either side to maneuver. People asked to flatly renounce their Holy Writ generally don't. And Benedict has little give--because first, he seldom says anything he is not prepared to defend to the bitter end and second, if he retreats now, he risks being accused of the same moral relativism that he rails against.

Still, many Catholics are rooting for him to come up with a way to engage without enraging. The widely read Catholic blogger Amy Welborn says, "I think there's a pretty widespread fed-up-ness with Islamic sensitivity. I agree that elements of Islam that either explicitly espouse violence or are less than aggressive in combatting it need to be challenged and nudged, [just as] I would like to see the Pope continue to challenge and nudge people of all different religions--Christian and non-Christian--to look at the suffering of people." She thinks that, given the heat he's taking in parts of the Islamic world, his willingness to go through with his Turkish trip is "so brave."

But what should he do while he's there? John Esposito, a respected Islam scholar at Georgetown University, says the Pope can't confine himself to meetings with Christian leaders. "He must address the Muslim majority." Seyyed Hossein Nasr, a professor at George Washington University and one of the 38 signatories to the October letter to Benedict, says the Pope should deliver an "earnest expression of commonality"--even if it's only the widely accepted observation that Judaism, Christianity and Islam all claim descent from the biblical figure of Abraham. Father Richard McBrien, a theologian at Notre Dame, says that "if he doesn't bring up the issue of reciprocal respect for Christian minorities, he's not doing his job," but that he should avoid an absolutist, now-or-never stance.

High-ranking Vatican sources say Benedict will avoid repeating the Islam-and-violence trope in any form as blatant as Regensburg's. Instead, suggests Father Thomas Reese, a senior research fellow at the Woodstock Theological Center in Washington, an independent nonprofit institute at Georgetown, the Pope may take a less broad-brush approach to the issue by repeating his sentiment from Cologne: "He could say, 'You, like me, are concerned about terrorism' and he would like to see Islamic clerics be more up front condemning it." Once over the hump, happier topics should be easy to find. "Quite frankly," says Reese, "the Pope and the Muslims are on the same page on abortion. They [agree on] relativism and consumerism, hedonistic culture, sex and violence, Palestinian rights." Conceivably, like John Paul's first journey back to communist Poland, Benedict's simple presence in this Muslim land may speak louder than words.

Whether this is the way Benedict will choose to proceed remains to be seen. But whatever he does, bold or subtle, the explosiveness of the current relationship between Islam and the West will require him to become a diplomat as much as a scholar. As he strives to assume that role, holding out an olive branch to other religions while fiercely defending his own, the Pope may want to consider the story of a much earlier walker of the Catholic-Islamic tightrope. In the 13th century, during the middle of the Fifth Crusade, St. Francis of Assisi briefly departed Italy and journeyed to the Holy Land to evangelize to the Muslims. According to Christian traditions, he preached the gospel to the Sultan, only to be told that Muslims were as convinced of the truth of Islam as Francis was of Christianity. At that, Francis proposed that he and a Muslim walk through a fire to test whose faith was stronger. The Sultan said he didn't know whether he could locate a volunteer. Francis said he would walk through the fire by himself. Impressed with Francis' devotion, the Sultan, while maintaining his own faith, agreed to a truce between the two warring sides.

Francis' precise methods may be a bit outdated. But 800 years later, his mixture of flexibility and tenacity could be a useful paradigm for a frank and sincere dialogue in an ever turbulent religious world. What The Pope Gets Right ... (TIME)

By Richard John Neuhaus

Time, November 27, 2006

Benedict XVI's journey to Istanbul, formerly Constantinople, is laden with the wounds of history both ancient and painfully contemporary. The Pope's controversial Sept. 12 lecture in Regensburg, Germany, quoted a 14th century exchange between a Byzantine Christian Emperor and a Muslim intellectual in which the Emperor made some distinctly uncomplimentary observations about Islam. The Pope admitted that the Emperor's statement was brusque. But his point in reaching so far back into history was to demonstrate that problems between the Christian West and Islam long precede today's "war on terrorism."

Although the West, and most notably Europe, may be less Christian today, Muslims still view it as the Christian West. For a thousand years, from the days of Muhammad in the 7th century, Islam enjoyed a run of triumphant conquest, interrupted only momentarily by the Christian Crusades. The time of conquest lasted until the failed siege of Vienna in 1683. After Vienna, and most dramatically under 19th and 20th century Western colonialism, Islam was sidelined from history--one of the main sources of the rage and resentment of today's jihadists.

The jihadists believe their time of resumed conquest has come. Through terrorism and the mass immigration of Muslims in Europe, the jihadists are pressing for the reversal of the military outcome of 1683. This is the context in which Benedict attempted to make a larger point at Regensburg. He acknowledged that Christians have sometimes had a problem, and he suggested that Muslims still have a problem, in understanding the relationship between faith and coercion. Violence, said the Pope, is the enemy of reason. Violence has no place in the advancing of religion. To act against reason is to act against the nature of God.

The violent responses to the Pope's speech reflect the belief of jihadist groups, such as al-Qaeda, that their religion mandates the use of any means necessary, including suicide bombers and the mass killing of civilians, to bring about the world's submission to Islam. In an Oct. 12 "Open Letter to His Holiness Pope Benedict XVI," 38 distinguished Islamic religious authorities, including Grand Muftis in Turkey, Egypt, Russia, Syria, Kosovo, Bosnia and Uzbekistan, wrote that "jihad ... means struggle, and specifically struggle in the way of God. This struggle may take many forms, including the use of force." The signers delicately criticized some acts of Muslim terrorism, such as the killing of a nun in Somalia, but failed to address the relationship between religion and politics in Islam, or whether the "maintenance of sovereignty" includes, as radical jihadists claim, the violent reconquest of Western lands that were once Muslim. Whether out of conviction or fear of being targeted by terrorists, the 38 did not frontally reject the linkage between violence and the advance of Islam.

Nonetheless, the open letter was framed in respectful terms and was welcomed at the Vatican. It is noteworthy, however, that the Pope has not retreated from his challenge to Islam. Moreover, under his leadership, the Vatican has taken a much stronger line in insisting on "reciprocity" in relations with Islam. Mosques proliferate throughout cities in the West, while any expression of non-Islamic religion is strictly forbidden in many Muslim countries. In the Vatican and elsewhere, the feeling has been growing that the way of tolerance, dialogue and multicultural sensitivity can no longer be a one-way street. In fact, that shift predates Benedict's papacy. In his 1994 book, Crossing the Threshold of Hope, John Paul II said complimentary things about the piety of Muslims. But John Paul concluded his discussion of Islam with this: "For [these reasons] not only the theology but also the anthropology of Islam is very distant from Christianity."

The theology has to do with the relationship between faith and reason, the anthropology with the dignity of the human person that requires a free and uncoerced response to truth, including religious truth. God ("Allah" in Arabic), Benedict contends, should be viewed not as an arbitrary ruler who issues capricious commands but as the Divine Reason that human beings, through reason and freedom, are invited to share. Speaking for the Catholic Church, which includes over half of the more than 2 billion Christians in the world, Benedict says that, in matters of religion, violence is the enemy of reason, and to act against reason is to act against God. Challenging the leaders of the more than 1 billion Muslims in the world, he asks them to join in that affirmation.

... And Where He's Still In The Dark (TIME)

By Tariq Ramadan

Time, November 27, 2006

Since delivering the speech in which he quoted a 14th century Emperor who said the Prophet of Islam had given nothing positive to humanity and had commanded followers to use violence to spread their faith, Pope Benedict XVI has been subjected to bitter Muslim reaction around the world. Benedict has responded by saying he regretted the consequences of his misunderstood words, but he did not retract his statement--perhaps rightly so. After all, he had simply cited an ancient Emperor. It is Benedict's right to exercise his critical opinion without being expected to apologize for it--whether he's an ordinary Roman Catholic or the Pope.

But that doesn't mean he was right. Muslim attention has focused mainly on the lecture's association between violence and Islam, but the most important and disputable aspect of it was Benedict's reflection on what it means to be European. In his speech at Regensburg, the Pope attempted to set out a European identity that is Christian by faith and Greek by philosophical reason. But Benedict's speech implicitly suggested that he believes that Islam has no such relationship with reason--and thus is excluded from being European. Several years ago, the Pope, then Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, set forth his opposition to the integration of Turkey into Europe in similar terms. Muslim Turkey has never been, and never will be, able to claim an authentically European culture, he contended. It is another thing; it is the Other.

As I have written before, this profoundly European Pope is inviting the people of his continent to become aware of the central, inescapable character of Christianity within their identity, or risk losing it. That may be a legitimate goal, but Benedict's narrow definition of European identity is deeply troubling and potentially dangerous. This is what Muslims must respond to: the tendency of Westerners to ignore the critical role that Muslims played in the development of Western thought. Those who "forget" the decisive contributions of rationalist Muslim thinkers like al-Farabi (10th century), Avicenna (11th century), Averroes (12th century), al-Ghazali (12th century), Ash-Shatibi (13th century) and Ibn Khaldun (14th century) are reconstructing a Europe that is not only an illusion but also self-deceptive about its past.

What the West needs most today is not so much a dialogue with other civilizations but an honest dialogue with itself--one that acknowledges those traditions within Western civilization that are almost never recognized. Europe, in particular, must learn to reconcile itself with the diversity of its past in order to master the coming pluralism of its future.

The Pope's visit to Turkey presents an opportunity to put forward the true terms of the debate over the relationship between Islam and the West. First, it is necessary to stop presenting this visit as if it were a trip to a country whose religion and culture are alien to Europe. Selective about its past, Europe is becoming blind to its present. The European continent has been home to a sizable population of Muslims for centuries. While visiting Turkey, the Pope must acknowledge that he is encountering not a potential threat but a mirror. Islam is already a European religion.

Rather than focus on differences, the true dialogue between the Pope and Islam, and between secularized societies and Islamic ones, should emphasize our common, universal values: mutual respect of human rights, basic freedoms, rule of law and democracy. Though most of the media attention is directed at a marginal minority of radicals, millions of European Muslims are quietly proving every day that they can live perfectly well in secular societies and share a strong ethical pedestal with Jews, Christians and atheist humanists.

Let us hope that the Pope will be able to transform his former perception of the threat of "the Other," of Islam, into a more open approach--by strongly highlighting the ethical teachings the religions have in common and the ways they can contribute together to the future of a pluralistic Europe. Benedict XVI should be free to express his opinions without risk of impassioned denunciation. But the least one can expect from the Pope--especially in this difficult era of fear and suspicion--is that he help bridge the divide and create new spaces of confidence and trust.

Observers: Sudan Gov't Strikes N. Darfur (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, November 20, 2006

A large force of Sudanese soldiers backed by allied janjaweed militiamen is sweeping through North Darfur, killing civilians and looting and burning villages in violation of a cease-fire agreement, international observers and rebels said Sunday.

At least four civilians were killed near the northern town of Birmaza on Sunday, said Youssouf Mussabal, a rebel leader in the area. Some 200 pro-government janjaweed fighters riding camels had moved into the zone, backed by mobile army units and the Sudanese air force, he added.

"The janjaweed are still in the town. We're worried for the population," Mussabal told The Associated Press by telephone from North Darfur.

Another rebel field commander from a separate faction said seven villages were looted and burned to the ground around Birmaza on Sunday. Jar al-Naby said the renewed government offensive began earlier this week, and that two civilians were killed in Friday raids.

Hundreds of heads of cattle have also been rounded and brought back to the Sudanese army headquarters in the North Darfur town of Mellit, he said by phone from Darfur.

A senior U.N. official in North Darfur said Sunday international observers were receiving daily reports of raids and casualties throughout this vast area of semi-desert pastureland north of the regional capital of El Fasher.

"The campaign is ongoing, and we are being given very limited access to investigate or treat casualties," the official said on the phone from North Darfur. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

The African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur said in a statement Saturday it had received reports that the Sudanese air force twice bombed Birmaza this week. The attacks, conducted jointly with armed militia groups, took a "heavy toll on the civilian population," the AU said.

The statement said the attacks were a "flagrant violation" of the Darfur Peace Agreement, signed in May by the government and one rebel group.

The Sudanese military was not immediately available for comment Sunday. Earlier this week, however, the army denied it was conducting an offensive in North Darfur, and categorically denied it was using the janjaweed to attack civilians.

"We as army cannot engage in any such attacks or make use of militias to attack our own citizens," the office of the army spokesman said Wednesday.

More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced since fighting began in Darfur three years ago, when rebels stemming from ethnic African tribes rose up against the Arab-led central government.

Al-Naby, the rebel field commander, said his faction had waged a large battle against combined army and janjaweed forces on Saturday near Saiyah, about 15 miles north of Mellit. He said six rebels had been killed, including a field commander, and that eight were seriously injured.

DOJ_NMG_0096151

Al-Naby said government forces suffered dozens of casualties, including a military commander, and that rebels destroyed nine pickups and captured another 21.

The rebels' battle claim could not be independently verified. In recent weeks, foreign journalists have been unable to obtain permits from the Sudanese government to enter Darfur.

On Saturday, U.N. chief of humanitarian affairs Jan Egeland said he had been barred by Sudanese authorities from visiting several of the areas where fighting is now reported.

"The government is arming Arab militias more than ever before," Egeland said in an AP interview. He warned that the crisis "still has the potential of becoming infinitely worse."

The Sudanese Ministry of Humanitarian Affairs said Sunday that Egeland was spreading "lies and false accusations against the Sudan."

Hassabu Mohammed Abdallah, the humanitarian aid commissioner at the ministry, said Egeland's remarks were "a pure political act" seeking to boost the U.N. Security Council resolution that calls for the world body to send more than 20,000 peacekeepers to Darfur to replace the 7,000-strong AU force that has had little success in stopping the bloodshed.

Sudan's government has rejected the resolution, but this week appeared to accept a compromise in which a mixed U.N.-AU force would take over. The exact nature of this hybrid mission and the timing of the deployment were still being debated Sunday.

Nicaragua Eliminates Last Exception To Strict Anti-Abortion Law (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 19 — Hopes among women's groups in Nicaragua that President Enrique Bolaños would stop one of the most restrictive abortion laws in Latin America from taking effect have been dashed, as the president signed it into law late Friday.

Abortion has been illegal in Nicaragua for more than a century, and most women who decide to end unwanted pregnancies seek procedures at underground clinics. But the new law strikes out a clause that made it possible for a woman to obtain an abortion legally when three doctors certified that unless she did, her own life would be in danger.

For months, the proposed law has drawn fierce criticism from several local women's groups, the country's association of gynecologists, the United Nations, the World Health Organization and Human Rights Watch, among others.

"This is a throwback to the Middle Ages for women's rights," Juana Jiménez, the leader of the Women's Autonomous Movement in Nicaragua, said after the law was passed.

The law was the fruit of the recent presidential election, as conservatives saw a chance to gain its passage in Parliament during the election season.

The country is 85 percent Roman Catholic, with most other voters belonging to conservative evangelical churches. Four of the five presidential candidates supported it.

Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist who was president from 1985 to 1990 and the leader of the Sandinista Party, abandoned his ideological roots and supported passage of the law in an effort to gain support from the Roman Catholic Church in his campaign to regain the presidency. He narrowly won the election, on Nov. 5, with about 38 percent of the vote.

The support of the Sandinistas in the National Assembly was critical, because they had blocked similar measures in the past. The bill passed on Oct. 26.

Some opponents to the law had hoped Mr. Bolaños, a conservative, would not sign the bill because it did not include the stiffer sentences he had wanted for women who had had illegal abortions, or for those who had performed abortions. The six-year prison term remains unchanged under the law. The president had asked for a 30-year prison term.

Intrigue Swirls In Ex-K.G.B. Man's Illness (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096152

LONDON, Nov. 19 — The British police said Sunday that they were investigating the suspected poisoning of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a Russian former K.G.B. operative living in exile in Britain who had been inquiring into the killing of a journalist in Moscow last month.

The Russian authorities had no immediate comment on suggestions in news reports that the Russian secret service had poisoned Mr. Litvinenko, who is hospitalized and seriously ill, because he had criticized former colleagues and President Vladimir V. Putin.

Mr. Litvinenko is depicted by fellow exiles as a prominent opponent of the Kremlin, and he had told them he was looking into the killing on Oct. 7 of Anna Politkovskaya, who had made her name as a critic of the government's policies in Chechnya and who was gunned down at her apartment building.

Details from the police and news reports had some of the hallmarks of a spy thriller in the cold war vein of John le Carré.

The Sunday Times of London said the former agent had met Nov. 1 with an Italian contact identified only as Mario in a central London sushi bar.

Last week, Mr. Litvinenko told reporters he began to feel sick within hours of the meeting with Mario.

"I ordered lunch, but he ate nothing," Mr. Litvinenko said, according to The Sunday Times, which apparently interviewed him after he began to feel ill but before his condition deteriorated. "He appeared to be very nervous. He handed me a four-page document which he said he wanted me to read right away."

"It contained a list of people, including an F.S.B. officer, who were purported to be connected with the journalist's murder," he said. The F.S.B., or Federal Security Service, is the successor to the K.G.B.

"I do feel very bad," Mr. Litvinenko told The Sunday Times. "I've never felt like this before — like my life is hanging on the ropes."

In a telephone interview, Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon who has had a long association with Mr. Litvinenko — dating from the late 1990s when, he and Mr. Litvinenko contended at the time, Mr. Litvinenko had balked at orders to assassinate Mr. Berezovsky — said he had visited Mr. Litvinenko in the hospital and found him "damaged terribly."

Mr. Berezovsky said Mr. Litvinenko had been granted British citizenship, so the poisoning was "a terror attack against a British citizen in Britain." The incident, he said, could create a problem for Prime Minister Tony Blair, who has sought to cultivate close ties with Mr. Putin.

A police spokeswoman, speaking on the condition of anonymity under police rules, said specialist police officers were "investigating a suspicious poisoning." She described Mr. Litvinenko's condition as "serious but stable."

John Henry, a clinical toxicologist who has been treating Mr. Litvinenko, told the BBC: "He's got a prospect of recovering. He's a got a prospect of dying."

Mr. Henry, who in 2004 treated President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine, who was poisoned with dioxin, identified the suspected poison in the Litvinenko case as thallium, a toxic metal used in rat poison and insecticides. "It is tasteless, colorless and odorless," he said. "It takes about a gram to kill you."

Andres Virchis, a physician at Barnet Hospital in north London where Mr. Litvinenko was first treated, said Sunday that Mr. Litvinenko's bone marrow had failed and that he was not producing any normal immune cells or white cells.

As Mr. Litvinenko's condition worsened, he began to lose his hair, Dr. Virchis said.

Mr. Litvinenko was granted asylum in Britain in 2001 after leaving Russia six years ago. In 2003 he published a book, "The F.S.B. Blows up Russia," accusing the Russian secret service of orchestrating a wave of explosions in apartment houses in 1999 that led to the second Chechen war.

He also claimed familiarity with the techniques of the Russian secret service. At the time of Mr. Yushchenko's poisoning, Mr. Litvinenko said that a secret K.G.B. laboratory in Moscow, still operated by the F.S.B., specialized in the study of poisons.

"The view inside our agency was that poison is just a weapon, like a pistol," said Mr. Litvinenko, who served in both agencies, from 1988 to 1999. "It's not seen that way in the West, but it was just viewed as an ordinary tool."

The accounts of intrigue could not be confirmed.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend who had visited Mr. Litvinenko in the hospital, told the BBC that doctors had told him that he had only a 50-50 chance of surviving. "He looks like a ghost," Mr. Goldfarb said.

DOJ_NMG_0096153

Speaking later to reporters outside London's University College Hospital, to which Mr. Litvinenko had been transferred, Mr. Goldfarb said the British police interviewed Mr. Litvinenko on Sunday.

"He is in a fighting mood," Mr. Goldfarb said. Asked why Mr. Litvinenko might have been the target of an attack, Mr. Goldfarb said, "He is one of the top public enemies of the Russian F.S.B. and of Putin, particularly because of his book."

He added that Mr. Litvinenko belonged to "the so-called London émigré circle, which was branded by Russia as a terrorist cell on British soil."

Mr. Goldfarb called the poisoning "very scary — it means there's no limit."

British Police Investigate Poisoning Of Putin Critic (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 19 -- British police are investigating the poisoning of a former Russian spy and outspoken critic of President Vladimir Putin and have placed him under protective guard at a London hospital, a Scotland Yard spokesman said Sunday.

Alexander Litvinenko, 43, began vomiting shortly after he had lunch on Nov. 1 with a man who gave him documents related to the recent killing of Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian journalist, according to Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's.

Police said they began a criminal investigation Friday after medical tests confirmed the presence of poison in Litvinenko's system.

John Henry, a British toxicologist who has examined Litvinenko, said in an interview that the former spy had been poisoned by thallium, a highly toxic substance used as rat poison in some parts of the world.

"It is absolutely clear" that he was poisoned, said Henry, who was involved in the investigation of the 2004 poisoning of Viktor Yushchenko, a Ukrainian presidential candidate who survived and won the race but was left disfigured.

Henry said Litvinenko had liver and neurological damage and a low white blood cell count. "He is very sick. . . . He may live, but he is at high risk of death."

Thallium is odorless, colorless and tasteless, Henry said. When ingested, he said, "as little as one-fifteenth of a level teaspoon is enough to kill."

Goldfarb, reached by telephone at Litvinenko's bedside, said Litvinenko's condition was "deteriorating dramatically."

"What happened here is an assassination attempt perpetuated by Russian agents," Goldfarb said. "I thought he would be safe here on British soil."

Goldfarb said that precious time was wasted because even though Litvinenko thought he had been poisoned immediately after the lunch meeting, doctors did not become alarmed until nearly two weeks later, when his hair started falling out as his condition worsened.

Litvinenko was a colonel in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, the successor to the KGB, but fell out with his superiors and spent months in jail awaiting trial on charges of abusing his position. He was acquitted and fled in 2000 to London, where he was granted asylum. Goldfarb said Litvinenko was granted British citizenship last month.

Litvinenko is well known in Russia for accusing FSB agents of involvement in apartment building bombings in 1999 that killed more than 300 people. Russian officials blamed the attacks on separatists from Chechnya and launched a new military offensive in the republic.

Litvinenko also accused his FSB superiors of ordering him to kill Boris Berezovsky, a Russian tycoon who now lives in London.

Berezovsky said in a telephone interview that he visited Litvinenko in the hospital Friday and that he looked as if he had aged 10 years. "For 17 days he hasn't been able to eat. It's very painful to eat," he said.

Berezovsky said Litvinenko told him he had "no doubt" that he had been poisoned on the "order from President Putin to kill him." He called the poisoning "a classic way" that Russian agents work.

Attempts to reach a spokesman at the Russian Embassy in London were unsuccessful Sunday. A person who answered the phone said to call back Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0096154

Goldfarb said Litvinenko had eaten lunch at a sushi restaurant with an Italian contact who he said gave him "a few pages of material" related to the killing of Politkovskaya, the journalist and critic of Putin and Russia's policy in Chechnya. Politkovskaya was shot last month in Moscow.

The case, which remains unsolved, caused an international outcry.

Politkovskaya was hospitalized in 2004 and believed she had been poisoned.

Goldfarb said that Scotland Yard officers have taken the papers given to Litvinenko on Nov. 1.

According to British media reports, police have visited the sushi restaurant in central London to look for clues and to see whether any closed-circuit camera surveillance of the incident exists.

This incident is reminiscent of the 1978 poisoning of Bulgarian dissident Georgi Markov, who was jabbed in the leg by a man with an umbrella while walking across Waterloo Bridge in London. The umbrella fired a pellet of ricin poison into Markov, who died an agonizing death days later.

G-20 Meeting Puts Energy Topics As Primary Focus (WSJ)

By Owen Brown

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

MELBOURNE, Australia -- Some of the world's most influential policy makers agreed yesterday on the immediate problems threatening the global economy but failed to reach a consensus on the best strategies to address them.

A two-day annual meeting of the Group of 20 finance ministers and central bankers accepted that rising global demand for energy and minerals will threaten to spark higher inflation. Underscoring the challenges faced by policy makers, an International Energy Agency paper presented to the meeting projected energy demand will grow 50% in the next 25 years. Areas of agreement outlined included the need to revise energy subsidies to "better target poverty, and ensure price signals work to expand supply and induce efficiency."

The issues of carbon taxes and greenhouse-gas emissions bedeviled attempts to reach a strategy for reining in demand and stabilizing prices. A push by some countries such as Russia, France and India to embrace nuclear power as a way to diversify energy consumption and reduce climate-changing emissions was another topic that split the G-20 membership.

The G-20 brings together the world's most developed countries such as the U.S., Japan and the European Union with emerging economic powerhouses including China and India. But the diversity of the group's membership also created a major stumbling block to reaching consensus on energy security, climate change and overhaul of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

U.S. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt said that in the wake of higher prices, oil-producing countries needed to avoid supply disruptions and adopt investment codes that reflect best practices around the world.

Germany's Finance Minister Peer Steinbrück said G-2O members agreed on the need to promote energy efficiency and expand use of renewable technology.

Australian Treasurer Peter Costello, who chaired the meeting, deflected criticism that the G-20's embrace of open energy markets is an empty gesture without the cooperation of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. The G-20 statement said the outlook for global growth remains positive even as growth is expected to slow slightly from the rapid pace of the past few years. But it warned that maintaining growth and containing inflation will require adjustments to monetary and fiscal policies.

Energy Output Short Of Demand (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

Mexico, the No. 2 U.S. supplier of oil, is unable to produce enough to meet the demands of its customers, especially its neighbor to the north, because of outdated national economic policies that have hamstrung its oil and gas exploration and production, analysts say.

Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon met with Canadian officials this month to discuss trade and explore further cooperation as Mexico's production capacity dives.

Although Mexico has the potential to be an energy powerhouse, the country's national oil company, Pemex, lacks the investment funds to improve production in mature fields.

As oil prices rose and production increased in the past year, the government became addicted to Pemex's revenues, taking more than 60 percent of the company's earnings, which provide a third of the national budget, the Canadian newsmagazine Maclean's reported.

Mexico "should be an energy megastar and is performing way off Broadway in terms of production vitality, because Pemex is required to turn over the bulk of its revenues to the government. This prevents exploration, infrastructure investment, and creates debt," said Vincent DeVito, an international energy attorney with Pepper Hamilton LLP in New York and a former acting assistant secretary of energy.

Canada and Mexico are the top two suppliers of oil to the United States, with exports of 2.1 million and 1.8 million barrels per day respectively, but the two countries are worlds apart in the development of their energy resources.

"Oil and gas will continue to be a significant part of [the U.S.] energy supply and Pemex must devise a way to allow private investment into the Mexico market in order to remain a secure supplier," Mr. DeVito said. "If not, there will be a crisis in Mexico; and, a crisis in Mexico is a crisis in the United States and, conceivably, a crisis in Canada."

Pemex has accrued debt and recently posted a net loss of $7 billion for 2005, despite record-high oil prices. Production is expected to face a steep decline and, as things stand, Mexico has only 10 years of reserves left.

All hydrocarbon resources are nationalized under the country's constitution. In 1938, the industry was nationalized with the establishment of Pemex as the state oil company.

Although Canada plans to boost production, it cannot make up for the shortfall caused by Mexico's export decline. The shortfall will force the United States to seek alternative suppliers, which will likely increase prices, according to analysts.

U.N. Job Seekers Get Chance To Impress (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- The jockeying for top jobs in a new U.N. administration has begun in earnest with the arrival in New York of incoming Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, who will take over the organization in six weeks.

Senior management in some departments will be replaced for the first time in a decade or more, forcing longtime staffers out of their sinecures and giving Mr. Ban an opportunity to remake the organization to his liking.

Mr. Ban, who stepped down last week as South Korean foreign minister, arrived at the United Nations on Thursday to take part in a transition that has been gathering steam since his unanimous selection in mid-October.

He is expected to announce his senior staff appointments -- including a chief of staff and deputy secretary-general -- shortly after he is sworn in as the eighth U.N. secretary-general on Dec. 14. He takes full charge of the organization on Jan. 1.

Mr. Ban has begun a round of meetings with at least three dozen undersecretaries-general and assistant secretaries-general, as well as with key ambassadors, representatives of nongovernmental organizations and trusted advisers.

The Ban team is using the meetings mainly to gather information, but for many U.N. officials, the appointments serve as half-hour opportunities to impress the new boss and keep their jobs or trade up.

"He has a battery of appointments," said one person involved with the transition. "He wants to find out what is happening in [each] area and have a bit of look-see at these people: Can they walk and talk and shoot straight? The real emphasis is on sucking in as much info as possible."

Of course, the source added, "There are important personnel decisions looming."

Departing Secretary-General Kofi Annan has refused to approve long-term contracts for most senior management, leaving Mr. Ban a free hand to select his own heads of major departments. Most contracts will expire at the end of December or the end of February, according to current officials.

In the meantime, the 39-story glass-walled U.N. headquarters has been reverberating with gossip, whispering campaigns, rumors and outright disinformation.

DOJ_NMG_0096156

Will Mr. Ban favor Asians or bend against them in order to seem impartial? Will he keep some top managers or replace as many as three dozen officials over the next few months? Is it true that he will consider only women for the most prominent posts? Have major nations already locked down the departments they want to run? How much influence will Washington have?

"Those who talk don't know," said one knowledgeable adviser, pleading ignorance. "I don't think any decisions have been made yet."

Mr. Ban's advisers, most of them plucked from South Korea's Foreign Ministry, have been absorbing information from various sources inside and outside the United Nations. People who observed him last week said he was proceeding methodically, taking in information and "truth-testing" what he hears.

The Korean diplomat inherits an organization that has been allowed to grow haphazardly as its membership and responsibilities have expanded. Staff morale has sunk over recent years in the face of the Iraq oil-for-food investigation, sex scandals in peacekeeping, widespread perceptions of bad management, lax oversight and selective accountability.

The United Nations now costs some $2 billion to run each year, and the separate peacekeeping budget is expected to nearly double to $10 billion a year by 2008.

Many are hoping that Mr. Ban, 62, will work with almost surgical cleanliness and precision to slice away the nonperformers and the underqualified. Others are fearing drastic change.

Preparations for Mr. Ban's arrival have been under way throughout the U.N. system.

His transition team is temporarily based in a glass-walled office tower across the street from the Secretariat, a modern office space with work cubicles and constantly ringing phones.

Mr. Ban is expected to spend most of the next six weeks in New York, except for brief trips back to Seoul and at least one visit to Washington.

Independence For Kosovo (WSJ)

By Agim Ceku

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

PRISTINA -- Just as it seemed that the Balkans were finally turning the corner, we are instead entering another period of stagnation, delay and uncertainty. A United Nations decision on Kosovo's status, originally expected before the end of this year, has been postponed. The expectations in Kosovo are high. Kosovo is hungry for independence, Kosovo is ready for independence, and now is not the time to stop the clock.

We need to keep the process of statehood on track. Kosovo needs clarity to complete reforms and to attract vital international investments, but also so that our people -- and especially our Serb minority -- can escape the debilitating worries and uncertainty and start to build a future. Their home and future are in Kosovo.

There are two things we must do in Kosovo to succeed as a progressive and a modern independent state. First, we should further improve our institutions to achieve more transparency and a functioning legal system. Second, we need a broad political commitment to development and modernization.

Independence is only the first step and, in itself, is insufficient to provide for Kosovo's future. Kosovo needs a clear perspective for European Union membership. We can only succeed within this framework. This above all means prioritizing economic revitalization in the post-independence period. Nothing short of an economic boom will get us up to speed; the EU train will not wait for Kosovo, or the rest of the region for that matter. The biggest problem in the Western Balkans is economic malaise.

It is the Kosovars, not Belgrade, who have a real interest and stake in seeing Kosovo succeed. Moderate Serbs have long lost interest in Kosovo. Only those desperate for cheap, nationalist rhetorical points claim to care about it. Belgrade offers no vision, no economic or European agenda to the people of Kosovo. Increasing numbers of Serbs, especially those living in Kosovo, are beginning to see beyond this bankrupt world view.

I have no doubt that seeing Kosovo become independent will be a difficult new reality for Serbia. But it is the only way. Belgrade is not interested in investing in the development of Kosovo, and Kosovo is not interested in a political union with Serbia. But we are interested in developing a productive bilateral partnership with Serbia, just as we're doing with our other neighbors.

Social and economic progress in the region will be the big losers if we don't make the bold step forward to independence. The entire Western Balkan region needs a kick start in order to catch the EU train and catch up with the awesome economic growth of our EU-bound neighbors Romania and Bulgaria. This is the only way forward and the only way into the EU. Globalization is a reality which won't pause so we can get ready. The pace is being set in Asia, but transition will have to happen here in the Western Balkans if we wish to compete.

Most of us in the Balkans share a common vision about our future -- we want to get into the EU as fast as possible. The way to do it is through reforms. This wasn't an easy process for the Baltic countries. It wasn't easy for Eastern and Central Europe. And it won't be easy for the Balkan states either. The region needs to find its comparative advantage in Europe and in the global market. It will do so as soon as we settle the final status of Kosovo.

Can Kosovo survive? Sure. If we reform, we'll do very well. My government has adopted a proactive "3E" plan for Kosovo based on energy, economy and education. With large deposits of coal, Kosovo can in a few years become a net electricity exporter. With the right technology we can even do this with an environmental face.

The economy is picking up. There is no currency risk in Kosovo now that we've adopted the euro. We have privatized around 90% of the asset value of all state-owned enterprises. The financial sector has already been privatized, and we are now attracting new investments into the telecom and energy sectors. Much remains to be done, including cleaning up corruption in the courts, but we're on the right track.

We have a young population and a positive birth rate. Given the shortages in the EU labor market due to negative demographic trends, Kosovo can help fill the void. To do so, we need to retrain our work force. Hence we're now investing in education.

The EU is facing a crisis, and it needs time to consolidate and reset its internal political balances. However, this is no reason to lose sight of its strategic goal: a Europe whole and free. Right now this is still not the reality, at least not in the Western Balkans.

Mr. Çeku is the prime minister of Kosovo.

Japan Shrinks (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

TOKYO -- Japan has embarked on a path no developed nation has ever followed -- of sustained and inexorable population decline.

Japan won't be alone, of course. Italy, Russia, South Korea and many others also will get smaller. The United States is the exception among advanced nations, and not only thanks to immigration; its overall birth rate is higher, too.

But Japan, which shrank by about 21,000 last year, is in the forefront, and so everyone else will be watching. Does population decline inevitably sap vitality and doom a country to genteel poverty? Or is there some way out?

"Japan is the leader, so it's important for Japan to show success," says Hitoshi Suzuki, a cheerful senior researcher at Daiwa Institute of Research, who pronounces himself "not so worried" -- so not worried, in fact, that last year he wrote "Population Decline is Not Something We Need to Fear."

But why not? For a population to hold steady, every woman must give birth on average to 2.1 children. When the birthrate drops below 1.5 and stays there for any time, it's almost impossible to recover, given the momentum of demographics. Below 1.3 is considered "lowest-low." China is at 1.7 and dropping. Japan last year clocked in at 1.25.

As a result, Japan's population, now about 128 million, is expected to fall to about 100 million by mid-century. Big deal, you might say. Wasn't Japan happy enough 50 years ago, when it blew through the 100 million mark on the way up?

Yes, but it was a very different 100 million then. In 1965 there were 25 million children in Japan, 67 million people of working age and 6 million senior citizens. In 2050 there will be 11 million children, 54 million potential workers and 36 million people 65 and over. No one knows whether such a society can maintain a spirit of innovation, or how its capitalists will adapt to a shrinking market. There will potentially be a lot more dependents for every productive worker.

Faced with this prospect, a country could choose to fight (raise the birthrate) or cope (prepare to manage the consequences). Japan gives lip service to the former. Since 1990 the government has sought to encourage more births, but the policy has had no impact. Today the portfolio of the minister in charge of spurring fertility seems to indicate a certain lack of governmental focus: She is minister of state for Okinawa and Northern Territories Affairs, science and technology, innovation, gender equality and social affairs, and food safety.

In truth, Japan doesn't seem to want to change as it would have to in order to increase the birthrate. Japanese women say in surveys that they want two children, but they delay or abstain from marriage and motherhood in astonishing numbers because fathers don't help around the house, because mothers feel isolated in tiny apartments and because it's so hard for a woman to combine career and motherhood.

In theory, the government is dedicated to reforming this. In practice, its philosophy seems aptly represented by Deputy Chief Cabinet Secretary Hakubun Shimomura, who said this month, when pressed about long waiting lists for public nursery schools, that the problem would be solved if mothers would only "stay at home and raise their children."

When I asked Prime Minister Shinzo Abe last week about this comment, he diplomatically avoided contradicting Shimomura but said his aim is to provide choices so mothers can work or stay home as they see fit. But he also made clear that he is focused on the coping rather than the preventing: "Even considering the decline in the population, I am convinced Japan will be able to continue on a path of growth," he said.

The trick will be "innovation," Abe said, and economic reform. In fact, robots and other ways to improve productivity are one of four possible routes to economic growth despite an aging population. The others would be making better use of women; immigration, which has increased slightly but remains unpopular in this ethnically cohesive country; and keeping the elderly working longer. According to Naohiro Ogawa, a population expert at Nihon University, if every healthy elderly person worked, Japan's total economy in 2025 would be worth 791 trillion yen instead of the currently projected 619 trillion yen, an increase of 28 percent. Just raising the retirement age from 60 to 65 would produce a 12 percent increase.

Not every old person is going to work. But, Ogawa said, "there will be some adjustment. Japan's not going to fall apart."

It could certainly decline, though. Toru Suzuki, a demographer at the National Institute of Population and Social Security Research, believes Japan will eventually accept more immigrants after it has tried everything else. But he's also less convinced than Hitoshi Suzuki that Japan will find a path to growth.

"It brings you to a very tough question," Toru Suzuki says. "What is happiness? Can we be happy without economic growth?"

At least Japan will find out from a starting position of wealth. China, which imposed a one-child policy before it had developed economically, may get old before it gets rich. That will be a first, too.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bye-Bye To Secret Spy Program? (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Republicans who limped back to Washington for a lame duck congressional session last week found a host of marching orders from President Bush, but perhaps none more urgent than this: Before Democrats take control of Congress in January, they must pass legislation authorizing the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program.

His plea for a legislative stamp of approval on the controversial spy effort is an "important priority in the war on terror," Bush said. The response: deafening silence. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist quickly dispatched aides to put out the word on Bush's request: Not gonna happen.

Outgoing Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter introduced yet another bill last week that he says would ease the concerns of privacy advocates while allowing the spying program to continue, but the odds of getting any last-ditch legislation through his committee, the House, and a Senate vote before Republicans cede control are formidable.

So after nearly a year of high-stakes wrangling on the Hill, heated debates over privacy and presidential authority, and a flurry of lawsuits against the administration and telecom companies for allegedly aiding the surveillance program, Congress appears to be back to square one. And with Democrats promising oversight hearings next year on how the program was hatched and whom it targets, it appears likely that the issue will be decided in court and, ultimately, the Supreme Court.

"No kings." The eavesdropping program, launched in secret after the 9/11 attacks, was revealed last December by the New York Times. The newspaper also reported that the government failed to get surveillance warrants from a secret court that monitors domestic spying. During the ensuing uproar, the president defended the program as targeting only domestic communications that originate overseas. His lawyers have argued that the president's executive wartime authority precludes his having to seek surveillance warrants. Says Todd Gaziano, director of the conservative Heritage Foundation's Center for Legal and Judicial Studies: "Every president has engaged in the equivalent of warrantless wiretapping and surveillance-the only difference is that this administration is being far more sensitive to civil liberties."

Nonetheless, some three dozen legal challenges have been filed questioning the program's legality and Bush's wartime powers claim. A slew of the cases also take aim at telecom companies for providing confidential customer data to the NSA. Under federal communications law, customer call records are protected from disclosure, though there is an effort by Bush and other conservatives to grant the companies retroactive legal immunity.

The most-watched court case is in Detroit, where U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor has ruled that the program violates U.S. citizens' privacy and free-speech rights and illegally skirts review by the special Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court. "There are no hereditary kings in America, and no powers not created by the Constitution," Taylor wrote. Administration lawyers won a stay to keep the program running and are appealing Taylor's ruling.

Oral arguments could be heard as soon as early next year. And Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, which has sued to obtain information about the spy program, said the case will set a benchmark for how other cases may proceed.

Another closely watched case is being heard in San Francisco, where AT&T has been sued for allegedly providing customer call records to the NSA. A federal judge there rejected the government's request that the case be dismissed because it might reveal state secrets. That decision has also been appealed.

On Capitol Hill, some conservatives say they'd be happy if the eavesdropping bills remain dormant-that the issue can be left to the courts to resolve. They're also content, they say, to let the Democrats take the political risk of pursuing the president on a contentious national security issue while the 2008 presidential election gathers steam. But Caroline Fredrickson, the chief lobbyist for the American Civil Liberties Union, says that may be a miscalculation. "Members of Congress are probably paying pretty close attention to what the voters said last week," she said, "and I don't think voters said they want the president's illegal program authorized." What the courts say could be another thing entirely.

9/11 Prisoner Abuse Suit Could Be Landmark (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

NEW YORK — Five years after Muslim immigrants were abused in a federal jail here, the guards who beat them and the Washington policymakers who decided to hold them for months without charges are being called to account.

Some 1,200 Middle Eastern men were arrested on suspicion of terrorism after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. No holding place was so notorious as Brooklyn's nine-story Metropolitan Detention Center. In a special unit on the top floor, detainees were smashed into walls, repeatedly stripped and searched, and often denied basic legal rights and religious privileges, according to federal investigations.

Now the federal Bureau of Prisons, which runs the jail, has revealed for the first time that 13 staff members have been disciplined, two of them fired. The warden has retired and moved to the Midwest.

And in what could turn out to be a landmark case, a lawsuit filed by two Brooklyn detainees against top Bush administration officials is moving forward in the federal courts in New York.

A judge turned down a request by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III and former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft to dismiss the lawsuit against them. The case is before an appeals court, where a panel of three judges signaled last month that they too believed it should go forward.

The suit, which also names top federal prison officials and individual guards as defendants, seeks an unspecified amount of money from the government. More significant, it hopes to hold federal law enforcement authorities responsible for their open-ended, "hold-until-cleared" policy for detainees. After Sept. 11, the FBI was in no rush to investigate the detainees, and many men were held in limbo. If the lawsuit prevails, it will create precedents that will probably bar authorities from carrying out such sweeping roundups in the future.

The case is proceeding with just one of the detainees who sued. The government settled with the other, former Manhattan deli operator Ehab Elmaghraby, who this year accepted a federal government payout of $300,000.

But Elmaghraby, who has returned to Egypt, said he could not forgive the guards who jammed a flashlight up his rectum.

"They destroyed me. They destroyed my family," he said in a recent telephone interview. "So I want the officers to stay one week inside those cells. They would kill themselves before the week was finished."

Ashcroft and others have defended the detentions. In a new book, Ashcroft wrote: "Was it worth it to detain and charge hundreds … in order to find one or more of the key men sent to America to facilitate a second wave of attacks on the United States? I thought so then, and I think so more today."

Five investigations by the Department of Justice inspector general's office, most of them never publicized, documented wholesale abuse of the Muslim detainees at the Brooklyn detention center. In the months after the Sept. 11 attacks, 84 men were held there. None was charged in the attacks. Most were deported on immigration infractions.

One disturbing incident, repeated over and over, is particularly haunting — inmates head-slammed into a wall where the staff had taped a T-shirt with an American flag printed on it. The motto on the shirt proclaimed: "These colors don't run." In time, that spot on the wall was covered with blood.

"They told me, 'Look at our flag. You see the blood that is coming down from our flag? We're going to make you bleed every day like this,' " Elmaghraby recalled.

He said they grabbed his back and sides and rushed him head-first into the wall. "Blood came out of my mouth," he said.

The inspector general determined that many guards were "emotionally charged" in the weeks after Sept. 11. A jail lieutenant told investigators that guards carried around "a great deal of anger." Another lieutenant said prisoners purposely were handed over to teams of up to seven guards, all of them "spiked with adrenaline." That lieutenant further described some of the guards as "talking crazy" and "getting ready for battle."

In legal briefs filed this year with the U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, attorneys for Ashcroft and Mueller defended their policy, saying that Washington after Sept. 11 was "confronted with unprecedented law enforcement and security challenges." They said Ashcroft and Mueller had been working with "no clear judicial precedents in this extraordinary context."

Ashcroft in his recent book, "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice," wrote that the goal was to prevent another catastrophic attack. He was not bothered by holding detainees for long periods.

"If we can't bring them to trial," he wrote, "so be it."

DOJ_NMG_0096163

Mueller also has defended the decision, but in a speech to the ACLU acknowledged that the inspector general did "a very good job of pointing out areas where we can do better." He said that clearer criteria were needed for deciding when to hold immigrants as terrorism suspects and that law enforcement should do more to speed up investigations.

Elmaghraby moved to the U.S. in 1990, married and operated a deli near Times Square in Manhattan. Nineteen days after Sept. 11, he was arrested, apparently because his landlord in Queens had applied for pilot training.

For the first three months in the jail, he said, he was denied a blanket, pillow, mattress and toilet paper. He was locked away in his bare feet.

"No shoes for a terrorist," he said he was told.

He said he was repeatedly strip-searched, dragged on the ground and punched until his teeth shattered. He said that he was displayed naked in front of a female staffer, and that guards violated him with a flashlight and pencil.

Elmaghraby, 39, broke down crying in a recent interview. "They don't treat you like a person," he said. "They treat you like an animal."

He was held for nearly a year — until August 2002. After pleading guilty to minor credit card fraud charges, he was deported to Alexandria, Egypt.

He has lost track of his wife in New York, he said, and his deli business went under. And he spent most of his $300,000 settlement to repair his stomach and esophagus, which he said were damaged because jail doctors did not properly treat him for severe indigestion and hypertension.

The former detainee with whom the lawsuit is proceeding, Javaid Iqbal, is also 39. Iqbal, a Pakistani, came to America a dozen years ago. He married and he worked as a cable repairman on Long Island. He was arrested in November 2001, apparently after agents interviewed him in his apartment and spotted a magazine showing the twin towers collapsing.

He said he was mocked as a "Muslim terrorist and a killer." He was strip-searched, punched in the face and kicked in the back. He said guards urinated in his toilet, then turned off the water so it would not flush.

He was denied a copy of the Koran. "No prayer for terrorists," he said he was told.

Iqbal was released at the end of July 2002. He pleaded guilty to having false immigration papers and was deported to Faisalabad, Pakistan. His lawyers declined to let him be interviewed.

Guards at the detention center first denied there was any mistreatment, then slowly came forward. Finally videotapes were uncovered that showed abuse, including detainees head-butted into the T-shirt on the wall.

Traci Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said 13 staff members have been disciplined. Two were fired, two received 30-day suspensions and one was suspended for 21 days. Two more were suspended for four days, three for two days, and three were demoted.

Warden Dennis Hasty retired in April 2002. He is named as a defendant in the lawsuit but his lawyer, Michael L. Martinez, said Hasty had not been aware of the abuse and had been "appalled and upset" to learn of the allegations.

The lawsuit was filed in Brooklyn in May 2004. Last year, U.S. District Judge John Gleeson ruled against a bid by Ashcroft and Mueller for a dismissal.

The judge said the furor over Sept. 11 did not warrant such drastic measures. He rejected, he wrote, "the argument that the post-Sept. 11 context wholly extinguished … a pretrial detainee's due process rights."

Some Believe 'Truth Serums' Will Come Back (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

If there is a "truth serum" that works, it is a secret that nobody is giving up.

The debate earlier this year on interrogation techniques in the war on terrorism raised anew a question that goes back at least 2,000 years. Is there something you can give a person that will make him tell the truth?

The ancient Romans had an answer: Yes.

" In vino veritas"-- "in wine there is truth" -- is sometimes attributed to the natural philosopher Pliny the Elder. The observation made in the 1st century has been borne out over the millennia by many a remorseful inebriate. And, in truth, alcohol given as intravenous ethanol was an early form of truth serum.

In the 21st century, however, the answer appears to be: No. There is no pharmaceutical compound today whose proven effect is the consistent or predictable enhancement of truth-telling.

The modern fascination with truth-eliciting drugs began in 1916 when an obstetrician named Robert House, practicing in a town outside Dallas named Ferris, saw a strange event during a home delivery.

The woman in labor was in a state of "twilight sleep" induced by scopolamine, a compound derived from the henbane plant that blocks the action of the neurotransmitter acetylcholine. House had asked her husband for a scale to weigh the newborn. The man looked for it and returned to the bedroom saying he could not find it, whereupon his wife, still under the anesthetic, told him exactly where it was.

House became convinced that scopolamine could make anyone answer a question truthfully, and he went on to promote its forensic use.

Police departments used it -- and in a few cases judges permitted it -- throughout the 1920s and 1930s. Other drugs were also tried, most famously the barbiturates Pentothal and Amytal. But by the 1950s, most scientists had declared the very notion of truth serums invalid, and most courts had ruled testimony gained through their use inadmissible.

The emerging consensus did not stop the most notorious search for truth serum, the CIA's Project MK-ULTRA. Starting in 1953, the agency tested the behavioral effects of several drugs, including their effects on interrogation. Many people were given substances without their knowledge or consent. Frank Olson jumped from a hotel window to his death after taking the hallucinogen LSD.

The program ended in the late 1960s. Its abuses -- many revealed in congressional hearings in 1977 -- produced bad publicity for the spy agency.

Whether a search for truth serums has occurred in recent decades, and especially since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, is a matter of differing opinion.

Gordon H. Barland was a captain in the U.S. Army Combat Development Command's intelligence agency in the 1960s. Before leaving active duty in 1967 he was asked to write up "materiel objectives." He put on the wish list a drug that would aid interrogation.

He later became a research psychologist and spent 14 years working at the Department of Defense Polygraph Institute. While psychopharmacology was not his specialty, trying to catch liars was.

"I would have expected that if there was some sort of truth drug in general use I would have heard rumors of it. I never did," said Barland, who retired in 2000 and now lives in Utah. He further doubts that the government would again engage in such experiments, given the MK-ULTRA experience.

"It would be very difficult to get a project like that off the ground," he speculated.

Another psychologist who spent 20 years in military research said he also "never heard anything like that or knew of anyone who was doing that work." He spoke on the condition of anonymity because interrogation is not his specialty.

Some doubt the practicality of running, or keeping secret, such a research agenda.

"I can't imagine it," said Tara O'Toole, director of the Center for Biosecurity of the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center.

"We haven't been able as a government to create anthrax vaccine. The idea that we could develop a [truth] drug de novo strikes me as outlandish," she said. "That would be a really major research and development project that would be hard to hide."

For the record, spokesmen for the Army medical research command, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) and the CIA say there is no work underway on truth serums.

Whether such a substance could ever be used legally is a question some legal scholars believe is still open.

"In the United States, no law at either the state or national level makes the use of truth serum a crime per se," Jason R. Odeshoo wrote in the Stanford Law Review in 2004.

Information gotten through drug-aided interviews would not be allowed in a trial because of the Constitution's privilege against self-incrimination, but it might be legal to use truth serum "solely for intelligence-gathering purposes," he argued. Similarly, while the Geneva Conventions forbid its use against prisoners of war, if terrorism suspects aren't considered POWs the conventions wouldn't block it, he wrote.

Curiously, truth serum was once viewed as a way of preventing, not promoting, abusive interrogations.

The Prohibition era, which coincided with scopolamine's popularity, produced widespread graft in police departments and district attorneys' offices. Reports of "third-degree" interrogation and forced confessions were common.

"In this climate 'truth serum' was powerfully represented as a sophisticated, scientific, and non-violent alternative to unsavory police methods," wrote Alison Winter in a history of truth serum published in the Bulletin of the History of Medicine in 2005.

This ambiguous legal status, combined with advances in neuroscience, lead some to suspect there may be a second act for truth serum.

"There is a large number of neural circuits that we are on the verge of being able to manipulate -- things that govern states like fear, anxiety, terror and depression," said Mark Wheelis, a scientist at the University of California at Davis and a historian of chemical and biological warfare.

"We don't have recipes yet to control them, but the potential is clearly foreseeable," he said. "It would absolutely astonish me if we didn't identify a range of pharmaceuticals that would be of great utility to interrogators."

Recent research with the hormone oxytocin is especially provocative in this regard.

DOJ_NMG_0096165

Produced by the brain, oxytocin is best known for stimulating uterine contraction during labor (when it is sometimes given under the trade name Pitocin), and for promoting milk "letdown" during breast feeding. Animal studies have shown it is also important in mate bonding and social attachment.

In a study published last year, Michael Kosfeld and Markus Heinrichs of the University of Zurich set up an experiment examining oxytocin's effects on trust.

About 130 college students were randomly given a snort of oxytocin or placebo. Half were then designated "investors" and were given money. They could keep or transfer some or all of the money to a student "trustee," whom they did not know and could not see.

The act of transferring money tripled its value, creating a big payoff for the trustee receiving it. That person could then keep it all or acknowledge the investor's trust by returning some portion.

The investors getting oxytocin on average transferred more money than those getting placebos, and twice as many -- 45 percent vs. 21 percent -- showed maximal trust and transferred it all. Interestingly, oxytocin had no effect on how much money trustees shared back with their investors, suggesting that the hormone acted specifically to promote trust in situations where there was risk and uncertainty.

Paul J. Zak, a neuroscientist at Claremont Graduate University in California, helped supervise the Swiss experiment. He later went to a meeting called by DARPA and presented the findings. When he was finished, a military scientist asked him: "How do I use this stuff tomorrow?"

Zak said he dodged the question. He observed that classic interrogation techniques, in which one person acts as the "good cop" and creates a bond with the prisoner, probably already makes use of the brain's own oxytocin. He added that, "we are just showing you the neurophysiology behind it."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Marshals Kept Off Plane At Reagan (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

A team of federal air marshals was prevented from protecting a recent flight from Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport because a gate agent erroneously said they did not have the correct paperwork, say marshals familiar with the incident.

Officials with Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority (MWAA) were called in to remove the marshals from US Airways Flight 3464 departing Nov. 8 for Bradley International Airport in Windsor Locks, Conn.

"Right now we know, obviously, that federal air marshals were denied boarding," said Federal Air Marshal Service (FAMS) spokesman Conan Bruce.

Marshals knowledgeable about this case and others told The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity that the gate agent demanded paperwork which is required of other law-enforcement officials, but not from federal air marshals who are on duty to protect the plane from a terrorist attack.

The flight arrived late, and passengers were immediately boarded while marshals showed their identification to the gate agent and head flight attendant. They asked to brief the captain then boarded the plane.

The marshals were first rousted from their seats to report to the jet bridge, where the gate agent demanded paperwork intended for off-duty law-enforcement officers carrying weapons. The marshals told the gate agent that they were on mission status and the paperwork was not required, and they returned to their seats.

The marshals were called to the jet bridge a second time to speak with the captain, and the marshals then returned to their seats.

Minutes later, the marshals were called again to the jet bridge a third time, where MWAA officers ordered the marshals to exit the plane.

Even the intervention of higher-ups in the Homeland Security Department could not persuade the airline to allow the armed law-enforcement agents aboard, and the plane departed unprotected an hour and a half late, the sources said.

Calls for comment to Republic Airlines, which owns US Airways, were not returned.

Air Marshal Director Dana Brown has pledged to rewrite the boarding rules, which marshals say are defined differently by airlines and often exposes their undercover identities.

Mr. Bruce said the agency is working with the airline to review the incident, "get the facts and find out what happened."

Asked whether similar situations have occurred in which airlines barred marshals from boarding, Mr. Bruce said "I'm sure it has in the past five years; it isn't the first incident."

DOJ_NMG_0096166

"I would not say it's a regular occurrence. After we expanded the program and added so many thousands of marshals, it was a learning process for the airlines and us. I would not say it was a regular occurrence, maybe early on, but not a regular occurrence now," Mr. Bruce said.

"It is important to point out we work hand in hand with the airlines. It's a cooperative effort; that's why we have a liaison division," Mr. Bruce said. "We'll figure it out, we'll review it, but I don't want to speculate until we have all the facts."

Marshals say this isn't the first time they have encountered animosity from airlines and the flight crews whom they protect.

"There were hundreds of incidents like this," one air marshal said of the period shortly after the September 11 terrorist attacks. "Air marshals finally stopped filing reports because the air marshal usually ends up being investigated for not being able to cooperate."

Union Wants To Organize Airport Screeners (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's largest federal labor union will push to organize airport security screeners after a finding by a United Nations agency that the screeners should have union representation.

The 600,000-member American Federation of Government Employees says it could improve workplace conditions. The Transportation Security Administration has one of the highest attrition and injury rates in the federal government, which aggravates staffing shortages that make airport security lines longer. The AFGE plans to lobby Congress' new Democratic leaders to let TSA screeners unionize.

The TSA says unionization could hinder managers from quickly moving screeners to new assignments as security threats arise.

The nation's 45,000 screeners have been barred from collective bargaining since the TSA was formed after the 9/11 attacks to safeguard aviation.

The U.N. International Labor Organization's finding says that policy “may impede unduly upon the rights of these federal employees” and urges the TSA to “engage in collective bargaining” with screeners. The Geneva-based agency released its finding this month in response to a complaint filed in 2003 by the AFGE. The union lost a lawsuit seeking to represent TSA screeners.

The finding carries no legal obligation but reflects that the TSA is not following the United Nations' “core labor standards,” says Hans von Rohland, an International Labor Organization spokesman.

“Now we have the rationale that this is not just a union whining,” AFGE lawyer Mark Roth says. “This is a formal finding of a violation.”

The finding will encourage Congress to let screeners unionize, he says.

When Democrats take control of the House of Representatives and Senate in January, “we certainly have a much more receptive Congress,” union lobbyist Charity Wilson says.

Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., says union representation would provide “basic worker protections that will ensure screeners are treated like professionals.” Lowey proposed in July to let screeners unionize, but her measure was defeated on a 14-15 vote in her House Homeland Security Committee.

Lowey hopes to add the measure to a broad legislative effort to strengthen domestic security that Democrats will push in January.

“I feel good about it for next year,” Lowey says.

TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe says unionization “would limit our ability to make decisions rapidly in the interests of national security and in response to risk.”

Most federal labor unions are barred from negotiating wages and benefits, which are set by Congress. They can help set workplace conditions and file grievances heard by neutral parties.

“We will bargain safety conditions, health conditions, fair rotations of work and assignments, so people have a job they want to stay in and are not treated arbitrarily,” Roth says.

Travelers Say We're Bordering On Hostile (WP)

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Looking for reasons why America's popularity in the world has declined? The U.S. travel industry blames security.

A plurality of international travelers rated the U.S. visa and immigration entry system the "world's worst," according to data released today that was commissioned by a tourism business lobby.

DOJ_NMG_0096167

Interviews with 2,011 non-U.S. residents who had traveled beyond their home continents in the past 18 months found that 39 percent rated the United States the least traveler-friendly, more than twice the percentage that gave bottom grades to the Middle East (16 percent), Asia (12 percent) or Africa (12 percent). The rating was based on the ease of obtaining travel documents and the respectfulness of immigration officials.

The questions were somewhat self-serving, and researchers drew more than a fifth of the participants from countries with mixed relations with the United States, such as China and Venezuela.

The findings come as the United States has stepped up requirements for foreign visitors, such as fingerprinting and tightened screening procedures at ports of entry. One-third of the travelers said they would not visit here again because of rude treatment at airports by security officials toward non-U.S. passport holders. Also cited was a fear of detention for simple mistakes or misstatements.

Discover America Partnership paid for the data. The group includes the Travel Industry Association and major lodging, theme park, restaurant and rental car companies, which want the government to promote travel and alter security programs in the name of "public diplomacy."

Visitors Decry U.S. Entry Process (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Visa Rules, Other Mandates Remain Unpopular Abroad, Travel-Industry Poll Finds

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice promised nearly a year ago to put a friendlier face on the American travel experience to help improve the U.S. image overseas. So far, foreign travelers aren't getting that impression, according to a survey by a group that seeks to pressure the government to take steps to boost travel to the U.S.

Funded by a multimillion-dollar travel-industry campaign called the Discover America Partnership, the survey found that foreigners, by a 2-1 margin, view the U.S. as offering the world's worst experience when it comes to obtaining a visa and entering the country. The Middle East, Asia and Africa all scored far better than the U.S.

The survey results, which are being released today, underscore concerns within the U.S. travel industry that the Bush administration hasn't done enough since the 2001 terrorist attacks to speed up the visa process and to improve travelers' experience at entry stations upon their arrival. Travel to the U.S. from countries other than Mexico and Canada is still down about 17% from its high in 2000, the group said. A European study found that world-wide business travel to the U.S. fell 10% in 2005 over the previous year.

The partnership argues that traveling in the U.S. makes people feel more positive about the country, thus enhancing America's long-term security. But many parts of the U.S. government continue to view travelers largely as a potential menace, the group says. "Policy makers first need to decide that they actually want more travelers to come to the U.S.," said Geoffrey Freeman, who directs the partnership. "Once they decide that, policy changes to make it happen could flow rather easily. The question is whether we have the will."

People's negative experiences appear to be heavily focused on obtaining a visa and then getting past immigration and customs' officials. Of those who had traveled in the U.S., the poll found, 63% said they had a more-favorable view of the place as a result, and 72% said that once they got past the airport, the travel experience was "great."

An array of large U.S. companies and groups, including Loews Corp., Marriott International Inc. and the Travel Industry Association, formed the partnership in September. About 50 million people came to the U.S. last year. The group wants to see that number increase to 60 million by 2010.

Ms. Rice in January announced an initiative to streamline the visa-issuing process and to turn two major airports, in Washington and Houston, into model welcoming centers with the help of the U.S. travel industry. The latter project has made almost no headway, but State Department officials say they have made substantial progress on the visa front.

The U.S. has hired 570 consular officials over the last five years and says it has substantially cut the wait time for visas in high-demand places like India and China. Visa wait times range from several days in Paris to nearly a month in Shanghai, according to the State Department's most recent figures. State Department officials also say they have made significant strides in the issuing of student visas, the number of which are up 17% in the year ending in September over the previous year.

Despite improvements, the survey found that significant numbers of those polled harbored low expectations of U.S. travel bureaucracy.

Of the 2,011 travelers interviewed overseas, 36% said they wouldn't come to the U.S. for fear of being detained by officials "for hours or worse" at the airport. Forty percent said they had tried to get a visa within the last two years but abandoned the effort. Just over half said the U.S. visa process in their country was "unreasonably inconvenient." Of those surveyed, 29% said they had been to the U.S. in the last 18 months, while over half had been to the U.S. at least once in the last five.

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Review Sees Three Options In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The Pentagon's closely guarded review of how to improve the situation in Iraq has outlined three basic options: Send in more troops, shrink the force but stay longer, or pull out, according to senior defense officials.

Insiders have dubbed the options "Go Big," "Go Long" and "Go Home." The group conducting the review is likely to recommend a combination of a small, short-term increase in U.S. troops and a long-term commitment to stepped-up training and advising of Iraqi forces, the officials said.

The military's study, commissioned by Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, comes at a time when escalating violence is causing Iraq policy to be reconsidered by both the White House and the congressionally chartered, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Pace's effort will feed into the White House review, but military officials have made it clear they are operating independently.

The Pentagon group's proceedings are so secret that officials asked to help it have not even been told its title or mandate. But in recent days the circle of those with knowledge of its deliberations has widened beyond a narrow group working for the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"Go Big," the first option, originally contemplated a large increase in U.S. troops in Iraq to try to break the cycle of sectarian and insurgent violence. A classic counterinsurgency campaign, though, would require several hundred thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers as well as heavily armed Iraqi police. That option has been all but rejected by the study group, which concluded that there are not enough troops in the U.S. military and not enough effective Iraqi forces, said sources who have been informally briefed on the review.

The sources insisted on anonymity because no one at the Pentagon has been permitted to discuss the review with outsiders. The review group is led by three high-profile colonels -- H.R. McMaster and Peter Mansoor of the Army, and Thomas C. Greenwood of the Marine Corps. None of them would comment for this article.

Spokesmen for the chairman and vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff did not return calls or respond to e-mails seeking comment.

"Go Home," the third option, calls for a swift withdrawal of U.S. troops. It was rejected by the Pentagon group as likely to push Iraq directly into a full-blown and bloody civil war.

The group has devised a hybrid plan that combines part of the first option with the second one -- "Go Long" -- and calls for cutting the U.S. combat presence in favor of a long-term expansion of the training and advisory efforts. Under this mixture of options, which is gaining favor inside the military, the U.S. presence in Iraq, currently about 140,000 troops, would be boosted by 20,000 to 30,000 for a short period, the officials said.

The purpose of the temporary but notable increase, they said, would be twofold: To do as much as possible to curtail sectarian violence, and also to signal to the Iraqi government and public that the shift to a "Go Long" option that aims to eventually cut the U.S. presence is not a disguised form of withdrawal.

Even so, there is concern that such a radical shift in the U.S. posture in Iraq could further damage the standing of its government, which U.S. officials worry is already shaky. Under the hybrid plan, the short increase in U.S. troop levels would be followed by a long-term plan to radically cut the presence, perhaps to 60,000 troops.

That combination plan, which one defense official called "Go Big But Short While Transitioning to Go Long," could backfire if Iraqis suspect it is really a way for the United States to moonwalk out of Iraq -- that is, to imitate singer Michael Jackson's trademark move of appearing to move forward while actually sliding backward. "If we commit to that concept, we have to accept upfront that it might result in the opposite of what we want," the official said.

The Pentagon official said this short-term boost could be achieved through three steps: extending the tours of duty of some units already in Iraq, sending other units there earlier than planned and activating some Army Reserve units.

The group concluded that such a step might be necessary because it is concerned that the continuing violence is undercutting the Iraqi government's credibility. "Folks increasingly realize that if violence can't be contained, the spiral downward will continue, the national government will lose the effectiveness it has . . . . and then all bets will be off," the official said.

Also, it would take months to prepare and implement the expansion of the program to train and advise Iraqi forces, he noted. The military will have to find those additional advisers, prepare them for the deployment, get infrastructure in place to house and feed them, order and ship equipment for them to use, and recruit additional Iraqis for them to train.

"The 'Go Long' approach is one that can work if there is sufficient strategic patience, resources appropriated and [if] leadership executes effectively," a military intelligence official said.

Another potential obstacle to the "Go Long" option is that it runs counter to the impulse of many congressional Democrats to find a way to get out of Iraq quickly. Planners envision taking five to 10 more years to create a stable and competent Iraqi army. Because it doesn't lead to a swift exit, some Democrats could criticize this option as a disguised version of "staying the course."

On the other hand, the hybrid version of "Go Long" may be remarkably close to the recommendation that the Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.). That group's findings, expected to be issued next month, are said to focus on changing the emphasis of U.S. military operations from combating the insurgency to training Iraqis, and also to find ways to increase security in Baghdad and bring neighboring countries into talks about stabilizing Iraq.

The Pentagon group has given a thumbs-down to what it considered variants of withdrawal, such as pulling U.S. units out of the cities and keeping them in isolated enclaves, where they would not interact with the Iraqi population but would be available to combat major insurgent offensives and also to protect the government against coups.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East, expressed a similar view last week when he told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he believes that immediate troop withdrawals would increase the violence in Iraq.

US Troop Levels In Iraq May Rise, Then Decline (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, November 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

It's being dubbed by some as the "last big push" option, and it appears increasingly to be what President Bush favors on Iraq.

Despite growing expectations of a troop withdrawal from Iraq in the wake of Democratic gains in Congress, the White House appears to be leaning in a different direction: at least a temporary rise in US troop levels.

The numbers would not be huge, perhaps 20,000 on top of the 144,000 US soldiers already fighting the war. But the idea would be to stabilize Baghdad - a priority that has proved dishearteningly elusive since September - and to allow for a major diplomatic push aimed at drawing Iraq's neighbors into resolving the spiraling violence.

Implicit in the perspective of the officials and experts who see this as a kind of military "Hail Mary" pass is the assumption that a phased reduction of US troops would begin next fall - whether or not Iraq had been brought back from the brink of all-out civil war.

Some experts who have favored increasing the number of US troops in the past say conditions have deteriorated to such a degree that before any steps are taken, the United States must first differentiate between a knee-jerk act of desperation and something that can really improve the situation in Iraq.

"Before we go to even 20,000 more troops, we'd better determine how we can sustain these numbers and whether or not it can make any difference in getting the Iraqi government to do what has to be done," says Harlan Ullman, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington.

Speculation over a temporary surge in troops has been fueled in part by sources close to administration deliberations on Iraq strategy. A troop increase has been one option on the table as the administration, faced with growing consensus that the current approach in Iraq is not working, has weighed new directions.

The Iraq Study Group - the congressionally appointed commission co-chaired by former secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic congressional leader Lee Hamilton - looks favorably on the troop spike option, according to experts who have worked with the commission. This inclination is especially true, observers say, if a troop increase were carried out in tandem with a major diplomatic push to enlist Iraq's neighbors in helping to stabilize the country and assist in its reconstruction.

Statements from Bush and Cheney

But the most explicit evidence that the White House may be moving in this direction comes from Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Their recent rhetoric appears to rule out the idea of a rapid reduction in troop levels, while maintaining an insistence on achieving "victory" in Iraq.

In Vietnam for an Asian economic summit, Bush said Friday, "We'll succeed [in Iraq] unless we quit," adding that he was assuring regional leaders gathered with him that "we'll get the job done."

And speaking Friday in Washington, Mr. Cheney suggested the midterm election results would not sway administration policy. "To get out [of Iraq] before the job is done would convince the terrorists once again that free nations will change our policies, forsake our friends, and abandon our interests whenever we are confronted with violence and blackmail," he said in a speech to the Federalist Society.

At the same time, the Pentagon on Friday issued deployment orders to maintain the current level of troops in Iraq through 2007 - with the door left open to "surging" more troops into the country as conditions and strategy dictate.

An increase is logistically possible, though at a growing cost to the troops, military experts say. Some of the soldiers slated for deployment in 2007 will be undertaking a third tour to Iraq when the expectation had been for only one.

"Just to keep the level of 144,000, we're having to extend two brigades beyond a year. So we're already talking about major hardship for these soldiers," says Lawrence Korb, an Iraq policy expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "Any increase, even a relatively small one like what they're talking about, would compound that strain."

Supporters of a troop increase say it would allow for a serious push for security in Baghdad, giving the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki breathing room to make the political decisions necessary to relaunch a "national reconciliation" drive. More US troops and money would also be put into stepped-up training of Iraqi security forces.

But critics say an increase in US troops could reduce the pressure on the Maliki government for crucial political decisions, even while inflaming Iraqi public opinion that is increasingly hostile to the US presence.

"We've already increased troop levels, and things haven't gotten any better," says Mr. Korb, who served in the Pentagon under the Reagan administration. He notes that US troop levels dipped to nearly 100,000 earlier this year before sectarian violence began ratcheting up. Too late?

Others who have supported sending in more troops in the past say the time when it could make a difference has probably passed. "I have made the argument for more troops for some time, but I no longer do because I think it's too late," says Mr. Ullman of CSIS.

The additional US troops with the right skills to potentially make a difference in Baghdad and with training Iraqi forces aren't simply sitting around somewhere at the ready, he says. Preparing them would take six months to a year, he adds.

But beyond that, Ullman says the Maliki government is beholden to political powers sustained by dozens of militias. "That's not something the US military is in a position to do anything about," he says.

Korb says sending in more troops risks signaling to the Iraqi army that it is under no increasing pressure to take on more of the burden - a point made in congressional testimony last week by Gen. John Abizaid, commander of US forces in the Middle East.

Some observers say any increase in troops would fly in the face of public opinion as expressed in the midterm elections. Polls released last week show support for Bush's handling of Iraq falling to new lows.

ARMY GIVES RUMSFELD DOCTRINE A REWRITE (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

The '07 manual puts greater value on maintaining stability than on swift action.

FT. LEAVENWORTH, KAN. — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld may be leaving under a cloud of criticism over his handling of the Iraq war, but his invasion plan — emphasizing speed over massive troop numbers — has consistently been held up as a resounding success.

Yet with Iraq near chaos 3 1/2 years later, a key Army manual now is being rewritten in a way that rejects the Rumsfeld doctrine and counsels against using it again.

The draft version of the Army's Full Spectrum Operations field manual argues that in addition to defeating the enemy, military units must focus on providing security for the population — even during major combat.

"The big idea here is that stability tasks have to be a consideration at every level and every operation," said Clinton J. Ancker III, head of the Army's Combined Arms Doctrine Directorate and an author of the guide.

Officers use the field manual, the authoritative guidebook on how to conduct ground operations, to develop tactics for military endeavors including war, counterinsurgency and peacekeeping. When completed, the manual will be taught to officers at all levels.

Before the war, Rumsfeld prodded Gen. Tommy Franks and other officers to design an invasion plan to fit his beliefs about how modern militaries should fight. When Saddam Hussein's regime collapsed and Baghdad seemed to fall in just 21 days, Rumsfeld and his emphasis on speed over mass got the credit.

But after the initial military success, the Pentagon was criticized for not doing enough to plan for postwar stability. And Rumsfeld drew objections for his dismissive attitude toward the disorder and looting in Iraq, particularly when he said, just days after the fall of Baghdad, that "stuff happens" in democracies.

The old manual emphasized that stability operations usually follow combat. The draft version of the 2007 ground operations manual instructs commanders that they cannot wait for offensive operations to end before providing security and services for the population, and stresses a combination of offense, defense and stability operations.

"Army forces must defeat enemies and simultaneously shape the civil situation through stability or civil support operations," says the manual, the contents of which were described to the Los Angeles Times by its authors. Scheduled to be completed and made public next year, the guidebook does not explicitly criticize the invasion, and in fact notes how the Iraqi military forces collapsed in the face of the swift American attack. Nevertheless, some of the ideas the guide embraces contrast sharply with Rumsfeld's invasion blueprint.

"Iraq is the hardest test case you can dream up," said manual coauthor Michael D. Burke, who works at the doctrine directorate. "There is a lot of value in overwhelming your enemy and ending intensive combat."

But he added: "In Iraq, military operations were the catalyst for collapsing the Baathist regime and leaving a complete power vacuum."

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman declined to comment on the new doctrine, citing the manual's draft status. But he pointed to a November 2005 directive that established "nation-building" as one of the military's core missions. Though it said that such efforts were best performed by civilians, the directive arguably set the stage for the Army's more thorough examination of its role in stability operations.

The new manual does not contradict Rumsfeld's belief that a smaller American force can defeat a larger enemy military, but it does say that dealing with the collapse of a government is likely to require more troops than the military action itself.

And when civil authority collapses in the face of an American assault, U.S. commanders must ensure the population is protected and fed, even if the offensive operations have not concluded, the manual says. That means, Ancker said, the Army can be fast or it can be small, but it cannot be both and also lay the groundwork for winning the peace.

Rumsfeld's critics generally have pointed to summer 2003 as the period when the most important misstep was made in Iraq. American forces were drawn down, and the military did not react quickly to confront a rising insurgency.

The draft manual says the seeds of an insurgency can be planted early on, even during initial military operations. And the guide's authors say the missteps that gave rise to the insurgency may have occurred during the march to Baghdad.

"There is a period of time in the immediate aftermath of any fight where the population will rely on the [American] military to keep them safe and provide essential services," Ancker said.

The concept, according to Ancker, is akin to what battlefield medics call the "golden hour" — the short period in which patients can be saved if their wounds are properly treated. During an offensive operation, if a military does not try to at least bandage the wounds of a society, the effort can suffer even if the battle is won. After an urban battle, commanders must try to provide basic services and security, the manual says.

"If we do not plan to account for those tasks in the immediate aftermath of a fight," Ancker said, "then there is a period of time somebody else can step in and use that failure as a lever to create disaffected parts of the population, and that can turn into … an insurgency."

Under the new guidebook, if a unit does not have the forces to conduct stability operations after an offensive mission, the commander must request more manpower.

"When possible, the commander should consider and attempt to relieve the suffering of the local population," the manual says.

"If his resources and mission dictates that he cannot do this then he is obligated, morally and legally, to inform his higher headquarters so they can provide resources to ensure civil security and minimal essential services."

Older doctrine divided the Army's duties into war and other missions, like peacekeeping. The old manual — completed in 2001 after the military's experience in Bosnia and Somalia — said the Army needed to be ready to conduct offensive operations even during stability missions. The 2007 manual, written during the Iraq experience, argues that even when on offense, the Army needs to be ready to conduct stability operations.

Previous manuals have argued that if a force is trained for major war, it also will be able to handle counterinsurgency or peacekeeping. The new guidebook will note that units must be ready to do both, but it also will say training for a primarily offensive force should differ from training for stability operations.

"Operational experience demonstrates that forces trained exclusively for offensive and defensive operations are not as proficient at stability operations as those units that train specifically for stability," the guide says, alluding to lessons learned in Iraq.

Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who as commander of the Combined Arms Center at Ft. Leavenworth oversees the doctrine directorate, argued in a speech in September at the nonpartisan Brookings Institution think tank that the 2007 guide should have wide influence on Army doctrine.

"It will ripple throughout everything that we do, because this is the capstone manual from which all others take their lead," Petraeus said.

Some think the manual focuses too much on major combat operations, like invasions, and not enough on counterinsurgency. Others think the emphasis on stability threatens to focus the Army too much on the "soft stuff."

Ft. Leavenworth will host a conference in January to discuss the manual, and to make sure the document strikes the right balance and embraces the lessons learned in Iraq.

"We cannot move away from fighting and winning wars," Ancker said. "But the combat side is not adequate to ensure the peace."

Rebuilding In Iraq Tops 4,000 Projects (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

When and if the smoke ever clears in Iraq, Pentagon officials say the world finally will see a minor miracle.

"Most Americans don't understand something equivalent to the Marshall Plan has been accomplished in Iraq," said Dean G. Popps, principal assistant secretary of the Army for acquisitions, logistics and technology.

The Army is the program manager for $20 billion in U.S. taxpayer money that flowed to Iraq after the 2003 invasion to spur a building boom of more than 4,000 projects.

Amid constant deadly threats from bloodthirsty insurgents, and without a viable Iraqi private contracting sector, the Army Corps of Engineers has supervised the construction of electric grids, health care centers, schools, water and sewage treatment facilities, police stations, academies and border posts.

Not counting the deteriorating security situation, no facet of the Iraq war has received more negative press than the U.S.- and Iraqi-financed reconstruction. The Washington Times, along with other newspapers, has published a series of articles on setbacks and corruption. But, the Pentagon contends there is another storyline.

"It's quite a heroic story maligned often by the news media," Mr. Popps said during an interview in his E-Ring Pentagon office. A nearby multicolored map designates hundreds of projects started and completed, from Mosul to Basra.

Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, has issued a steady stream of reports revealing fraud and mismanagement. Perhaps his most damaging finding was that nearly a quarter of $37 billion in United Nations-secured oil money -- not U.S. taxpayer funds -- shipped to Iraq cannot be traced and was likely stolen.

But Mr. Bowen has said fraud involving U.S. money, while serious, is not widespread and that the huge majority of projects proceeded as required. And, a Bowen report to Congress last summer seemed to back up Mr. Popps' message of progress.

"Although the story of Iraq reconstruction has been punctuated by shortfalls and deficiencies, the infrastructure overview provided [in] this quarterly report presents a picture of significant progress achieved through a substantial U.S. investment of time, talent and tax dollars in Iraq's relief and reconstruction."

Mr. Popps said it is first important to understand what the rebuilding team inherited. U.S. intelligence knew little about the actual state of Iraq's energy infrastructure and social service network. When the Army Corps of Engineers got on the ground, there was shock:

·The three regional sewage treatments plants in greater Baghdad did not work; raw waste poured into the Tigris River and downstream through villages. Sadr City, the impoverished Shi'ite slum repressed by the ruling Sunni Ba'ath Party, lacked any sewage system. "Some slam the Americans because there is sewage in Sadr City," said an incredulous Mr. Popps. "Please."

·Few towns had a central supply of clean water.

·The electrical grid suffered under 1950s technology and disrepair. Saddam Hussein starved the rest of the country of power to give the capital of 6 million about 20 hours a day.

·The country lacked any primary health care facilities; hospitals and schools were run down and lacked supplies. New hospitals had not been built in 20 years. More than half the public health centers remained closed. Of 13,000 schools, more than 10,000 needed significant renovations.

The Pentagon in 2003 summoned American firms to get reconstruction started in the absence of Iraqi ministries that could supervise and a private sector that was in shambles under Saddam's totalitarian rule.

"The ministries were jammed with people who did nothing," Mr. Popps said. "They sat around and smoked and drank tea and held 'worry beads.' It was an economy based on incompetence and corruption."

Today, the Pentagon is handing out a score sheet:

·Six new primary care facilities, with 66 more under construction; 11 hospitals renovated; more than 800 schools fixed up; more than 300 police stations and facilities and 248 border control forts.

DOJ_NMG_0096173

·Added 407,000 cubic meters per day of water treatment; a new sewage-treatment system for Basra; work on Baghdad's three plants continues; oil production exceeds the 2002 level of 2 million barrels a day by 500,000.

·The Ministry of Electricity now sends power to Baghdad for four to eight hours a day, and 10 to 12 for the rest of the country. Iraqis are now free to buy consumer items such as generators, which provide some homes with power around-the-clock.

Mr. Popps said all this was accomplished despite a concerted effort by terrorists to bomb construction sites and kill workers. Thursday's kidnapping of private contractors south of Baghdad illustrates the problem. The State Department was forced to increase spending on security, up to $5 billion of the $20 billion, or risk losing more projects to saboteurs.

The Army Corps has ferried reporters to what it considers successful sites in an effort to get a few positive stories on reconstruction. But rarely do any materialize, Mr. Popps said.

"What has hurt the public perception of reconstruction is incomplete leaks to the media that there is a problem with a particular project," he said. "What is sexy to reporters is a police station that has urine in the ceiling. That's what the press prefers to talk about rather than the great successes we have made."

The "urine" reference was contained in the latest bad news story about reconstruction in Iraq. Mr. Bowen reported in September he was reviewing all projects done by the California-based Parsons Corp. in the aftermath of finding serious plumbing problems at the $75 million Baghdad Police College. Mr. Bowen has criticized Parsons, which uses local Iraqi contractors, on other projects, including primary health care buildings.

The company has cited the violent environment as part of the problem. A Pentagon spokesman said the company made all repairs by an Oct. 6 target at no government cost.

There are two key money amounts devoted to reconstruction: One is $37 billion in cash the U.N. turned over to Iraq in 2003. The second is $36 billion appropriated by Congress, $20 billion of which was the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund. The remaining $16 billion is evenly divided for building the Iraqi security forces and for various military projects, some controlled by U.S. commanders.

In late September, Iraq rebuilders received some praise from Mr. Bowen. He made one of his periodic appearances before the House Government Reform Committee, where Chairman Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, said there was some good news out of the war-wrecked country.

"You said accurately in your opening statement that not everything is wrong in Iraq, and that's true," Mr. Bowen responded. "A fair reading of our full report demonstrably underscores that fact. Indeed, 70 percent of the projects we've visited and 80 percent of the money allocated to them indicate that those projects, from a construction perspective, have met what the contract anticipated."

Victory In Iraq Impossible, Says Kissinger (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent, And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Henry Kissinger, the former US secretary of state who has advised the Bush administration on the war in Iraq, on Sunday said he no longer believed a military victory was possible in the conflict.

“If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control . . . I don’t believe that is possible,” Mr Kissinger told BBC television.

His dire assessment of the war, and view that the US should engage Iraq’s neighbours in seeking a diplomatic solution, reinforced calls by Democratic lawmakers in Washington for the White House to speak to Iran and Syria to help stem the tide of violence in Iraq.

Mr Kissinger’s remarks came as Walid Muallem, Syria’s foreign minister, became the most senior Syrian politician to visit Baghdad since the US-led invasion.

Mr Muallem said violence in Iraq would be reduced if a timetable was set for the withdrawal of US forces.

But interviews with senior lawmakers on US talk shows on Sunday underscored the wide divide that exists not only on the question of whether engaging Syria and Iran would be fruitful, but whether the White House needed to boost US troop deployment in the short term or begin the process of bringing troops home.

Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, suggested on ABC’s This Week that he would consider calling for American troops to leave Iraq if the White House did not agree to send additional forces to secure the country – a proposition President George W. Bush has previously rejected. Mr McCain said US troops were “fighting and dying for a failed policy”, but added that he would “exhaust every possibility” to fix the situation before calling for troops to abandon Iraq, because the consequences of losing the war were “severe”.

Another senator, Democrat Carl Levin, who will take on the chairmanship of the armed services committee, countered on CNN's Late Edition that he supported a phased withdrawal of troops to put a "pressure point on the neighbours who do not want Iraq to disintegrate".

The depth of the sectarian violence in Iraq was underscored by the news that Ammar al-Saffar, the deputy health minister, was kidnapped from his Baghdad home just one day after another Shia politician, Ali al-Adhadh, was killed. A Sunni insurgent group claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing that killed 22 people in Hilla, the mainly Shia neighbourhood south of Baghdad, in retaliation for a mass kidnapping from a Sunni-run education institute last week.

Separately, the New York-based Human Rights Watch said in a statement due to be released on Monday that the just-concluded trial of Saddam Hussein and members of his regime was marred by so many flaws that the verdict was unsound. "The court's conduct, as documented in this report, reflects a basic lack of understanding of fundamental fair trial principles, and how to uphold them in the conduct of a relatively complex trial. The result is a trial that did not meet key fair trial standards," the report concluded.

Mr Hussein and two other members of his regime were sentenced to death on November 5, following a year-long trial on charges related to a campaign of reprisals against the Shia village of Dujail.

Among the flaws listed in the 97-page report was the presentation of evidence that was not given in advance of the trial to the defence and testimony from absent witnesses that was read into the record without giving the defence a chance to challenge those witnesses. Administrative problems included lack of planning for the security of defence counsels, three of whom were assassinated.

In addition, the HRW report argued that the evidence had big gaps, in particular its failure to show Mr Hussein's regime worked.

Kissinger: Iraq Military Win Impossible (AP)

By Tariq Panja

AP, November 20, 2006

Military victory is no longer possible in Iraq, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said in a television interview broadcast Sunday.

Kissinger presented a bleak vision of Iraq, saying the U.S. government must enter into dialogue with Iraq's regional neighbors — including Iran — if progress is to be made in the region.

"If you mean by 'military victory' an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," he told the British Broadcasting Corp.

But Kissinger, an architect of the Vietnam war who has advised President Bush about Iraq, warned against a rapid withdrawal of coalition troops, saying it could destabilize Iraq's neighbors and cause a long-lasting conflict.

"A dramatic collapse of Iraq — whatever we think about how the situation was created — would have disastrous consequences for which we would pay for many years and which would bring us back, one way or another, into the region," he said.

Kissinger, whose views have been sought by the Iraqi Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker III, called for an international conference bringing together the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, Iraq's neighbors — including Iran — and regional powers like India and Pakistan to work out a way forward for the region.

"I think we have to redefine the course, but I don't think that the alternative is between military victory, as defined previously, or total withdrawal," he said.

Syrian Foreign Minister, In Baghdad, Calls For Timetable On U.S. Troop Withdrawal (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Monday, Nov. 20 — Syria's foreign minister said Sunday during a visit here that his government was prepared to help stabilize Iraq, and he called for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops, saying that it would help reduce the violence.

His trip, the first to Baghdad by a senior Syrian official since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, came on another day of widespread violence in Iraq. A suicide car bombing killed 17 people and wounded 49 in the southern Shiite city of Hilla, and the deputy health minister was kidnapped from his home in the capital.

In recent weeks, Iraqi and some Western officials have promoted the idea of actively involving Iraq's neighbors, especially Syria and Iran, in the search for a solution to the soaring sectarian violence in Iraq.

President Bush has refused to open high-level talks with Syria and Iran, countries he has accused of providing financing and weapons to militias in Iraq. But as his administration conducts a broad reassessment of its policy in Iraq, the president has come under increasing pressure to drop his opposition.

James A. Baker III, the Republican co-chairman of a bipartisan group studying policy options in Iraq, has met several times with Syrian officials to discuss how they might cooperate with the United States, according to the Syrian ambassador to Washington.

In an interview with the BBC broadcast Sunday, former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger endorsed the idea of involving Syria and Iran in the discussion of Iraq's future, suggesting that they be included in an international conference.

"At some early point, an international conference should be called that involves neighbors, perhaps the permanent members of the Security Council and countries that have a major interest in the outcome, like India and Pakistan," said Mr. Kissinger, who sometimes advises the Bush administration on Iraq policy, and who has been consulted by Mr. Baker's Iraq Study Group. "I believe America has to be in some dialogue with Iran."

Elaborating on his argument for a change in course, Mr. Kissinger said that a clear-cut military victory was no longer achievable. At the same time, he argued that withdrawing American forces might lead to a civil war more violent than the fighting that occurred in the former Yugoslavia.

"If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," Mr. Kissinger said.

"If we were to withdraw all the forces without any international understanding and without any even partial solution of some of the problems, the civil war in Iraq will take on even more violent forms," he said.

Syria's foreign minister, Walid al-Moallem, promised Sunday to cooperate with Iraqi officials in an effort to curb violence. Iraqi and American officials have accused Syria of not doing enough to prevent the flow of foreign fighters and munitions across the Syria-Iraq border.

At a brief news conference with Iraq's foreign minister, Hoshiyar Zebari, Mr. Moallem said he condemned "all the terrorism taking place in Iraq."

He added, "The security and stability of Iraq is vital for the security and stability of Syria."

But Mr. Moallem also urged a timetable for a pullout of American forces, saying it "would contribute to reducing the violence in Iraq." The Bush administration has steadfastly refused to put a timetable in place.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, said in an interview last week that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had been "working hard" to bring Iraq's neighboring countries into the discussions on how to achieve stability in Iraq.

Mr. Rubaie said: "He's reaching out to them, sending envoys. He's sending a very clear message that unless Iraq is stable and secure, nobody's going to be secure."

Mr. Moallem said Sunday that his visit to Iraq was not related to any pressure by Western officials. "I came here to please the people of Iraq and the people of Syria," he said.

In the Hilla car bombing, the deadliest attack of the day in Iraq, a man driving a minibus loaded with explosives pulled alongside a group of day laborers who had gathered on a street corner to wait for employment offers.

As the men eagerly swarmed the van, the driver pushed a detonator and blew up the vehicle.

By nightfall, the police had captured three men suspected of involvement in the attack, including one Iraqi and two Egyptians, according to Maj. Gen. Qais al-Mamouri, the police chief in the town of Babil, near Hilla.

The men confessed and said the suicide bomber was Syrian, the general said.

DOJ_NMG_0096176

The kidnapping of the deputy health minister, Ammar al-Saffar, occurred Sunday evening when heavily armed gunmen dressed in the uniforms of Iraqi security forces stormed his house in northern Baghdad and took him away in a convoy of vehicles, officials said.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry, Mohammad al-Askari, said that the kidnappers had been wearing the uniforms of the national police and were not members of the armed forces, but a police official said that the gunmen had been wearing Iraqi Army uniforms.

Calls seeking comments from the spokesmen for the government and from the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police force, were not answered.

The kidnapping appeared to have sectarian overtones. Mr. Saffar is Shiite and a member of Mr. Maliki's Dawa Party. The Health Ministry has been widely accused by Sunni Arab leaders of favoring Shiites and even harboring Shiite death squads that single out Sunnis.

Five days ago gunmen wearing police uniforms and suspected of being members of a Shiite militia kidnapped dozens of people from the Ministry of Higher Education, which is overseen by a Sunni Arab minister and has long been viewed by Shiites as a Sunni-dominated institution.

The Iraqi police in the southern city of Basra said they had rounded up 200 suspected insurgents during a search for four American security contractors and an Austrian who were kidnapped Thursday when their truck convoy was ambushed near Safwan.

Maj. Gen. Ali al-Musawi, a police commander in Basra, said the search for the captives was continuing.

Three car bombs were detonated almost simultaneously in a bus depot in a predominantly Shiite neighborhood of eastern Baghdad, killing at least 10 people, wounding another 45 and destroying vehicles and shops in the area, witnesses and officials said.

A group of witnesses and residents who gathered at the site soon afterward blamed Sunni Arab insurgents for the attacks. They directed their ire at the country's Sunni leaders. "Let them come here and see what their followers are doing," one of them shouted.

Other attacks reported by the police in Baghdad, Diyala Province, Kirkuk and the northern town of Hawija killed a total of at least 44 people and wounded at least 71. The police in Diyala also reported killing 14 insurgents.

The American command reported early Monday that a soldier from the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed when his vehicle struck a bomb in southeastern Baghdad on Saturday.

Syria Vows To Help Quell Violence In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 19 -- Syria's foreign minister, in a rare visit to Baghdad by a Syrian official, on Sunday pledged cooperation in stemming the sectarian violence that threatens Iraq, even as scores of people were killed or found dead across the country.

One of the deadliest attacks occurred in the southern Shiite Muslim city of Hilla, where a suicide bomber killed 22 day laborers after luring them to his minivan with the promise of work. An attack near the northern city of Kirkuk killed three children who were lured to a booby-trapped doll.

The Iraqi and U.S. governments have accused Syria of contributing to the violence by allowing fighters to cross into Iraq to join the insurgency. Foreign Minister Waleed al-Muallem's visit, the first by such a high-ranking Syrian official since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, was seen as a step toward smoothing those relations. But he also called on the Bush administration to set a timetable for withdrawing troops.

"Syria's intensions toward Iraq are good in all times, and on that principle we are looking forward to a good relationship between Iraq and Syria that takes history and common interests into consideration," Muallem said during a news conference with Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari.

Syria and Iraq have been adversaries since the 1980s, when Syria sided with Iran in its war against Iraq.

"This visit will be the starting point to solve all of our problems," Zebari said.

Those problems were apparent Sunday.

At least 111 people were killed or found dead Sunday, the Associated Press reported. Fifty-six bodies, many of them showing signs of torture, were dumped in three cities.

In the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, unknown gunmen shot and killed three members of a family. A roadside bomb and two car bombs exploded one after the other near a bus station in Mashtal, a mostly Shiite area of southeastern Baghdad, killing 11.

DOJ_NMG_0096177

Gunmen kidnapped one of Iraq's deputy health ministers, Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite, from his home in northern Baghdad, just a day after a prominent Shiite politician was gunned down. Iraqi army and police said the gunmen wore police uniforms. Last week, dozens of people were kidnapped at a Ministry of Higher Education office, also by men in police uniforms.

Some prominent U.S. officials say that engaging in talks with adversaries such as Syria and Iran is key to curbing the violence. The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton, is expected to recommend such action in its report, set to come out next month.

U.S. officials have resisted talks with Iran because they believe the Tehran government has fomented tension in Iraq and because they are worried about its growing influence in the region.

U.S. officials also say Syria's borders have become an entry point into Iraq for Sunni Arab insurgents. Muallem denied that assertion.

"We are making all efforts to secure the borders, but that does not come from one side only," he said. "America has not been able to stamp out its borders with Mexico, so they started to build a wall between them, and that tells us how it is difficult to control the borders."

According to an Iraqi general in Hilla, an Iraqi and two Egyptians arrested in the suicide bombing told officials that the bomber was Syrian.

Elsewhere, security forces detained 200 suspected insurgents in southern Iraq in their search for five private security contractors, including four Americans, who were kidnapped near the Kuwait border.

Officials announced Sunday that forces killed two suspected terrorists in airstrikes near Baghdad on Saturday and eight in a raid in Ramadi. In Tikrit, nearly 50 insurgents were killed and 20 captured during a five-day mission, officials said. Six Iraqi soldiers and two coalition forces soldiers were killed while clearing roads of improvised explosive devices.

Special correspondents Saad Sarhan and Waleed Saffar and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Syria Urges Timeline In Iraq (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — Syria's foreign minister called Sunday for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq, and his counterpart in Baghdad demanded that Damascus take action against insurgent financiers and organizers hiding there.

It was the highest-level meeting between the neighboring countries since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

"We think that the presence of a timetable for withdrawal of foreign troops will assist in reducing the violence and creating security," said Walid Moallem, the most senior Syrian official to visit Iraq since the war started.

President Bush has rejected proposed timelines to leave Iraq.

In a news conference in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, Moallem denied suggestions that Syria had been pressured by the U.S. to meet with Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari.

The visit followed news reports that James A. Baker III, the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan U.S. panel, had contacted Syrian officials for help in stopping the violence in Iraq.

In Washington, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) on Sunday reiterated his call for a short-term increase in troops for Iraq.

The Republican presidential hopeful told ABC's "This Week" that the move might cause a "terrible strain" on the U.S. military, but said "there's only one thing worse and that is defeat … and we've been losing."

McCain added that U.S. troops were "fighting and dying for a failed policy" and needed reinforcements to ensure victory.

"The consequences of failure are catastrophic," he said. "It will spread to the region. You will see Iran more emboldened. Eventually, you could see Iran pose a greater threat to the state of Israel."

The political developments came as violence continued across Iraq.

A Marine was killed in Al Anbar province Sunday, the U.S. military said. And Iraqi special forces today, aided by U.S. advisors, raided a Sadr City mosque compound thought to be harboring kidnappers, the military said. There were no casualties reported. Three people were arrested.

On Sunday, at least 45 bodies were discovered in various areas of Baghdad, and three explosions killed at least 11 people and injured 32 in the Baghdad neighborhood of Mashtal, where an Iraqi police colonel and his guard were slain earlier.

And in two separate kidnappings in the capital, Shiite Muslim Deputy Health Minister Ammar Safar and Sunni Arab criminal court Judge Mudhaffar Ubaidi disappeared Sunday.

Additional attacks occurred across Iraq.

In Hawija, 35 miles southwest of Kirkuk, insurgents put an explosive in a toy and left it near a house. The toy exploded when children approached, killing three and injuring at least one.

DOJ_NMG_0096178

In the southern city of Hillah, at least 17 people were killed and 49 injured when a suicide bomber lured laborers into his minivan and detonated explosives.

Violence also hit Kirkuk, where a man set off his explosives belt during a funeral, killing three people and injuring at least 24.

"I was walking with my friends near the funeral and we felt a big explosion," said Mustafa Iden, 33. "We rushed to the explosion site and saw bodies of people torn apart. There were body parts all over."

There was still no word on the fate of five private security guards — four Americans and one Austrian — kidnapped Thursday in southern Iraq by gunmen in Iraqi police uniforms.

In Washington, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said he planned to introduce legislation that would reinstate the military draft, which was eliminated in 1973 near the end of the Vietnam War.

And former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, in a British Broadcasting Corp. television interview broadcast Sunday, said that "a clear military victory" was no longer possible in Iraq.

"If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," Kissinger said.

With the ongoing violence in Iraq, Washington is considering a diplomatic push for greater cooperation with Iraq's neighbors, including Syria and Iran.

U.S. and Iraqi leaders say Syria and Iran have undermined security in Iraq by allowing the cross-border flow of weapons and militants.

"There is even money smuggled by the families of the former regime in Syria," said Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi government spokesman. "These are unimaginable sums and they are being used to fund terrorism in Iraq. These activities are clear and evident in Syria, and they are countenanced by the government."

Zebari said that he discussed with Moallem the possibility of reestablishing full diplomatic relations and that he looked forward to meeting again.

Zebari also said that he hoped the meeting would create regional momentum to help Iraq establish greater security.

"We don't expect to solve all of our problems at one time or with one visit," he said. "We wanted to make a starting point to open the way in solving all our disputes in good faith.

"This visit will send a good message to all the regional players that they should seriously support Iraq's security and stability."

Syria Calls For U.S. Timetable In Iraq (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, November 20, 2006

Syria's foreign minister called Sunday for a timetable for the withdrawal of American forces to help end Iraq's sectarian bloodbath, in a groundbreaking diplomatic mission to Iraq that comes amid increasing calls for the U.S. to seek cooperation from Syria and Iran. At least 112 people were killed nationwide, following a week that had already seen hundreds of deaths.

Walid Moallem, the highest level Syrian official to visit since the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein, denounced terrorism in Iraq even as Washington mulled its own overture to Damascus for help in ending Iraq's violence.

Syria and Iraq share a long and porous desert border and both Baghdad and Washington have accused Damascus of not doing enough to stop the flow of foreign Arab fighters.

Moallem spoke at the end of a day that saw suspected Sunni Muslim bombers kill at least 33 Shiites and the kidnapping of a deputy health minister — believed the senior-most government official abducted in Iraq. Many Sunni attackers are believed to have infiltrated from Syria.

A suicide bomber in the predominantly Shiite city of Hillah south of Baghdad lured men to his KIA minivan with promises of a day's work as laborers, then blew it up, killing at least 22 and wounding 44, police said.

Babil province police Capt. Muthana Khalid said three suspected terrorists, two Egyptians and an Iraqi, were arrested on suspicion of planning the suicide attack with the bomber, a Syrian.

Within hours, a roadside bomb and two car bombs exploded one after another near a bus station in Mashtal, a mostly Shiite area of southeastern Baghdad, killing 11 and wounding 51, police said.

Besides the victims of the bombings in Hillah and Baghdad, at least 23 other people were killed nationwide. In addition, the bodies of 56 murder victims, many of them tortured, were dumped in three Iraqi cities, 45 of them in Baghdad alone.

DOJ_NMG_0096179

Also Sunday, gunmen kidnapped Iraq's deputy health minister from his home in northern Baghdad, the Iraqi army and police reported. They said the gunmen wore police uniforms and arrived in seven vehicles to abduct Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite.

Al-Saffar was snatched nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. That ministry is predominantly Sunni.

In the deep south of Iraq, security forces searching for five private security contractors, four Americans and an Austrian who were kidnapped near the Kuwait border, detained about 200 suspected insurgents, police said Sunday. Police Maj. Gen. Ali al-Moussawi said none of the hostages was found.

Family members identified one of the American captives as Jonathon Cote, 23, a native of Getzville, N.Y. He worked as a security guard for Crescent Security Group, his stepmother said. Family members spoke to The Associated Press anonymously out of fear for Cote's safety. A second captive was identified late last week as Paul Reuben, 39, a former police officer from a Minneapolis, Minn., suburb.

In one of the most significant diplomatic breakthrough since the ouster of Saddam, a restoration of contacts between Damascus and Baghdad was seen as a means of convincing Damascus to exert tighter control over its border.

The frontier has been a major crossing point for Sunni Arab fighters who infiltrated to join the insurgency that has been responsible for the deaths of most U.S. soldiers since the American led invasion in 2003.

Fighters for Al-Qaida in Iraqi and allied terror groups, who also have crossed from Syria, have killed hundreds of Americans as well as tens of thousands of Iraqis in bombings, drive-by shootings and mortar attacks.

Syria broke diplomatic ties with Iraq in 1982, accusing Iraq of inciting riots by the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Syria. Damascus also sided with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war. Trade ties were restored in 1997.

In addition to Baghdad and Washington's complaints about poor border control, the two countries have blasted Syria for supporting the insurgency by allowing Saddam loyalists to take refuge in Damascus to organize financing and arms shipments. Syria denies the charges.

A U.S. blue ribbon panel on Iraq, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democrat Rep. Lee Hamilton, will soon release recommendations on how to avoid the collapse of an increasingly violent and chaotic Iraq.

The proposals were expected to include openings to Syrian and Iran in a bid to internationalize efforts to clamp the sectarian conflict.

Iran is believed to be financing and arming Shiite militias in Iraq who have engaged insurgents and Sunni civilians in civil-war style conflict in Baghdad and surround cities and towns. Many of the Shiite militia fighters were trained by Iran's elite Revolutionary Guard.

Even as diplomacy gained some traction, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who negotiated an end to the Vietnam War more than 30 years ago, said a conventional victory was no longer an option for Washington.

"If you mean, by 'military victory,' an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," he told the BBC's Sunday AM program.

Kissinger has also said Iran and Syria need to be drawn into efforts to curb violence.

By luring workers to his bomb in Hillah, the suicide attacker used a technique has been employed repeatedly in poor Shiite regions throughout Iraq where unemployment is especially high and men often must hire themselves out daily to feed their families. Sunday is a working day in mostly Muslim Iraq.

"The sudden explosion shook the whole area and shattered the windows of a store where I was standing," said Muhsin Hadi Alwan, 33, one of the wounded jobseekers. "The ground was covered with the remains of people and blood, and survivors ran in all directions."

"How will I feed the six members of my family when I return home without work and without money?" Alwan asked.

The U.S. military announced that five-days of joint operations with Iraqi forces in the region between Tikrit and Kirkuk killed nearly 50 Sunni insurgent fighters and led to the capture of 20. The announcement detailed the discovery of huge arms caches, usable portions of which were turned over to the Iraqi army to equip its soldiers. The military did not say when the operation began or ended nor precisely where it took place.

U.S. and Iraqi forces also killed 12 insurgents, detained 11 and freed eight Iraqi hostages during raids in Baqouba and two villages near Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad, police said. Iraqi forces also killed a local al-Qaida in Iraq leader and his son in a village 60 miles north of Baghdad.

Syrian Foreign Minister Visits Baghdad (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096180

BAGHDAD — As kidnappings and suicide bombings continued in Iraq on Sunday, Syria's foreign minister made a groundbreaking visit to Baghdad.

Walid Moallem, the highest-level Syrian official to visit since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, denounced terrorism and called for a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

His arrival was a significant breakthrough from a country that broke diplomatic ties with Iraq in 1982. It comes as a U.S. blue-ribbon panel studying Iraq, led by former secretary of State James Baker, is working on recommendations on avoiding the collapse of the country. Among the expected proposals is engaging in talks with Syria and Iran in a bid to internationalize efforts to clamp down on the sectarian conflict.

The U.S. and Iraqi governments have accused Syria of maintaining poor control of the border it shares with Iraq. The border has become a major crossing point for Sunni Arab fighters joining the insurgency that has been responsible for the most deaths of U.S. servicemembers since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Elsewhere in Iraq, gunmen kidnapped Iraq's deputy health minister from his home in northern Baghdad, the Iraqi army and police reported Sunday.

They said the gunmen wore police uniforms and arrived in seven vehicles to abduct Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite. He is one of the most senior government officials to be kidnapped.

Al-Saffar was snatched nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from the predominantly-Sunni Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. In the deep south of Iraq, meanwhile, security forces searching for five private security contractors kidnapped near the Kuwait border detained about 200 suspected insurgents, police said Sunday. Police Maj. Gen. Ali al-Moussawi said none of the hostages — four Americans and an Austrian — was found.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Michael McClellan said Sunday that U.S. officials believe the five hostages are still being held by their captors.

In other developments:

·The Iraqi court that sentenced former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein to hang this month was guilty of shortcomings so serious that a fair trial for the former president was all but impossible, according to a 97-page report on the trial released today by New York-based Human Rights Watch. The report is based on interviews with judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Saddam and seven others went on trial a year ago for crimes against humanity over the killing of 148 people from Dujail following an attempt there on Saddam's life in 1982. The report said the judiciary lacked the expertise for such a complex trial and urged the government to let experienced international jurists take part in future trials.

·A suicide bomber in a minivan lured day laborers to his vehicle with promises of jobs Sunday morning, then blew it up, killing 22 people and wounding 44 in the mainly Shiite southern city of Hillah, Babil province police Capt. Muthanna Khalid said. He said three suspected terrorists — two Egyptians and an Iraqi — were arrested on suspicion of planning the suicide attack with the bomber, a Syrian.

·The U.S. military announced that five days of joint operations with Iraqi forces between Tikrit and Kirkuk killed nearly 50 Sunni insurgents and led to the capture of 20. The announcement detailed the discovery of large arms caches, usable portions of which were turned over to the Iraqi army.

McCain: Many More Troops Needed In Iraq (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. John McCain, a prominent Republican presidential contender for the 2008 elections, said Sunday that the United States must send an overwhelming number of troops to stabilize Iraq or face the possibility of more terrorist attacks — in the region and on American soil.

"I believe the consequences of failure are catastrophic. It will spread to the region. We left Vietnam. It was over. We just had to heal the wounds of war," said McCain, R-Ariz., who spent 5½ years in Vietnam as a prisoner of war. "We leave this place, (with) chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict."

McCain's comments on ABC's This Week came as former secretary of State Henry Kissinger told the British Broadcasting Corp. that military victory in Iraq is not possible, "if you mean by 'military victory' an Iraqi government that … gets the civil war and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support."

Kissinger, an architect of the Vietnam War who has advised President Bush on Iraq, also warned against a rapid withdrawal of coalition troops, saying it could cause a long-lasting conflict.

Meanwhile, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., speaking on CBS' Face the Nation, said he will introduce a bill next year that would require men and woman to serve in the armed forces or in alternative service.

DOJ_NMG_0096181

Rangel said as early as 2003 that a draft for those turning 18 is needed to meet military requirements and to eliminate what he said is a disproportionate role minorities and lower-income families shoulder in the military.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq… (if) members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," said Rangel, in line to be the next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The U.S. military has strained to maintain a level of about 141,000 troops since the March 2003 invasion.

Democrats poised to take control of the House and Senate after this month's midterm congressional elections are pressing for a substantial reduction of U.S. troops in Iraq and a timetable for their withdrawal.

"We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction" of troops, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, told CNN's Late Edition. "If you don't do that, they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way."

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, has said it would be unrealistic to raise troop levels as proposed by McCain and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

McCain said it was time to use decisive force with a clear exit strategy: "You've got to ask yourself some questions. One, 'Are we winning?' And I think the answer is no. The other is, 'What are the consequences of defeat? Can we still win?' Yes, I believe we can. It'll be tough, but we need to do it."

McCain Says More Troops Needed In Iraq (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin

AP, November 20, 2006

Without additional troops to ensure victory in Iraq, the U.S. could find itself more vulnerable to terrorist attacks at home, Sen. John McCain said Sunday.

Taking the opposite tack, newly empowered Democrats pressed their case for a phased withdrawal of American forces. They hoped a blue-ribbon advisory panel would propose a way ahead for Iraq, while making clear the U.S. military mission shouldn't last indefinitely.

McCain, a front-running GOP presidential hopeful for 2008, said the U.S. must send an overwhelming number of troops to stabilize Iraq or face more attacks — in the region and possibly on American soil.

"I believe the consequences of failure are catastrophic," said McCain, R-Ariz. "It will spread to the region. You will see Iran more emboldened. Eventually, you could see Iran pose a greater threat to the state of Israel."

With about 141,000 U.S. troops in Iraq more than 3 1/2 years into the war, the American military has strained to provide enough forces while allowing for adequate rest and retraining between deployments.

But McCain, who spent 5 1/2 years as a prisoner of war after his Navy plane was shot down in 1967, recalled the Vietnam War's lessons. "We left Vietnam. It was over. We just had to heal the wounds of war," he said. "We leave this place, chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict, in my view, a lot more."

McCain said he based his judgment partly on the writings of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the al-Qaida leader in Iraq who was killed in a U.S. air raid, and of Osama bin Laden.

"The consequences of failure are so severe that I will exhaust every possibility to try to fix this situation. Because it's not the end when American troops leave. The battleground shifts, and we'll be fighting them again," McCain said. "You read Zarqawi, and you read bin Laden. ... It's not just Iraq that they're interested in. It's the region, and then us."

Sen. Joseph Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he hoped a special commission considering options for the way ahead in Iraq would assert that U.S. troop commitments are not open-ended; propose a clear political road map for Iraq; and recommend engaging Iraq's neighbors in a political solution.

"We are past the point of adding more troops. We are past the point of vague policy prescriptions. It is not an answer just to stay. Nor is it an answer — though it may become a necessity — just to go with no concern for what follows," Biden, D-Del., wrote in Sunday's Washington Post.

"The fundamental question we must answer is whether, as we begin to leave Iraq, there are still concrete steps we can take to avoid leaving chaos behind," said Biden, who plans to run for president in 2008.

Democrats poised to take control of the House and Senate are pressing for a substantial reduction of U.S. troops in Iraq and a timetable for their withdrawal, as a way of forcing the Iraq government to rely more on itself.

"We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction of our troops," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Because if you don't do that, they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way. And it is that assumption on their part that takes them off the hook."

DOJ_NMG_0096182

Incoming House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., agreed. "As a practical matter, there are no troops to increase with," he said. "Our objective was to remove Saddam Hussein and create an environment in which a democracy could be established. That has been done."

But Hoyer said Democrats would continue funding the existing troop levels, for the time being.

"That's not an option, of not supporting our troops in the field and making sure they're as safe as we can make them," he said. "Very frankly, their lack of numbers exposes them on a daily basis to danger and death, unfortunately. But clearly, we're going to have discussions going forward as to how we change this policy and change it in the short term, not the long term."

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, told the Senate Armed Services Committee last week he believes troop levels should remain steady for now. He said it was possible to add 20,000 troops for a short time, but it would be unrealistic to raise troop levels as proposed by McCain and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

Abizaid said the American military in Iraq is stretched too thin already, and sending over a bigger, more permanent presence would undercut efforts to force Iraqis to take on more responsibility.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said he thinks U.S. generals have been put "in a a very, very difficult position."

"What I don't have confidence in is the policy. And General Abizaid is giving us a diagnosis that is based on the current policy. But that policy has to change, and it can change," said Kerry, who is considering a White House bid in 2008.

Kerry spoke on "Fox News Sunday," while McCain and Hoyer appeared on ABC's "This Week." Levin spoke on CNN's "Late Edition." Graham appeared on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

McCain Says Troops Dying For `Failed' Iraq Policy (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson

Bloomberg, November 20, 2006

Nov. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Senator John McCain said U.S. troops are ``fighting and dying for a failed policy" in Iraq and must get enough reinforcements to ensure a military victory.

McCain said that while deploying more troops to Iraq would put a ``terrible strain" on the U.S. military, ``there's only one thing worse, and that is defeat."

``And we've been losing," the Arizona Republican said on ABC's ``This Week" program.

McCain, a 70-year-old Vietnam veteran who is exploring a bid for the presidency in 2008, said a U.S. failure in Iraq would have ``catastrophic" consequences, emboldening terrorists and spreading instability in the region. McCain didn't say how many more troops should be sent in. Previously he has called for an additional 20,000 personnel.

The U.S. has about 141,000 military personnel in Iraq and General John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, told McCain at a Senate Armed Service Committee hearing last week that there is no immediate need for more troops even as violence -- and U.S. military deaths -- has been rising.

U.S. policy in Iraq may be at a crossroads with Democrats winning a majority in Congress Nov. 7 in part because of public dissatisfaction with President George W. Bush's management of the war and a bipartisan commission getting ready recommendations on a future course in the conflict. Bush has rejected setting any deadlines for the U.S. presence in Iraq.

Democratic Majority

While McCain has been urging deployment of more troops to stabilize Iraq, leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress are calling for the U.S. to begin withdrawing at least some personnel over the next four to six months to pressure the Iraqi government into taking more responsibility for their country's security.

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will become chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said McCain's approach would ``get us in deeper into Iraq."

``That sends exactly the wrong message to the Iraqis, that somehow or other, there's a military solution," Levin said on CNN's ``Late Edition," adding later: ``So no, not more troops; fewer troops."

Failed Government

Representative Steny Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who was elected last week to the No. 2 House post in the next session of the Congress, said the situation in Iraq may be past the of point of resolution through more force.

The government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki has failed to do what's needed to end sectarian violence, Hoyer said in a separate interview on ABC. ``If you have a failed government, our continuing to prop up that failed government will not ultimately succeed," he said.

In addition, ``there are no troops to increase with," he said.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who negotiated the end to the Vietnam War, told the British Broadcasting Company that a decisive military victory in Iraq is unlikely and that the U.S. course must be redefined.

DOJ_NMG_0096183

``If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," Kissinger said in an interview broadcast today.

Alternatives

``But I don't believe that the alternative is between military victory as it had been defined previously, or total withdrawal," said Kissinger, who served in the administrations of Republican Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford.

McCain said he disagreed.

``You can't have a political solution unless you have a military solution," McCain said. ``There's never been one in history."

Republican Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina also disagreed with Kissinger, and backed McCain on the need for more troops.

``We've been playing whack-a-mole, as John McCain says it, where you clear one area but you can't hold it because you go to the next area to suppress a surge in violence," Graham said on CBS's ``Face the Nation" program. ``We need a larger troop presence in Iraq to bring about security."

Increased Violence

There were about 180 attacks a day against Iraqi government and U.S. targets during October, Lieutenant General Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Nov. 15. There were 99 U.S. military personnel killed in combat during the month, the highest monthly death toll in two years. More than 3,200 Americans have died in Iraq since the U.S. invasion, with 2,481 killed in action, according to Defense Department figures.

Bombings and sectarian battles have continued, with the latest coming this morning. At least 53 people were killed in bombings and shooting across Iraq and the country's deputy health minister was kidnapped from his home in Baghdad, Agence France- Presse reported.

Maliki on Nov. 17 asked the United Nations Security Council to extend the mandate of U.S.-led military forces in Iraq through 2007, citing a need for protection from terrorists.

Graham, who has been to Iraq four times, was asked on CBS if he believes the situation in Iraq has gotten worse. ``Absolutely," he replied.

``The first time I went there, I walked around town and bought rugs. The fourth time I went, about a year ago, I had to be in a tank," Graham said.

Rep. Rangel Will Seek To Reinstate Draft (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin

AP, November 20, 2006

Americans would have to sign up for a new military draft after turning 18 under a bill the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee says he will introduce next year.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said Sunday he sees his idea as a way to deter politicians from launching wars.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," Rangel said.

Rangel, a veteran of the Korean War who has unsuccessfully sponsored legislation on conscription in the past, has said the all-volunteer military disproportionately puts the burden of war on minorities and lower-income families.

Rangel said he will propose a measure early next year. While he said he is serious about the proposal, there is little evident support among the public or lawmakers for it.

In 2003, Rangel proposed a measure covering people age 18 to 26. It was defeated 402-2 the following year. This year, he offered a plan to mandate military service for men and women between age 18 and 42; it went nowhere in the Republican-led Congress.

Democrats will control the House and Senate come January because of their victories in the Nov. 7 election.

At a time when some lawmakers are urging the military to send more troops to Iraq, "I don't see how anyone can support the war and not support the draft," said Rangel, who also proposed a draft in January 2003, before the U.S. invasion of Iraq. "I think to do so is hypocritical."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican who is a colonel in the U.S. Air Force Standby Reserve, said he agreed that the U.S. does not have enough people in the military.

"I think we can do this with an all-voluntary service, all-voluntary Army, Air Force, Marine Corps and Navy. And if we can't, then we'll look for some other option," said Graham, who is assigned as a reserve judge to the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0096184

Rangel, the next chairman of the House tax-writing committee, said he worried the military was being strained by its overseas commitments.

"If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft," Rangel said.

He said having a draft would not necessarily mean everyone called to duty would have to serve. Instead, "young people (would) commit themselves to a couple of years in service to this great republic, whether it's our seaports, our airports, in schools, in hospitals," with a promise of educational benefits at the end of service.

Graham said he believes the all-voluntary military "represents the country pretty well in terms of ethnic makeup, economic background."

Repeated polls have shown that about seven in 10 Americans oppose reinstatement of the draft and officials say they do not expect to restart conscription.

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told Congress in June 2005 that "there isn't a chance in the world that the draft will be brought back."

Yet the prospect of the long global fight against terrorism and the continuing U.S. commitment to stabilizing Iraq have kept the idea in the public's mind.

The military drafted conscripts during the Civil War, both world wars and between 1948 and 1973. An agency independent of the Defense Department, the Selective Service System, keeps an updated registry of men age 18-25 — now about 16 million — from which to supply untrained draftees that would supplement the professional all-volunteer armed forces.

Rangel and Graham appeared on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

Amid Uproar Over War, Rangel Renews Call For Draft (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The incoming Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee said yesterday that he will push to renew the military draft, as lawmakers in both parties sharpened their criticisms of the situation in Iraq and struggled for consensus and solutions.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a likely presidential contender, leveled one of his harshest assessments yet, saying U.S. troops are "fighting and dying for a failed policy." He renewed his call for more U.S. troops in Iraq and said it is immoral to keep them fighting at the current deployment levels.

And Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee, repeated yesterday his view that troop withdrawals must begin within four to six months.

The varying proposals underscored the extent to which key policymakers remain at odds two weeks after voters registered deep discontent over the war and restored Democrats to power in Congress.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) has long advocated returning to the draft, but his efforts drew little attention during the 12 years that House Democrats were in the minority. Starting in January, however, he will chair the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. Yesterday he said "you bet your life" he will renew his drive for a draft.

"I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session," Rangel said on CBS's "Face the Nation." He portrayed the draft, suspended since 1973, as a means of spreading military obligations more equitably and prompting political leaders to think twice before starting wars.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," said Rangel, a Korean War veteran. "If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft."

Rangel has drawn modest support for his draft proposal in recent years and it has been unclear whether its prospects might improve in the 110th Congress.

Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who will be the Senate majority leader, agrees that the U.S. military is stretched too thin and that "the burden of meeting the nation's security has not been shared equally by all segments of our society," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. But Reid "believes that these problems are best addressed by making needed adjustments in the all-volunteer force," Manley said.

On ABC's "This Week," McCain reiterated his argument that the United States faces a catastrophic setback in Iraq unless it deploys more troops to reduce sectarian violence and stabilize the country. "We have to have additional forces, or we will be playing whack-a-mole," he said.

McCain said in a speech Thursday that it is immoral to keep troops fighting merely to "delay our defeat for a few months or a year." Asked yesterday by ABC's George Stephanopoulos, "Isn't it currently immoral to keep Marines and soldiers, other service people, in Iraq?" McCain replied: "Yes, it is." But the war still can be won with renewed effort and resources, he said.

Lawmakers are anxiously awaiting recommendations next month from the Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). If the group does not advocate sending more troops to Iraq, McCain said, he would support a troop withdrawal "if, at the point, I think that we have exhausted every option and that we are doomed to failure. I don't know if it'll be at that point [in December] or not."

Although not asked directly about the draft, McCain said, "We've got the best military we've ever had in our all-volunteer force."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) agreed with McCain, saying on "Face the Nation" that more troops should be sent to Iraq and that a military draft is not necessary.

Levin, on CNN's "Late Edition," said the United States must start withdrawing from Iraq to pressure Iraqis to assume control of their nation.

"We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction of our troops," Levin said. Otherwise, he said, "they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way . . . which takes them off the hook."

On the presidential front, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) said on "Fox News Sunday" that he is considering another presidential bid in 2008 despite widespread criticism of what he called "a botched joke" that some received as denigrating troops in Iraq.

And Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) -- who won a contest for House majority leader over a candidate backed by incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) -- said he is confident there will not be retaliation against his supporters.

"We're going to talk about that," Hoyer said on "This Week." "But I'm sure that's not going to happen."

In a secret-ballot election by House Democrats on Thursday, Hoyer defeated Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), 149 to 86.

Bill On Draft To Resurface As Calls For Troops Rise (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

The incoming Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means panel says he will introduce a bill to reinstitute a military draft in order to provide the U.S. with more troops, while Sen. John McCain continued his call for increase of troop levels in Iraq.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York first called for a draft in January 2003, when Democrats were the minority party in both houses of Congress. Now that his party controls Capitol Hill, he was asked yesterday on CBS' "Face the Nation" if he was still serious about the proposal.

"You bet your life. Underscore 'serious,' " he said.

"I don't see how anyone can support the [Iraq] war and not support the draft," said Mr. Rangel, alluding to Mr. McCain's call for increased troop levels in Iraq and to the need to combat threats elsewhere in the world. "If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft."

Mr. Rangel said his bill, which he will introduce again early next year, would allow Americans turning 18 to choose between several forms of national service, including airport security, or jobs in schools and hospitals.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said in his own "Face the Nation" appearance that military conscription was unnecessary.

"I think we can do this with an all-voluntary service, all-voluntary Army, Air Force, Marine Corps and Navy. And if we can't, then we'll look for some other option," said Mr. Graham, who also serves as a reserve judge to the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals.

Repeated polls have shown that about seven in 10 Americans oppose reinstatement of military conscription, and the Pentagon has long opposed any draft. Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told Congress in June 2005 that "there isn't a chance in the world that the draft will be brought back."

Meanwhile, Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, continued to call for increased U.S. military presence in Iraq to stabilize the country and prevent what he described as a dire threat to U.S. national security.

"You've got to ask yourself some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no," he said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." "The other is, what are the consequences of defeat?"

"I believe the consequences of failure are catastrophic. It will spread to the region. You will see Iran more emboldened," said Mr. McCain, who last week formed an exploratory committee in advance of a likely 2008 presidential campaign. "We leave this place, chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict. In my view, a lot more."

Mr. McCain said he based his judgment partly on the writings of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the al Qaeda in Iraq leader who was killed in a U.S. air raid in June, and of Osama bin Laden.

"The consequences of failure are so severe that I will exhaust every possibility to try to fix this situation. Because it's not the end when American troops leave. The battleground shifts, and we'll be fighting them again," Mr. McCain said. "You read Zarqawi, and you read bin Laden. ... It's not just Iraq that they're interested in. It's the region, and then us."

But Mr. Rangel, a Korean War veteran, said he hoped his military-draft bill would discourage lawmakers from voting to authorize future military conflicts.

"There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way," he said.

Mr. McCain, a Vietnam War veteran, also has two sons in military service. His son Jack is currently in the U.S. Naval Academy, while another son, James, enlisted in the Marine Corps this year.

Incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said there are insufficient troops available for Mr. McCain's suggestion.

"As a practical matter, there are no troops to increase with," the Maryland Democrat said during his appearance on "This Week." "Our objective was to remove Saddam Hussein and create an environment in which a democracy could be established. That has been done."

Mr. Hoyer added that Democrats will continue to fund the war despite their doubts.

"That's not an option, of not supporting our troops in the field and making sure they're as safe as we can make them," he said.

Who Lost Iraq? (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

On April 9, 2003, the world watched as U.S. marines and Iraqi citizens toppled an imposing statue of Saddam Hussein in Baghdad's Firdos Square. Three and a half years later, the promise of democracy in Iraq seems a cruel joke, and the administration in Washington that launched the invasion seems utterly bereft of clues as to how to sort out the mess. "The fall of the statue," says a former White House National Security Council staff member, "is where the story diverges from the White House's expectations."

President Bush's acceptance of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation was intended to signal a change in course on Iraq. But many national security experts say that Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security adviser at the time of the invasion, and the National Security Council share much of the blame for the problems in Iraq. "She did not perceive, and the National Security Council did not assess, what is in the United States' interests and what is in the interests of our enemies," says retired Lt. Gen. William Odom, an outspoken critic of the war who served as military assistant to Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser. "Once you make that basic mistake, there isn't any way to make the war come out good. It's all over."

With her ardent support for the invasion, Odom and others say, Rice was unable to play the traditional role of national security adviser-impartial broker in the rough-and-tumble of interagency government. That was further complicated by the fact that Rumsfeld all but ignored the input of other agencies, then never took responsibility for postwar reconstruction, leaving Rice to try to manage the Iraq rebuilding effort from the White House. "The people who took responsibility for the rebuilding of Iraq-that is, the office of the secretary of defense-expressed no interest in solving problems as problems appeared," says Franklin Miller, one of Rice's principal aides handling the reconstruction effort. "They never brought any issues to the table, and they never took any taskings away."

The problems were compounded, former NSC staff members say, by conflicting information provided by virtually everyone involved in the Iraq effort, including military generals who often gave NSC staffers information at odds with what soldiers on the ground and lower-level military and civilian officials were reporting. "The internal whitewashing was as great as the external whitewashing," says a former senior NSC staff member. "We wasted two years, spinning the situation, using smoke and mirrors to say, 'Hey, it's not as it's being reported. Everything is OK.'"

"Knocking heads." This is the story of how Rice, a veteran White House insider with close personal ties to the president, failed to pull together the administration's fractious postwar efforts and why her successor, Stephen Hadley, has yet to navigate or even identify a way out of Iraq. "Hadley's NSC," says a former senior NSC staff member, "has become a rubber stamp for the Defense Department." Bush has tasked Hadley, Rice, now secretary of state, and other advisers to come up with a solution for

Iraq, even as the congressionally directed Iraq Study Group, cochaired by James Baker, the former secretary of state, is racing to finish up its own report. Completing the trifecta is a report to be issued next month by the Pentagon on U.S. military strategy in Iraq.

Escaping Washington, But Not Escaping Iraq (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, November 27, 2006

In one of the last strongholds of communism, George W. Bush worshiped in a wooden pew at a hybrid Catholic-evangelical service--"a moment," he later called it, "to converse with God in a church here in Hanoi." Earlier, his presidential motorcade had sped beneath a hammer and sickle formed from red and yellow lightbulbs, a reminder that the world does not change as fast as he would like. The reluctant traveler dropped into the capital of his least favorite analogy as part of a sweep through Southeast Asia that allowed him to look commanding, even regal, at a time when postelection Washington is buzzing about the onrushing twilight of his presidency. "Happy to find a receptive audience," he slyly told fawning musicians in Singapore, an earlier stop, after he answered their entreaties to tap out a tune on their Asian xylophone, with surprisingly melodic results.

Bush had come to Hanoi, once the capital of godless North Vietnam, for an annual international forum, the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting. Attendance at such summits is perhaps the part of the presidency he will miss least, press conferences excepted. And this time, he had more to fret about than staged intimacy and flabby bloviating. What about a nation that overwhelmingly backs its President when he sends troops into battle, then sours on the idea when swaths of society decide that intervention was a mistake? That was the U.S. in 1968, and it's the country Bush could wind up leading if the public decides that comparing Iraq with Vietnam is no longer so rash and ignorant a thing to do as Bush's aides have been insisting it is for the past three years.

Fifteen years ago, in the flush of his Gulf War triumph, President George H.W. Bush crowed to state legislators, "By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all." But now, as Washington's wise men look for a way out of a situation in Iraq , the symptoms of that malady seem to be reappearing. Asked in the Rose Garden in June if he saw a parallel between Iraq and Vietnam, the President replied curtly, "No." But he is now embracing the inevitable, and he answered yes last week when asked roughly the same question at the Sheraton Hanoi. "One lesson is, is that we tend to want there to be instant success in the world," he said. "And the task in Iraq is going to take a while."

So is the modernization of Hanoi, where the streets are strung with drooping skeins of hundreds of electrical wires, some of them powering a single home that has run a line into the tangle. The streets are also clogged with schools of motor scooters, with most of the riders free of helmets but laden with comically massive loads--a quartet of big-screen TV sets, exquisitely balanced piles of lumber, pyramids of water bottles.

Although Bush plans to visit the thriving stock exchange in Ho Chi Minh City--formerly Saigon--this country is still officially the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. As protocol demanded, he met with the General Secretary of the Communist Party and was photographed with a massive bust of the revolutionary leader Ho Chi Minh. The President said one of the most poignant moments of the trip was passing the lake that Senator John McCain, as a Navy pilot, was pulled from after his plane was hit while on a bombing run. "He suffered a lot as a result of his imprisonment," Bush said, "and yet we passed the place where he was, literally, saved, in one way, by the people pulling him out." In fact, McCain was met onshore by a large, hostile crowd, which hit, kicked and even bayoneted him. Aides admitted later that the President's telling, although accurate, was incomplete.

Behind the scenes, Bush mused to aides that he loved what he was seeing and regretted he would never be able to come to a place like this as a normal tourist. Instead he pursued a fairly restricted itinerary, visiting the U.S. military's Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command and skipping the Turtle Temple and the stir-fried camel. Asked at a briefing why the President wasn't out more among the people, National Security Adviser Steve Hadley said the motorcade routes through the heart of the city meant that the President was "in the midst of the Vietnamese people all the time" and added that Bush "has been doing a lot of waving." His hosts seemed to want to reciprocate. When CNN International began airing a taped package using footage from the Vietnam War to suggest similarities between Iraq and Vietnam, the local feed was obscured by an overlay of music and a Vietnamese flag. For at least a few days, a graying President could enjoy Vietnam instead of wrestling its ghost.

The Fogginess Of War (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

When publicly assessing the Iraq war, U.S. military leaders are often at pains to point out that the enemy has a vote, by its actions, and that vote tends to change conditions on the ground. But last week, it was Republicans licking their wounds from an election trouncing and Democrats flush with a new mandate who repeatedly reminded the top military commander for the Middle East that the American people have voted and, by their actions, expect to see a new course in Iraq.

What course exactly? Washington is buzzing with possibilities-a number of which were swatted down by Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command, in testimony last week before the House and Senate Armed Services committees. The most popular option, a sizable troop withdrawal in the next six months, would inflame sectarian violence, he warned. Partitioning the country along ethnic-religious lines, he said, is "not viable" and would create a Sunni state that would be little more than an al Qaeda safe haven. And though Abizaid did not rule out temporary troop surges to reinforce efforts to tamp down the turmoil-even as 2,200 Marines were being dispatched to the volatile Anbar province from ships stationed offshore in the Persian Gulf-he added that more troops could ultimately undermine the credibility of the fledgling Iraqi government. Just how weak the government is was highlighted by last Tuesday's brazen mass kidnapping of dozens of employees from the Sunni-run Ministry of Higher Education by gunmen wearing old and new national police uniforms.

"Whole different mission." Such is the stark reality facing the 18,500 soldiers from the 1st Cavalry Division as they depart Fort Hood, Texas, to take over security responsibilities in Baghdad. Much has changed on the ground since many of his soldiers were there before, says Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, who commanded the 4th Infantry Division during a previous tour in Iraq from 2003-04-and who next month becomes the No. 2 commander of American forces there. "It's a whole different mission," he tells U.S. News from his Fort Hood headquarters chockablock with packing boxes. "As a division commander then, I was much more focused on toppling a regime. Now we know that it's about getting confidence in the Iraq government so that it becomes credible. It's much more complex and we've got to understand that."

Key to that credibility is security in Baghdad-the "No. 1" priority for U.S. troops, says Odierno. On that front, "there is progress," he says, "but it's baby steps." To get the city under control, he adds, the Iraqi government must stand up its security forces, "and we've got to help them." Abizaid's testimony emphasized the need for more U.S. military training teams to be embedded within the Iraqi security forces as a vital part of any American exit strategy. U.S. military officials estimate that they may boost numbers from a dozen per Iraqi battalion (which can range from 200 to 700 soldiers), to some 60 U.S. military trainers. In addition, says Odierno, "You might have a division where you have a very large [U.S. transition team] that travels around, spending a couple of days with different battalions." He adds, "We have to continue to analyze what are the real capabilities in these teams."

U.S. And Iran Haggle Over Iraq (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, John Barry

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

Over a dinner of savory kebab, they talked of the trips they've taken, and their favorite places. James Baker, the longtime confidant of the Bush family, spoke nostalgically of his visits to Iran before 1979, the year the Islamic revolution and hostage crisis put an end to diplomatic ties. Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, politely aired past grievances, complaining that U.S. administrations dating back to George H.W. Bush—when Baker was secretary of State—had failed to take Iran seriously. Zarif said the Americans never showed appreciation for Tehran's help in freeing U.S. hostages in Lebanon in the early '90s—and, more recently, for countering the Taliban in Afghanistan, according to two participants at the meeting who agreed to describe it on the condition of anonymity. Zarif's not-so-subtle message: Iran isn't giving anything for free anymore. Tehran is interested only in a broader deal that links the U.S. desire for help in Iraq with Iran's desire to be allowed to enrich uranium, among other issues.

Baker, known for his deft bargaining skills, refused to bite on that point even as he supped heartily. (The dinner took place Oct. 5 at the Iran envoy's Manhattan townhouse.) He said that the only issue he had come to talk about was Iraq. Baker argued that a failed state next door would hurt Iran more than America—which, after all, can always just leave the region. (Through a spokesperson, Baker declined to comment on this account.) Despite the friendly ambience, Zarif suspected in the end that Baker was "trying to buy Iran's cooperation on Iraq at a very cheap price."

Iran is now raising that price—dramatically. Tehran knows that George W. Bush faces new political pressure from an incoming Democratic Congress to withdraw from Iraq sooner rather than later. Tehran also hears, through the media, that the forthcoming report by the Iraq Study Group (co-chaired by Baker and Lee Hamilton) is expected to recommend fuller engagement with Iran and Syria. Even Tony Blair, Bush's most loyal ally, is urging the president to broaden the dialogue with these two countries and make the Israeli-Palestinian dispute part of it. A rough draft of the Baker report delivers a similar recommendation, according to a description of it given to NEWSWEEK by a group member.

Both the Iranians and Syrians are clearly feeling cocky. Negotiations to halt Iran's nuclear program remain stalemated, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad declared last week that "many countries have agreed to live with an Iran that has mastered enrichment." One key nation that Tehran thinks it can count on is Russia, which wants to protect its huge investments in Iran and is resisting tough sanctions in the U.N. Security Council. "The Iranians," says a European diplomat involved in the talks, "are behaving as if they are already a nuclear power." Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, meanwhile, is enjoying the resumption of what Syrian Embassy spokesman Ahmed Salkini calls "unofficial contacts" from Washington.

Some U.S. officials are now hinting that Washington may have to blink before Tehran does. All last week, following up on a two-day White House meeting over Veterans Day weekend, national-security adviser Stephen Hadley and key officials thrashed over new approaches to Iraq in anticipation of the Baker-Hamilton report and fresh Democratic initiatives. U.S. officials say the president is still intent on forcing Iran to back down on its nuclear program, using financial sanctions or even stronger means. But according to a senior U.S. official who would discuss such sensitive topics only if he was not identified, some inside the administration believe it may be too late to stop Tehran. Should diplomacy fail, Washington might have to accept Iran as a "virtual nuclear-weapons state" if Bush gets help on Iraq and other issues, this official says. That means Tehran might be permitted to develop the technology for making nuclear fuel—and potentially a bomb—as long as it holds to its pledge to limit its program to peaceful purposes. But this is still seen as a remote fallback position.

There are public signals that Washington is edging closer to Tehran's terms for talks. In congressional testimony last week, CIA Director Michael Hayden seemed to contradict the official Bush-administration line of refusing to link Iraq and the nuclear issue. "Talking to Iran about Iraq cannot be isolated, I believe, from the broader nuclear question," Hayden said. (CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield later contended that Hayden's statement "was totally consistent" with current administration policy; he said Hayden was referring to Iran's unwillingness to discuss Iraq without talking about the nuclear issue.) State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegas also said forthrightly last week that "the timing and conditions" for talks with Iran are "under review."

But even if Washington does cut a deal, can Tehran stop the sectarian killing? On Capitol Hill, Hayden said an "Iranian hand is stoking violence" in Iraq. But the private view of U.S. intelligence agencies is that Tehran is "torn" over how much it wants to stir up trouble, says an official familiar with classified intelligence briefings on Iran who would discuss the issue only anonymously. The Iranians, he says, "don't want complete chaos." If both sides share that fear, then perhaps James Baker can get help at the right price after all.

How Iraq Will Impact 2008 Race (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

For a moment, at least, John McCain and Hillary Clinton shared a common cause. It was one week after the midterm elections. They were back in the Senate, back in their seats on the Armed Services Committee, back to venting about Iraq. The target was Gen. John Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command in the Mideast. McCain chafed at Abizaid's assertion that there were encouraging signs in the troubled conflict. Is "it encouraging," McCain wondered, "that people dressed in police uniforms are able to come in and kidnap 150 people and leave with them ... through checkpoints?" Clinton was also quick to pounce. "The situation in Iraq is not improving," she told Abizaid. "Hope is not a strategy."

Hope is no strategy: a lesson Clinton and other potential presidential candidates are quickly coming to learn. As the Bush presidency approaches its seventh year and the war continues, Iraq is no longer just George W. Bush's problem. Washington waits for a miracle pill from James Baker and Lee Hamilton's Iraq Study Group. But leaders in both parties know that a truly happy solution to the conflict is nowhere in sight—and may never be.

That could mean trouble for the 2008 front runners, Clinton and McCain. The Arizona senator stands apart from the political pack in calling for an increased U.S. presence in Iraq—arguing that the military should invest as many as 100,000 more troops on the ground to adequately secure the country. Clinton, meanwhile, has angered many in her party's antiwar wing by refusing to repudiate her initial vote to go to war—but has yet to fully articulate how exactly she would clean up the Iraq mess. Both senators were present at the conflict's creation and, if history is a guide, voters may well yearn for a fresh set of eyes to see it through to its conclusion. But, in the nascent presidential campaign, few would-be candidates have stepped forward with their own strategies for ending the war. Baker and Hamilton may offer contenders a road map to follow, but for now, candidates are still groping for a comfortable position on the way ahead in Iraq. A user's guide to the candidates' positions on the war, and who they talk to on the subject:

JOHN MCCAIN

McCain was an early administration ally on Iraq, arguing that removing Saddam Hussein was vital to the broader war on terror. But even as he advocated for intervention, he was kibitzing with Republican war critics like Bush 41 national-security adviser Brent Scowcroft, who worried that the Iraqi adventure would prove destabilizing. After the invasion, McCain began a relentless drumbeat for more U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0096190

McCain is that rare Republican with sympathy for both his party's realist and idealist wings. A child of the military establishment and a former prisoner of war, he is well-acquainted with the human costs of war and chats frequently with "realist" war critics like Scowcroft and Colin Powell. But he also consults with intellectuals like Bill Kristol, the influential neocon thinker, and continues to speak of Iraq's potential for transforming the Middle East. If McCain does make a White House run, his foreign policy would be coordinated by Randy Scheunemann, an analyst at the conservative think tank Project for the New American Century who founded the bipartisan Committee for the Liberation of Iraq, an independent group that advocated for regime change.

HILLARY CLINTON

From her first hours in the Senate, Clinton was careful to work on her national-security credentials, joining the Armed Services Committee and positioning herself as a strong friend of the military. She voted for the Iraq war and never expressed regret over doing so, even as the war became increasingly unpopular with her party's base. But by persistently criticizing the Bush administration's handling of the war, she has so far managed to avoid the wrath of the antiwar activists that dogged Joe Lieberman in 2006.

But now that she's in the majority, and seriously eying a run at the White House, what would she do about Iraq? She has so far advocated the creation of an oil trust—granting a share in oil profits to all Iraqis. She's backed a phased redeployment of troops—though she hasn't said how many troops would be redeployed or where they would go—and championed engagement with Syria and Iran. But she has yet to offer a comprehensive plan of her own. "It's for the president of the United States to present a plan to the American people," said her spokesman, Philippe Reines.

Clinton has developed a close working relationship with Rhode Island Sen. Jack Reed, a West Point graduate and the Senate Democrats' point man on Iraq. She also talks to veterans of her husband's foreign-policy team such as former U.N. ambassador Richard Holbrooke, a shortlist candidate for secretary of State in any Democratic administration. Indeed, some Democrats think the very vastness of Clinton's network has constrained her from articulating a clear plan for ending the conflict. "It's like the Kerry campaign," says a veteran of that presidential effort, who now works on foreign policy in the Senate and requested anonymity discussing the politics of national security. "It's hard to get anything past the bottleneck of has-beens and wanna-bes."

BARACK OBAMA

One of Obama's chief assets as a potential challenger to Clinton: consistency on Iraq. He's said that he and the former First Lady had "differing assessments" of the need to go to war in the first place—and, indeed, as a state senator in the fall of 2002, he spoke out passionately against the war while Clinton was voting for it. He has resisted taking a strong position on an exit strategy for Iraq, saying simply, "I'm not a military man." Obama has called on Senate foreign-policy aide Mark Lippert and human-rights expert Samantha Power in formulating positions on international affairs.

RUDY GIULIANI

Long mistrusted bythe right for his stands on abortion and gay rights, Giuliani has tried to shore up his conservative credentials with a vociferous defense of Bush's Iraq policy. He's said withdrawing troops would be akin to the Union pulling out halfway through the U.S. Civil War—and called on America to "do whatever it takes" to win. His staunch defense of the war has helped win brownie points with the White House. But aides say his commitment to the Iraq cause is genuine. He is influenced, friends say, by a crop of A-list advisers at Stanford's hawkish Hoover Institution—among them former secretary of State George P. Shultz, Reagan national-security adviser Richard Allen and Reagan policy adviser Martin Anderson.

MITT ROMNEY

More than any other top-tier candidate, Romney, the retiring governor of Massachusetts, can legitimately claim he's had nothing to do with the mess in Iraq. But as he travels the country selling himself as the strongest potential challenger to McCain, Romney has had to scramble to make up for his lack of foreign-policy bona fides. In May he traveled to Iraq and borrowed a White House talking point, warning that the U.S. couldn't "cut and run." In September, he conferred with L. Paul Bremer, the former U.S. viceroy in Iraq, about the war. Aides say Romney is still in the early stages of educating himself about the conflict and has no plans to offer concrete strategies soon.

JOHN EDWARDS

Support for the Iraq war caused Edwards trouble in the 2004 Democratic primary. So in the spring of 2005, the former North Carolina senator asked aides to begin rethinking his policy on the war. The result: a Washington Post op-ed saying "I was wrong" and calling for a drawdown in troops and increased engagement with Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East. At the time, some close to Edwards worried that the former vice presidential candidate was taking too firm a stance on a rapidly shifting war. But now, with many Democrats making the case for phased withdrawal, Team Edwards feels the rest of the party is coming around to his view. Edwards has focused on expanding his own foreign-policy credentials, but consults with such Clinton-era thinkers as Holbrooke and Strobe Talbott. Edwards's Iraq repudiation may help him emerge as the antiwar alternative to Clinton's stubborn hawk.

SAM BROWNBACK

A conservative Catholic, the Kansas senator's chief appeal will lie with religious Republicans who like his views on social issues. But Brownback has long been an Iraq hawk, cosponsoring the 1998 Senate bill that made "regime change" U.S. policy in dealing with Saddam Hussein. After Saddam was toppled, Brownback encouraged similar regime change in Iran, declaring, "We'll never have true stability in the region as long as Iran remains in power." Brownback's chief foreign-policy interest, however, is aiding Africa, a cause on which he's worked with other conservative Christians as well as liberals like Madeleine Albright and Columbia economist Jeffrey Sachs.

JOE BIDEN

The Democrats' biggest long shot happens to be the author of the party's most comprehensive Iraq plan. Earlier this year, he and former Council on Foreign Relations president Leslie Gelb produced a plan calling for the division of Iraq into three autonomous states. The incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Biden is plugged into the group of retired generals who voiced their opposition to Rumsfeld's management of the war earlier this year.

Democrats, Beware The Curse Of D Street (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Incoming Democrats: Alert! Do not, repeat, not, buy a home on the 100 block of D Street SE on Capitol Hill. It may be jinxed.

How else to explain how this solidly Republican enclave -- once home to as many as six GOP House members -- is no more? A few weeks ago, a "for sale" sign went up at the townhouse belonging to Porter Goss, a former House member from Florida who moved over to the CIA a couple of years ago. Then Rep. Mark Foley felt obliged to quit before the election and his district fell to the Democrats.

Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (Conn.) lost on Nov. 7. Ditto her next-door neighbor, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (Fla.). Two doors down, Rep. Chris Chocola (Ind.) met a similar fate. And across the street Rep. Jim Ryun (Kan.) lost his race.

Painters were spotted Friday touching up Chocola's place in preparation for an open house yesterday.

Democrats who insist on buying one of these fine homes -- even before local and federal health officials finish investigating whether these homes have "loser building" syndrome -- at least should lowball.

Talk about mean streets.Republicans Need Not Apply

Speaking of Democrats moving into town, job seekers' resumes are flooding Democratic offices, vying for hundreds and hundreds of Hill jobs opening up. On the House side alone, there are perhaps 400 committee jobs flipping to the Dems, plus 150 or so positions on the personal staffs of the new Democratic members.

The picture on the Senate side is murkier, but the committee switches could net the Democrats about 150 jobs, and the six new Democratic members are likely to employ perhaps a couple of hundred folks on their personal staffs. And there'll be other Senate and House jobs to be had.

Meanwhile, as the Washington door revolves, hundreds of GOP resumes are floating down to K Street.Invasion Critic May Head to Baghdad Post

Within the administration, career Foreign Service officer Ryan Crocker, an Arabist who is ambassador to Pakistan, is being talked about to head to beautiful downtown Baghdad if Zalmay Khalilzad goes to any of the jobs he's supposed to be offered.

Crocker, a former ambassador to Syria, Lebanon and Kuwait, was one of the few people at the legendary Coalition Provisional Authority who actually knew anything about Iraq. The State Department sent him over there as an aide to Presidential Medal of Freedom recipient L. Paul Bremer, though Crocker thought the invasion a truly bad idea for all the obvious regional and international reasons.

As noted in our colleague Karen DeYoung's book about Colin Powell, "Soldier," Crocker co-wrote a memo in December 2002 to then-Secretary of State Powell warning of disaster if the United States invaded Iraq. The memo, titled "The Perfect Storm," detailed all the things that were likely to explode if the United States took over Iraq -- sectarian violence, a power vacuum, and so on.

Set Out the Blue China

The Democratic wins will alter the social scene in many ways, from large to small to meaningless. Washington Life Magazine's September issue had a list of the "100 Most Invited" to various events.

DOJ_NMG_0096192

President Bush and Laura Bush topped the list, followed by Vice President Cheney and Lynne Cheney, though neither of them are big on the local scene, the magazine reported. Third on the list were Sen. George Allen and his wife, Susan Allen.

Something tells us that's likely to have changed already.Another Undecided Election Contest

Cycle Of Revenge Fuels A Pattern Of Iraqi Killings (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 19 — As Iraq sinks deeper into war, a new pattern of revenge has become the driver of violence in the capital.

In a cycle that has been tracked by the American military since May and June, after months of apparently random sectarian violence the pattern has become one of attack and counterattack, with Sunni militants staging what commanders call "spectacular" strikes and Shiite militias retaliating with abductions and murders of Sunnis.

Militias come to funerals and offer to carry out revenge attacks. Gunmen execute blindfolded people in full public view. Mortars are lobbed between Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods. Sometimes the killers seem to be seeking specific people who were involved in earlier attacks, but many victims lose their lives simply to even out the sectarian toll.

"The problem is that every time there's a sensational event, that starts the whole sectarian cycle again," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief spokesman for the American command in Iraq. "If we could stop the cyclical nature of this in Baghdad, we could really change the dynamics here."

General Caldwell said that a recent and intensive series of American raids against Al Qaeda cells, as well as against Shiite militias that have struck back at Sunnis, had seriously damaged some of their networks. But American commanders have made similar claims on several occasions in the course of the war only to have the killing resume later at a higher level.

Scores of survivors and witnesses have noted the emerging cycle of revenge in interviews, describing highly personal attacks that involve a bullet in the head far more often than a bomb. In the past eight days, at least 715 Iraqis have been killed or have been found dead, according to The Associated Press. The death toll has reached 1,320 already this month, higher than the 1,216 who died in October, according to The A.P.'s count.

The sectarian violence that exploded after the bombing of a major Shiite shrine in Samarra in February has firmly locked into this new cycle of revenge, in which Sunnis and Shiites in many Baghdad neighborhoods are now openly at war.

Iraqis are hardening against one another as the deaths chip away at any remaining trust between the sects and radicalize even larger portions of their fringes. The killings are sometimes as brutal as they were under Saddam Hussein's rule: bodies are found with drill holes, acid burns and broken bones. The bodies are dumped in sewage areas and trash pits.

The hatred evident on both sides presents new challenges to the American military, which must face this increasingly complex Iraqi landscape in which larger numbers of people are involved in killing.

"We shouldn't talk in a false way, that we are all brothers," said Faaz, a young Shiite graduate student, who follows Abu Dera, a militant leader, and who, like most people here, would not give his full name. "We have to admit there is a wound. It is a vicious, destructive war."

New words for the culture of killing have popped up. Sakaka: death squad member. Tali: lamb, or a Sunni victim. Batta: car used by Shiite militias.

In Naariya, a neighborhood in southeastern Baghdad, the pattern began in a flash of gunfire on a sunny September morning, when eight friends were killed while putting up a poster of a Shiite cleric. In the following days, Sunni men in the area began to disappear. The bodies of at least 20 were found in Shiite areas, three of their families said in interviews.

Some of the men were taken in front of their families, forced into cars with guns pointed at their heads. Others simply disappeared. Families counted 20 to 40 dead, including, in one family, a grandfather, his son and his 14-year-old grandson. Americans tracking the Sunni deaths verified 17, according to residents they questioned.

An uneasy suspicion fell over the neighborhood. The police station, largely infiltrated by the Shiite militia called the Mahdi Army, did not even have a record of the disappearances. Muhammad Faisal, the brother of one of the slain Shiites, said he did not believe the reports of the Sunni deaths. The funerals for the eight Shiites drew large crowds. The Sunni ones did not.

"Where were their funerals?" he said, sitting in his tiny room in the neighborhood, holding his dead brother's 5-month-old baby. "We didn't see their numbers."

He was arrested by the Americans for questioning in connection with the killings and later released.

DOJ_NMG_0096193

The kidnappings seemed calculated to wipe away any remaining trust. Sunnis started to leave the neighborhood — about 50 families, according to a rough count by Sunni residents and a police official. Some time later, the word spread through mosques that it was safe to return.

Hamid Salman al-Dulaimy, 65, was happy to go back after having to sleep on couches. But several hours after he reinstalled himself at home, gunmen arrived in four cars, pointed guns at the heads of two of his sons and asked for identification cards. They took Mr. Dulaimy and his brother. Their bodies were found in a Shiite area several days later.

"You said we could come back here," one of the sons, Zaid, recalled saying to the gunmen.

Zaid Dulaimy was taken several days after he was interviewed. He is still missing.

In some cases, the force behind the cycle of revenge has its roots in Iraq's tribes, the network of communities that form the fabric of society here. With the world around them turning increasingly chaotic and the government largely impotent, Iraqis are retreating to the safety of their tribes — and the militias to which their members belong.

"This fighting, killing Sunnis and Shias, this is deep in the history of these tribes," said Husham al-Madfai, an architect and history buff. "They call it revenge. This is in the history of the country, in the blood of the people."

The killing is an ugly thing, not something Iraqis speak about openly. But its traces are everywhere, even in public places. Arkan lives in Ur, a neighborhood in northeast Baghdad that borders the area where the Shiite militant Abu Dera lives. He has seen at least four killings of Sunnis, and one failed one, an Egyptian man who was left for dead.

In January, the authorities in Ur found 18 bodies; in June, 30; and in August, 90; according to the local police authorities.

The intensity of executions in Ur jumped several days after the shooting deaths of Shiite pilgrims in August. One man in the area where the Sunnis were killed, a construction materials market, said he saw 14 killings in the days that followed.

In Sugel Uleh, a market area in Sadr City where a Sunni bomb gouged out a large crater this summer, Shiite gunmen shot dead at least eight men in its center. The attacks were carried out during funerals for some of the Shiites killed in the bombing, a witness said.

It is a long way between the pain of loss and the cold steel of killing, but militias, which move freely through the country's lawlessness, shorten the path.

Two sedans of Mahdi militiamen arrived at a funeral this spring of a man who was killed along with five of his friends in a Sunni area, on their way back from a fish restaurant. According to an account by a relative, the militiamen called the mourning family out to the street and opened the sedans' trunks. People were inside, the relative said. The men offered to kill them. The family refused.

For those who do not agree to killings, militias offer other things. Arkan began receiving $50 a month from the Mahdi Army after his father, a truck driver, died from wounds suffered in a sectarian attack in September.

Arkan said his family advised him against trying to seek revenge; it is dangerous business and he is the only working member in the family. Still, he has known others who have.

"There are many people like this," he said. "They bring a normal Sunni and say, 'This is revenge for my brother.' Some say it's enough, killing two or three. Some continue."

An increasingly common tool for retaliatory attacks is the mortar. In the three days that followed the death sentence for Mr. Hussein, a source of bitterness for Sunni Arabs, 10 different strikes around the capital killed at least 15 Iraqis and wounded 87, including three Shiite boys who were watching a soccer game in Sadr City.

General Caldwell said the military's raids had reduced the mortar attacks and put pressure on the militias, because killings appear to be carried out more quickly now by the looks of the bodies.

Jamal, a nephew of the Shiite killed with his five friends, said Shiites, long oppressed under Mr. Hussein, had simply had enough. "You can't expect people with all this tragedy in all these years not to have any reaction."

When Jamal first saw his uncle's broken body stuffed in the trunk of a car, he was overcome by anger.

"The feeling of revenge overwhelmed me," he said, in a house in Sadr City. "I said to myself, 'I will kill all the Sunnis.' "

He said he did not resort to the killing of strangers, as some Iraqis have begun to do, but reached out for tribal and militia connections to track down the killers.

"On the surface, people say they trust," said a policeman in Naariya, who asked that his name not be used because he could be killed. "Inside, they don't trust each other at all."

A Shiite government employee said: "My family, they are not aggressive, but it's the feeling inside, the hatred. They believe Sunnis are doing all of this."

As the capital becomes more violent, many of those who refuse to give in to it leave. Hassan Jabr, a Shiite whose 12-year-old son was kidnapped and murdered this spring, moved to Jordan in the fall with his wife and one remaining son. He said he was forever changed when he saw his son's body in the morgue.

DOJ_NMG_0096194

Before he left, he was waiting to register the death certificate in a government ministry, when he struck up a conversation with a man in his 20s whose only brother had been killed. The man said he had killed three Sunnis to avenge the death, Mr. Jabr said.

The man was surprised at Mr. Jabr's restraint. "Are you a coward?" Mr. Jabr said the man asked. "Why don't you take revenge?"

Upstate N.Y. Man Kidnapped In Iraq (AP)

By Valerie Bauman

AP, November 20, 2006

A former soldier from western New York is among the four Americans and one Austrian who were kidnapped in southern Iraq last week, family members said Sunday.

Jonathon Cote, 23, a native of Getzville, N.Y., a suburb of Buffalo, was working as a guard for Crescent Security Group when he was captured Thursday, his stepmother said. Family members spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity out of fear for Cote's safety.

"The waiting is very tiring, and stressful," his stepmother said. "Your mind goes from very optimistic, good thoughts to thoughts that maybe something good is not going to happen."

Before working for Crescent, Cote spent four years in the Army and served in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was stationed at Fort Bragg with the 82nd Airborne Division before receiving an honorable discharge, and has been in Iraq since June.

The five contract employees went missing when a truck convoy being escorted by Crescent was ambushed near Safwan, a largely Sunni Arab city of 200,000 people on the Kuwait border. Suspected militiamen dressed in Iraqi police uniforms seized 19 of the convoy's trucks, the five security guards and nine foreign drivers who were later released.

Another of the contractors is Paul Reuben, 39, a former police officer in the Minneapolis suburb of St. Louis Park, Minn., who is described by friends and family as an "easygoing, fun-loving type of guy" who was ready to come home.

His twin brother, Patrick Reuben, told the Star Tribune that Paul Reuben had been in Iraq for about two years working for Crescent and intended to come home after earning enough money to buy a house and a Hummer.

Suzanne Reuben said that her most recent contact with her brother was a few weeks ago, when they exchanged instant messages by computer. He told her he hope to be home by the day after Thanksgiving.

Islamic Companies, a previously unknown group, claimed responsibility for the kidnapping, according to an Iranian-run Arabic-language satellite news station, which said the group demanded the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq and the release of all prisoners being held there.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Michael McClellan said on Sunday that U.S. officials believe the five hostages are still being held captive.

Report: Flaws In Hussein Trial Impair Verdict (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 19 -- The trial of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, in which he was sentenced this month to death by hanging, was marred by flaws so serious that they undermined the trial's fairness and called into question the verdict, an international human rights watchdog group said in a report to be released Monday.

From the outset, the Iraqi High Tribunal's independence and perceived impartiality was weakened by actions of the Iraqi government, Human Rights Watch said in the 97-page, 10-month-long analysis of the trial, which condemned Hussein and seven co-defendants for the torture and execution of 148 people in the hamlet of Dujail more than two decades ago.

The report, based on courtroom observations and dozens of interviews with judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers, is the first significant challenge to what the Iraqi government and its U.S. patrons assert was a fair, if messy, trial.

The report asserts that there was failure to disclose key evidence to Hussein's attorneys and that there were violations of basic rights of the defendants to confront witnesses. The chief judge's outbursts in court undermined his impartiality, it said. There were also gaps in the evidence that weakened the prosecution's case and "put in doubt whether all the elements of the crimes charged were established," the report said.

"The tribunal squandered an important opportunity to deliver credible justice to the people of Iraq," Nehal Bhuta, the report's author, said in a statement. "And its imposition of the death penalty after an unfair trial is indefensible."

On Sunday, two U.S. advisers to the tribunal denounced the report as "misguided" and said that the trial was conducted properly and that a credible justice was delivered. They said the report did not take into account the tribunal's written judgment on the trial, expected to be completed, they said, as early as Monday.

"To question the overall integrity of the justice without reading the judgment is premature, at best," said one of the advisers, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program at Human Rights Watch, said such claims were "irrelevant" because the report does not speak to the quality of the judgment.

"What is done in a very careful, specific way underscores the major procedural flaws in the conduct of the proceedings that undermined the verdict of the trial," Dicker said in a telephone interview.

The Dujail trial was the first of its kind to be conducted against a former leader in his own country by his own people, and the first since the World War II Allies prosecuted the Nazi leadership at Nuremberg to try nearly an entire senior leadership for crimes against humanity.

Along with Hussein, two co-defendants were also sentenced to death by hanging, four received prison terms ranging from 15 years to life and one defendant was acquitted. The verdicts and sentences are under appeal. If Hussein's death sentence is upheld, Iraqi law requires him to be executed within 30 days.

But the trial's shortcomings, the report asserts, also "call into question subsequent proceedings at the tribunal."

The chief judge, Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman, lost his temper many times during sessions and exchanged insults with the defendants, the report said. He also had made "erratic and often unexplained decisions limiting the rights of defense counsel to question witnesses."

The U.S. advisers said Abdel-Rahman was simply trying to take control of a court that Hussein and his defense team mocked. Hussein boycotted proceedings or often wagged his finger, shouting. His co-defendants appeared in their underwear.

The prosecution, the report asserted, engaged in "trial by ambush," in which important documents were not handed to the defense in advance. As an example, the report cited an instance when 23 prosecution witness statements were read into the court record without any of the witnesses being made available for questioning by defense counsel.

The U.S. advisers said the prosecution followed proper procedures.

The former chief judge, Rizgar Mohammed Amin, resigned after members of Iraq's parliament denounced him as "weak" and too lenient toward the defendants, the report said. There was heavy pressure to side against Hussein, it said.

"The attitude of the cabinet towards the court and the trial is one of a consumer who pays money for a product," one judge said in the report. "They give money, and they demand results. The government treats the court like a factory."

The report added that the judges lacked the experience to conduct such a complex trial and urged Iraq's government to allow international judicial experts to take part in future proceedings.

"For justice to be done, the trial has to be fair. There were large, large shortfalls in the fairness," Dicker said. The trial, he said, "certainly fails as a reference point historically for what happened and who was responsible in the way the Nuremberg trials did."

General Discusses Goals Of His Return To Iraq (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

FORT HOOD, Tex., Nov. 13 — Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who returns to Iraq next month to take charge of the day-to-day fight as commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, says he departs for Baghdad with a clearer, perhaps even diminished, set of expectations of what the military can be expected to accomplish now, more than three years after the invasion.

“You have to define win, and I think everybody has a different perspective on winning,” General Odierno said during an interview at the Army’s III Corps headquarters here.

“I would argue that with Saddam Hussein no longer in power in Iraq, that is a partial win,” he said. “I think what we need is an Iraqi government that is legitimate in the eyes of the Iraqi population, an Iraq that is able to protect itself and not be a safe haven for terror. That’s what I think winning is.”

As a bugle sounded across Fort Hood with the call to lower the flag at dusk, General Odierno paused, and added, “Notice I left out a few things, such as a democracy in the sense that we see a democracy in the United States. We have to allow them to shape their own democracy, the type of democracy that fits them and their country.”

It has become a truism of the war in Iraq that there can be no military victory without a political solution, which requires the coordinated efforts of the entire United States government and of the Iraqi one, as well.

"The longer we stay in Iraq, the less of a military fight it becomes," the general said. "We have to understand that."

General Odierno has spent the past several months preparing for his new command, assigning his staff several histories of counterinsurgency efforts in Malaya, Algeria and Vietnam; meeting with academic experts on the Middle East and Islamist terrorism; and holding sessions with officers from the other armed services and from the Iraqi ground forces, with whom he will be working.

He outwardly carries the lessons — and the private, internal scars — from his first tour, at both the professional and personal levels.

General Odierno commanded the Fourth Infantry Division as insurgents carried out three-quarters of their attacks nationwide in his area of north-central Iraq, which included Saddam Hussein's volatile home region of Tikrit.

It also was on his watch that a Special Operations task force and conventional troops under his command captured Mr. Hussein, producing a briefly shining moment in which the counterinsurgency effort appeared to be gaining traction.

But insurgency, terrorism and factional violence verging on civil war have continued.

He has felt criticism from some officers, especially among marines, that made it into the public debate via op-ed columns and books by noted military affairs writers, including "Cobra II," by Michael R. Gordon of The New York Times and Bernard E. Trainer; and "Fiasco," by Thomas E. Ricks of The Washington Post.

The Fourth Infantry Division focused too much on traditional combat operations in 2003 and 2004, the critics argued, saying that those efforts, with an emphasis on capturing and killing adversary fighters rather than on rebuilding the country and winning the confidence of Iraqis, actually fueled the insurgency.

"It is too simplistic to say that all we were interested in was the hard-core task," General Odierno said. "It simply is not true. We worked very hard to take the balanced approach."

He expressed satisfaction with his division in bringing down the number of attacks in the Tikrit area of operations, which once accounted for three-quarters of attacks in Iraq and accounted for one-third at the end of his tour. (The focus of the insurgency shifted to the Anbar region, west of Baghdad.) He also cites his division's efforts in creating three new provisional governments through the first democratic-style caucuses.

The war became unusually, and intensely, personal for General Odierno when his son, Capt. Anthony Odierno, lost much of his left arm during a counter-insurgency mission in Baghdad in the summer of 2004.

The general succeeds the current corps commander, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the author of an influential essay warning that success in Iraq cannot be achieved solely by training local security forces or through combat operations. General Chiarelli wrote that the military must work to provide essential city services, create jobs and promote local governmental control. He also began the new operation this autumn to secure Baghdad.

After leaving Iraq in early 2004, General Odierno spent 18 months as an assistant to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs, most of that as an adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The experience, he said, gave him "a really good understanding of the interagency process.

"Maybe too good," he said. "I have a pretty clear understanding of what thought processes occur where and at what time, and how we get to certain decisions."

In what has become the overarching policy of the Bush administration, he also pledged to focus on increasing the capacity of Iraqi security forces, in particular the police, and on combating sectarian militias responsible for a growing percentage of attacks.

"A lot of the militias can be reconciled, and we have to figure out ways to reconcile with them," he said. "And there are splinter, radical groups that cannot be reconciled. They have other agendas, and they will have to be dealt with in a different way."

Decisions about how many troops that will require will be made by higher-ranking generals, and he did not hint what advice he might give them as their top field commander.

Asked to describe the Iraq he would like to see at the end of his 12-month tour, General Odierno said: "Bottom line? Full restoration of civil authority in Baghdad. Sectarian violence reduced. Extra-governmental armed groups diminished, and their influence diminished. And the government of Iraq viewed as a legitimate institution in the eyes of the Iraqi people.

"Those are the goals we have set for ourselves," he concluded. "Will we attain those? I don't know."

Lost After Translation (NYT)

By Basim Mardan

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096197

THE United States Marines entered Mosul from the north. I lived in the northern suburbs, so I saw the first American flag. When the Humvees stopped, I shook hands with the marines, and I told them: "You are mostly welcome here. Why don't you come to my house and drink some cold water?" They offered me a job.

I was the first or second translator to work with the coalition forces in my city, the first or second Iraqi to set foot on the American base in Mosul. The Marines paid me $150 a month, which was better than the $2 I was making as a librarian. So I didn't see weapons in their hands, I saw flowers, and I took them all as friends. I loved what I was doing because I thought it was a good thing for my country.

My family was nervous. They told me things would change. I needed the American money to get married, but my fiancée said, "We don't need to get married now — just quit." But I wanted to work with the military forever; I loved it.

The unit I worked with was training and equipping the Iraqi police, teaching them about human rights. I translated textbooks from an American police academy into Arabic. The Americans taught Iraqi officials to exercise their authority without taking bribes or humiliating employees.

Iraqis needed this education, and the unit I worked with was awesome. At one point, they did two or three patrols to clean up garbage from the streets. In our culture, cleaning garbage is a low-level job, but when we saw a captain and a general doing it, that gave us a very great feeling. I threw away my helmet, took a shovel and started working, cleaning up garbage.

But even as we cleaned the city of garbage, we forgot another kind of garbage that was accumulating. The way the Army reacted to the insurgency was not perfect. The Americans did many foolish things. When I saw the pictures from Abu Ghraib, I thought, we are teaching Iraqi policemen not to do that — do the Americans really do that?

I grew sad, and I didn't know what to believe, because the people I worked with were great. I'd told the officers at our camp's detention center, "You are treating those prisoners better than their own mothers." It's not normal in our culture for a policeman to come and feed a sick prisoner who is so dangerous that you have to keep him chained.

But I did it myself. I was very kind to Iraqi people, to my own people, and I think Americans taught me that — the American Army that I was working with, not the American Army that was in Abu Ghraib.

In the second year, when we were processing the release of prisoners from Abu Ghraib, I read out a list of names of prisoners who needed to collect their documents. One of them said to me, "You are all going to be killed." I thought he was referring to the Americans, until he said, "No, I mean you."

I didn't translate this for the soldiers who were with me. I was thinking, "This person just got out of prison, and I don't want to be the reason that he goes back to prison."

About a month later, a message was fixed to my door, full of verses from the Koran and threats and curses. They gave me about one week to quit what I was doing.

A week later, a CD was fixed on my door, picturing one of my best friends, Nabi Abul-Ahad. It was a video of them beheading him, with the message that I would be next.

I was kicked out of the house. My family didn't want me there any more. They said, "You're going to get us all killed." I had to leave my wife, who was pregnant. Baghdad was a real hell, so I hid in Najjaf.

After my wife gave birth to our son, her father told her, "If your husband doesn't come to Mosul now, even if he's going to get killed, then you are not his wife anymore." This can happen in our society. I didn't want to lose my wife or my son, so I went back to Mosul.

In Mosul, I had to stay hidden. I walked for about three hours in the dark, after curfew, when anybody can shoot at you, including the Americans, just to see my wife and my newborn son. Then I went back to my family's house and hid for three months.

The American Army, or whoever's in charge, has badly disappointed the translators. When I told them I was under threat, they said I could come and live on the base. I told them I had just been married, and my wife was pregnant, and my family needed me. They said I could live on the base and they would drop me by my house to visit my family at night.

Imagine if somebody saw me dropped by an American convoy near my house. The house would be burning the second I was inside. These were not logical solutions.

They could have helped my family move to Kurdistan, helped find me a job with the government there. Or, if I'd escaped to Jordan, they could tell the American Embassy there: "This is a translator who has been working for the United States Army. He's just like an American soldier. Treat him well."

But I'm not going to be ungrateful to the people who were fighting and dying for my country. I have friends in the American Army who died in front of my eyes.

I remember one of them, a dear friend to me who died stopping a car bomb. He was a hero. He was guarding the police academy in Mosul, which was full of new recruits being trained by the Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0096198

My heart broke when I saw this: an American, coming from another continent, who died to protect Iraqi policemen. This was a good message, and I would never say that those people exploited me or exploited my thinking.

The system did. Not them.

Fear Of Freedom (NYT)

By Waddah Ali

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

UNDER Saddam Hussein, if you were not a member of the Baath party, you wouldn't get rations, you'd be forbidden to carry on studying, you wouldn't be on the earth but in the sea.

I was invited to join the party in 1976, when I was doing my compulsory military service after earning my first degree at Mosul University. The colonel in control of my camp wanted to sit for an examination, and he asked me to join the party and translate the Oxford Companion to Military History into Arabic for him.

I'm very ambitious. I wanted to carry on with my studies. And so I joined the party, and when I finished my military service I was appointed to the university. They never appoint anyone unless you're a party member, it doesn't matter if you're Plato or Aristotle.

In 1982, when Iraq and Iran were at war, they asked me if I wanted a promotion within the party. To get this, I would have to go with some other comrades and execute deserters from the war. I told them I was not an executioner.

They put me in prison. Through family contacts, I got out after one month. They expelled me from teaching and transferred me to clerical work.

I tried to escape Iraq for Turkey in 1995. But the Kurds in northern Iraq demanded money I didn't have, and I decided to go back to Mosul, where I had a 300-meter plot of land given to me by Saddam Hussein.

Saddam Hussein gave everybody a plot of land. He was the most generous president, but also the most severe. He was a god, and gods are arbitrary.

In Mosul, men in a black Cadillac stopped me, blindfolded me and drove me to Baghdad, to Hakmiya Prison. After three months of solitary confinement, torture and electric shocks, I was accused of spying for Turkey. When I went in, my weight was 242 pounds. I came out only 121 pounds. I was divided in half by the torture.

After a year in prison, I came home. We were impoverished. My wife and children were living with her father in Karbala — they are Shiites — and my salary wasn't even enough for transportation to visit them. After a long time, I was reappointed to a university near there. I had been there for three months when the Americans came.

Nobody in Karbala dared to work as a translator for the American soldiers, so I was pushed into the first ranks, translating between the military commanders and the governor every day on TV. I found myself riding a rocket of fame and prestige, but no money. Just $20 a week, and a stigma in the eyes of others.

I translated conferences and debates with the Karbala city council. I even translated for L. Paul Bremer, the American viceroy, when he came. Before he arrived, the colonel I worked for told me, "Waddah, don't tell anybody he's coming." They trusted me, and I was worthy of their trust.

I tried to solve problems. Once, when students had a sit-in demonstration against the Americans, I told them: "Be quiet, be careful in your way of dealing with them. If you're impolite, suppose they are impolite, too — you could be killed."

Many times when I went to my father-in-law's house I was shot at from afar. Among the Shiites there are many hard-liners who support Iran and hate America. They didn't know that by marriage, I'm a Shiite like them. They said, this guy's a Sunni, serving the Americans.

The Americans gave me a pistol to defend myself. It was a war spoil, an Iraqi intelligence-style pistol. But it created some troubles between me and the American in charge of intelligence. One day he told me, "Waddah, give me the card for the weapon," the identity card allowing me to carry the weapon. I told him I didn't have it. I didn't trust him very much. He was young, proud and haughty. He frisked me, searching for the card, right in front of the president of the university, and he found the card in my pocket. He said, "You lied to me?"

I decided to quit working for the Americans. Not long after this, a child relative of mine was kidnapped on her way home from school. I sold my wife's gold, and I sold the plot of land Saddam Hussein gave me, for the ransom. Every one of my friends was looking for her. Finally the kidnappers telephoned my brother, he gave them $50,000, and she was released. This is what the insurgents do to finance their terror.

HISTORY is an idea to you; to us it is our life. I'm a typical Iraqi. I love my country. I love my food, my way of life, I love the carpets, the mud of the Euphrates, Iraqi poetry, everything: this is my culture. If I feel proud, I recite my poets, and the rhythm comes back, and no other rhythm can supersede or remove it.

What made Saddam Hussein powerful? Information. Whenever a person checked into a hotel, a paper with his full name and a copy of his passport was given to the security quarters. Iraq was a castle; a bird could not go in without being checked. If you caused offense, you could be put in prison for good. If you were lucky you would be tried one day; if not, then we have a word in Arabic that means you rot, as food rots.

America did well to liberate Iraq. But Iraqis were used to tyranny and afraid of freedom. The Americans entered Iraq without a psychological program for dealing with this fact. Iraqis had been programmed according to another system of thought and feeling. America should have considered that.

Republic Of Dreams (NYT)

By Omar Ghanim Fathi

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

WHEN I was a student, we read many books about Western culture, democracy and the Greek philosophers. We saw movies set in America, where people were able to speak their minds, and we figured that democracy would be the salvation for us and our country.

Our dreams were romantic and rosy. The bitterness and ugliness of the reality we have faced since was nothing we could have imagined.

In Saddam Hussein's time, in order to be accepted you had to tell the government that you were a Baathist; you had to tell people in your social environment that you were religious; and in fact you had to be somewhere in the middle.

I was a moderate liberal. In my imaginary republic, there was space for everybody — Baathists, socialists, liberals — as long as you didn't hurt people or persecute them or impose your style of thinking or living on others.

When the Americans invaded, I was ready to shake hands with the devil himself to remove Saddam Hussein from power. I didn't think the Americans would be able to give us liberty or democracy, but I thought they would give us the space to build that imaginary republic. I didn't go to work for the Americans, but I published articles in a newspaper they established in Mosul. It was called New Hope. It told the people what the American forces were doing day by day in Mosul, and there was space where Iraqis could write opinions.

I wrote nine articles for that newspaper. One of them won a competition for the best essay on democracy and liberty in Iraq. It was a big competition, and I won. What I said, simply, was that liberty is just like your own spirit, your own soul: nobody can give it to you, but anybody can take it away from you. My photo appeared in the paper with the article.

I was a lecturer at an institute, and I started receiving threats from my students — directly, face to face: "You deserve to die." And my boss said, "You've been a traitor to your religion and your country." Insurgents slid threatening letters under my door. My mother was terrified. I'm her only son.

The terrorists do not necessarily attack you personally. They attack sisters, kidnap sons, mothers. We are in a war against dishonorable enemies. The only thing that I had, the only weapon to defend myself, was my pen and my words, but the solution for them was not discussion, not disagreeing with me, but shooting me.

They shot dead a salesman who came to our door, because they mistook him for me. We sold the house and went to live with my sister.

Some time later, a friend offered me a job with an Iraqi organization called Development and Democratic Dialogue. Three or four days after I started working there, my friend was kidnapped while giving a lecture at a university. Before he died I'd told him, "Don't give a lecture in the same place twice." But that's what he did. We were like soldiers without weapons: you go and give lectures, but you don't know what's going to happen to you when the lecture is finished.

I think the Americans, as we Iraqis understand them, are two entities. There's the Army in Iraq and the politicians in Washington. The American policy people wanted to give us democracy and liberty the same way you give me a shirt, so I can wear it right away. But the general opinion in my country, especially among extremists, is that America went into Iraq only for one reason: to terminate Islam and Muslims. Those who aren't so extreme say that America invaded Iraq only to steal the oil.

The American Army, on the other hand, we know for sure is not an abstract entity; it is a bunch of people, every one of them different from the others. They are under very, very intense pressure. People hate them, people are attacking them, and of course this pressure can lead to many mistakes. They destroyed everything and thought they could rebuild from scratch. Maybe this could have worked if people loved Americans or understood what they were doing. But people already hated America.

America should have removed Saddam Hussein and the closest circle around him and appointed a strong government right away. It would have been another dictatorship, but a different kind. It could have imposed martial law, then done the job that the Americans were not able to do, which was to cut power away from the old system by removing those people who might become terrorists in the future.

After four to eight years, we could have had an election, and the new government could have started working on the basis of the new Constitution. Then Iraqi society could have taken baby steps down the long road to democracy and liberty. As it was, the Iraqi people, who had no experience with civilian government or democratic systems, misused these things.

Now the problems of Iraq will not be solved without a long and very bloody civil war. The fragments that will emerge should practice democracy by choosing their own leaders, away from the influence of the Americans — even if those leaders are terrorists. But the people will not enjoy the democracy and liberty that was already given to them, because they refused it.

Afghan Army To Strike Taliban In Winter (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, November 20, 2006

The U.S.-backed Afghan army will step up counter-Taliban offensives this winter, which could see heavy fighting during a period traditionally used by Afghan fighters for rest and resupply, a U.S. general said here Sunday.

U.S. Army Brig. Gen. Douglas Pritt, who oversees the U.S.-led effort to train the Afghan military, said Afghan forces have tripled the number of forward bases to more than 60 and plan to spend the winter harassing Taliban and gathering intelligence from combat outposts deep inside rebel strongholds.

"They're much better equipped for winter operations than the Taliban. I'm hoping for a lot of snow this winter," Pritt said during a visit to The Associated Press bureau in Dubai.

Pritt said most Afghan troops that have emerged from training still cannot operate independently, but he noted that five battalions of Afghan National Army troops, numbering 300 to 600 soldiers each, were nearly ready to mount offensives on their own.

But even those top battalions will continue to operate in tandem with U.S. and NATO troops, he said.

Afghanistan's winters normally bring months of rain and snow, turning dusty roads into impassable muck and rendering most warfare impossible. The country has traditionally seen winter breaks in its decades of conflict, where fighters return home to families or hunker down on bases until fighting resumes in spring.

Snowfall is already hampering Taliban supply lines, making it tougher for the rebels to resupply, Pritt said. The Afghan National Army, backed by U.S. and NATO airlifts, are less restricted by cold and mud.

Afghan troops are being readied for "extended patrols" in the combat zones of the east and south that border Pakistan.

"We want to be in the right places," he said. "If the Taliban is trying to rearm, refit and wait out the winter, then we'll know they're there."

The Afghan National Army remains hamstrung by desertion rates of around 15 percent, Pritt said, little different from its rate in May. The previous year, the desertion rate peaked above 25 percent, according to U.S. military figures.

Afghan soldiers recently received a raise for their tiny salaries, from $70 to $100 a month, Pritt said, a decision that followed the revelation that AWOL soldiers could earn $70 a month as day laborers without facing combat.

The general said his goal was to bring the desertion rate below 10 percent, a figure that has already been reached in one Afghan corps.

U.S. and Afghan officials have said soldiers abscond for several reasons, including a reluctance to fight alongside foreigners against countrymen and a need to bring money to families in remote villages or help at harvest time.

The Afghan army's screening process has blocked the type of insurgent infiltrators that have hampered the Iraqi military. Pritt said only three Taliban have thus far been found in the ranks.

"They were trying to get information that was inappropriate for their job descriptions," he said.

The American force training Afghan troops — chiefly made up of U.S. Army National Guardsmen — is expected to rise from 2,900 now to around 3,600 by April, to comply with an Afghan government directive to increase recruiting to 2,000 Afghan soldiers per month, Pritt said.

Overall, he said 5,200 foreign trainers would be working with the Afghan army, which the government wants to increase from its current 35,000 troops to 50,000 or perhaps 70,000.

"We believe this is the main effort in Afghanistan," Pritt said.

In Afghanistan's South, Mixed Signals For Help (WP)

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

KABUL -- Clutching scarves nervously around their faces, the women whispered details of Taliban atrocities taking place in their native Helmand province: A translator's body found in a sack, carved into pieces. A police officer taken hostage, blinded and garroted with wire. A woman shot and hanged by her thumbs.

DOJ_NMG_0096201

"All of our lives are in danger now. Our schools are shut, and anyone who works for the government is branded as an infidel," said Ma Gul, 52, a teacher who traveled to the capital this week with 20 other women from Greshk, a town in Helmand 300 miles south, to demand better protection and the removal of weak regional officials.

Gul's woes echo across this country's four southern provinces, where the Taliban insurgency is on a fierce rebound five years after U.S. and Afghan forces toppled the Islamic militia from power in Kabul. Months of aggressive ground combat and NATO airstrikes have failed to halt continuous violence in the south, as well as some sporadic attacks in other parts of the country.

According to a new report by a commission of Afghan and foreign officials, insurgent and terrorist attacks nationwide have increased fourfold in the past year, reaching 600 incidents per month by September and causing 3,700 deaths since January.

The report was issued by a group called the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, set up in February under U.N. auspices to promote and measure Afghan government performance. It said the violence threatens to reverse recent economic and political gains across the nation, and has led to a partial or total withdrawal of foreign aid in some provinces.

In Helmand, a vast and arid region where much of the worst fighting has taken place and thousands of people have fled their homes, residents and elders have been sending urgent but contradictory signals about how to restore peace.

While the delegation of women recounted Taliban abuses, a group of visiting elders from another Helmand district described local Taliban fighters as "brothers" and said their worst problem was the devastation from months of bombing by foreign military forces. If the authorities would allow tribal leaders to administer their district, they said, they would guarantee no further Taliban attacks.

"This bombing has destroyed hundreds of shops and many vineyards, but it has not driven the Taliban away," said Mohammed Rahim, a bearded farmer from Helmand's Nau Zad district. "We know the local Taliban; they are fighting against corruption and abuses. Once we have our own administration and the bombing stops, we trust they will obey us and the central government."

As a result of the mixed messages from victims of the conflict, and the growing public resentment over civilian casualties from bombing, NATO and Afghan officials now confront a strategic question: whether to keep pressing to forcibly defeat the Taliban, or begin accepting its presence in areas where tribal elders promise to rein in the militia.

Much of the south is still at war, with attacks and armed clashes occurring daily in Kandahar, Zabol and Uruzgan provinces. But in Helmand's Musa Qala district, NATO has cautiously agreed to test the tribal approach. Under a deal brokered in September by the provincial governor, NATO agreed to pull back British forces from Musa Qala, and local elders pledged that Taliban attacks would cease.

So far, reports from the isolated region, which is also a major center of opium smuggling, are confusing and contradictory. Some residents and visitors say the district is effectively under Taliban control, and a recent BBC video report showed squads of armed insurgents patrolling Musa Qala in fast pickup trucks, much as they did during the era of repressive Taliban rule that ended in 2001.

But both NATO and senior Afghan officials say they are largely satisfied with the arrangement, which they said has brought fighting to a halt and allowed foreign troops to focus on creating a central zone for security and development around Helmand's capital city, rather than manning scattered outposts and chasing after bands of insurgents.

"Musa Qala has proved to be a very good deal," said Maj. Luke Knittig, a U.S. Army officer and the chief NATO spokesman in Kabul. "After the agreement, there were 34 days of calm, which led us to believe the elders had made good on their word." However, he added: "We have our eyes closely on Musa Qala. If we see it being used as a launching pad for attacks, we will go back and address that."

President Hamid Karzai defended the pact last week against criticism that it has been a major concession to the Taliban. Speaking on Radio Free Europe, he said he had complete trust in the region's elders and in their promise not to allow any "saboteurs" in Musa Qala. However, Karzai also expressed concern about reports that a local Islamic cleric was humiliated by Taliban fighters and that a senior tribal leader had disappeared.

Karzai's embrace of the agreement stands in marked contrast to the skepticism he and other Afghan officials have shown toward two similar peace deals reached this fall between the government of Pakistan and tribal leaders in districts abutting the Afghan border. Those districts are widely believed to serve as havens for Islamic extremists and al-Qaeda fugitives who train insurgents and send them across the border to fight against Afghan and NATO forces.

Some observers here worry that the Musa Qala deal is not only setting a tone of conciliation toward the insurgency, but that it also means Karzai and his foreign defenders are falling back on Afghanistan's tribal system of jergas, or informal consensual agreements, at the expense of modern democratic institutions.

"This is the wrong way to solve things," said Noorulhaq Olemi, a member of parliament who chairs its security and defense committee. "Our problem is that we have a weak government. We need a better national army and police. We need reconciliation with the people, not with terrorists. If we go back to the tribal system and jergas, we could end up with the country divided into pieces."

Although Helmand residents disagree on the issue of negotiating with the Taliban, many express common anger and disillusionment with regional authorities. Both the Greshk women and the Nau Zad elders said that many police and civilian officials in Helmand are abusive and corrupt, and that this problem is creating local support for the Taliban.

The diplomats and academics on the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board agreed, stating in their report that the factors driving the insurgency in the south include poor government services, corrupt officials and lack of law enforcement. In Helmand especially, they added, the "scourge of the narcotics industry" has significantly helped fuel the insurgency.

"When there is an absence in basic service delivery by the government, people inevitably look to alternative sources," the report said. "Only by eliminating corruption can the government diminish the freedom of operation that insurgents and drug traffickers now enjoy."

To the women from Greshk, who include government teachers and professionals, the Musa Qala agreement is a frightening example of authority caving in to powerful miscreants. One member of the delegation said the Taliban and its criminal allies had already built a plane runway and a heroin laboratory in Musa Qala.

But to the elders from Nau Zad, mostly poor farmers whose homes and livelihoods have been savaged by months of fighting, Musa Qala represents a model for peace that they desperately hope can be replicated in their district.

"Some people call it a Taliban agreement, but that is wrong," said Mohammed Anwar, a member of parliament from Nau Zad who hosted the visiting elders in Kabul. "The foreign Taliban are terrorists, but the local Taliban are the sons of Afghanistan. They will speak with us and live under the flag with us. If the government cannot bring security and stop this terrible bombing, they should let the elders try."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

State Bars Push Back On Privilege Waivers (LAW)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 20, 2006

State bar associations are jumping into the roiling debate over the attorney-client privilege-waiver issue triggered by the U.S. Department of Justice's Thompson Memorandum.

Several states have recently convened task forces to fight the 2003 directive penned by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, which, among other things, instructs prosecutors to trade leniency for waivers of the attorney-client privilege during corporate investigations.

The states are lobbying the federal government to change Justice Department policies and practices that give incentives to corporate defendants who waive attorney-client privilege and pressure companies not to pay the legal fees of current or former employees facing corporate criminal investigations. In some cases, states are mulling changes to their own rules of professional conduct to sidestep Thompson-style waivers.

New task forces in Florida, Illinois and Michigan join ongoing efforts in Arkansas, Maryland, New York and Boston.

'CULTURE OF WAIVER'

Samuel Damren, a litigator in the Detroit office of Dykema Gossett, heads Michigan's task force. He hopes that his group will recommend changing the state's rules of professional conduct to prohibit government attorneys practicing in Michigan from requesting that companies waive their attorney-client privilege to prove they are cooperating with the government probe.

Damren said his approach is part of the legal community's pushback against the perceived "culture of waiver" that many attorneys worry is eroding attorney-client privilege. "If the prosecutors and regulators aren't going to change the rules, it's not just in their hands, it's in the hands of the bar," Damren said.

An Arkansas Bar Association task force is recommending that its House of Delegates ask the Arkansas Supreme Court to adopt rule changes allowing for selective waiver, or disclosure of some information to a government agency without revoking the attorney-client privilege, and barring discovery of attorney communications with experts.

The 72,000-member New York State Bar Association is informally discussing whether to push for changes to the rules of professional conduct to curtail waivers. But state Bar President Mark H. Alcott said he's unsure if such a rule would work in practice, since the client ultimately has the right to waive and could succumb to pressure from the government.

The Bar's chief strategy is lobbying the federal government to change policies that pressure companies to waive attorney-client privilege, said Alcott, a senior litigation partner with New York's Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison.

DOJ_NMG_0096203

Florida Bar President Henry M. Coxe III of Bedell, Dittmar, DeVault, Pillans & Coxe in Jacksonville was inspired by hearing about the New York Bar efforts at an American Bar Association gathering. "It struck me that Florida wasn't in that mix and we should be," he said.

The Florida Bar task force, which was formed in September, is looking into the extent of compelled or coerced waivers in Florida, and the circumstances under which waivers were granted. But Coxe said it's too early to project what recommendations might emerge.

A special committee of the Illinois State Bar Association met for the first time on Oct. 30, in response to the American Bar Association's appeal to state bar groups to examine the issue, said Chairman J. Timothy Eaton of Chicago's Shefsky & Froelich.

The committee has yet to decide on its scope, but it will inspect the waiver-seeking activities of the state's attorney general and its impact on the local bar. Recommending that the Illinois Supreme Court change the rules of professional conduct is another possibility, Eaton said.

In June, the Boston Bar Association penned a letter to its local U.S. Attorney about the office's written waiver-review process. The bar association requested that a supervisor in the U.S. Attorney's Office approve all prosecutor requests for waiver of the corporate attorney-client privilege or work-product protection and that the office only grant limited waivers.

A company's willingness to cooperate in investigations is not a "litmus test" and is only one of several factors the Justice Department considers when charging a company, said DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The DOJ is still "reviewing the specific concerns and suggestions" of bar associations and other groups, Roehrkasse said.

SEC Contacts Ford Over Disclosures (WSJ)

By Tony Cooke And John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

DETROIT -- Ford Motor Co. said it has received an informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission related to disclosures detailing its recent restatements of earnings because of accounting errors.

The company also restated financial results for the first and second quarters of 2006, deepening its loss for the two periods and finalizing the financial corrections it has said it needed to make.

On Nov. 14, Ford restated the bulk of the affected earnings, which span from 2001 to the third quarter of 2006. The restatements are necessary because Ford failed to sufficiently comply with certain rules related to its accounting for transactions used to hedge against interest-rate risk.

Ford on Friday said it has been contacted by the SEC's divisions of corporation finance and enforcement regarding the amended restatements for the entirety of 2005, the third quarter of 2006 and another filing discussing the restatements. Ford said it is "voluntarily cooperating" with the "informal inquiries," which also relate to disclosures made by Ford Motor Credit Co.

It is unclear whether the SEC will also inquire into the first- and second-quarter restatements issued Friday. Ford spokeswoman Becky Sanch declined to comment further on Friday's SEC filing regarding the informal inquiry. When Ford first said it would restate earnings, company officials expressed disappointment over the restatements and said the issues were related to "a very complicated accounting standard."

SEC officials couldn't be reached. The SEC doesn't typically comment on inquiries that haven't been made public and has in the past declined to comment on inquiries that are ongoing.

Other companies, including auto supplier Delphi Corp., have had to delay earnings in an effort to evaluate how past earnings statements complied with the rules, known as SFAS 133 for accounting for derivative instruments and hedging activities.

In last month's statement announcing the company's need to restate earnings, Ford Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said the company's "overall hedging strategy is sound."

Ford first said it needed to restate earnings on Oct. 23 when it released preliminary financial results for the third quarter. The company had said initially it lost $5.8 billion during that period, but later pared the loss to $5.2 billion because of inaccurate accounting.

Friday, Ford revised its first-quarter loss to $1.42 billion from the previously stated $1.19 billion and revised its second-quarter loss to $317 million from $254 million. The move widens the reported net loss to $1.74 billion from $1.44 billion for the first six months of the year. The company expects to post further losses in the fourth quarter.

The company's restatements aren't expected to affect cash flow.

The first and second quarter were revised for reasons similar to those in the previous restatements issued Tuesday, Ms. Sanch said. The company's restatements for previous years had changed a net loss to a net profit in 2002, but reduced the company's stated income during the next three years through 2005.

Ford shares closed Friday at $8.89 each, down 1.6%.

Outside Audit Restatement Blame: Basic Mistakes (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Public companies continue to restate financial results at a record pace. Ask executives why and they will likely cite complex accounting rules or hypersensitive auditors.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has come to a different conclusion: A majority of restatements are due to basic mistakes with nuts-and-bolts accounting.

Research by the SEC's Office of the Chief Accountant found about 55% of recent restatements were due to companies misapplying basic accounting rules or to problems with records that meant they didn't have the correct data to get the accounting right, said SEC Deputy Chief Accountant Scott Taub.

He expressed surprise so many restatements were "just from flat-out errors." Mr. Taub outlined the study's results during a presentation in New York on Friday at the annual conference of Financial Executives International, a professional group.

"Internal-control structures are missing things, corporate-finance staffs are missing things and auditors are missing things," he said. "All of these things are not working as well as we'd like them to."

The findings come as the SEC, along with the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, an accounting-firm regulator, have been working to ease internal-control rules designed to ensure companies avoid accounting mistakes or fraud. Companies, especially smaller firms, have bristled at the costs of rules imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform legislation. Besides mandating that managers attest to having adequate controls, the rules require an auditor to sign off that the controls are sufficient.

Supporters of the internal-control rules have argued they are needed because companies still are having a tough time getting their accounting right. They point to the rise in restatements in recent years as evidence companies still have a lot of work to do.

In 2005, there were 1,195 restatements by U.S. companies compared with 270 in 2001, according to Glass Lewis & Co., a proxy-advisory and accounting-research firm. U.S. companies had issued 1,070 restatements this year as of Sept. 30, making it likely that total restatements for the year will hit 1,300, said Mark Grothe, an analyst at Glass Lewis.

Restatements are akin to a product recall of a company's financial statements. They mean investors can no longer rely on profit and other figures that may have formed the basis for an investment decision. The rise in restatements has been attributed to much tougher audits by accounting firms, which came under fire for their failure to catch blowups like Enron Corp. and the former WorldCom Inc. In addition, Sarbanes-Oxley brought accounting firms under formal regulation for the first time, giving them impetus to dig deeper into corporate books.

Mr. Taub said his office undertook its study to find the underlying problems causing the restatements. Besides basic errors, the SEC's research concluded that about a third of restatements in recent years were due to errors in judgment related to more-complex issues, industry practices that ran afoul of accounting rules, and lack of clarity in accounting standards. Only about 5% of restatements were due to deliberate errors or fraud, he said.

Among problem areas that go beyond basic errors, Mr. Taub said a large number of restatements were caused by problems applying accounting standards related to lease contracts, income taxes and revenue recognition.

To help stem the wave of restatements, Mr. Taub suggested that accounting-rule makers need to replace standards that are confusing to companies. The Financial Accounting Standards Board is making progress, he added, citing its work to revamp lease-accounting rules and a continuing project to overhaul pension accounting.

The SEC and other regulators need to accept that there can be "reasonable differences in judgment" on accounting issues that don't necessarily imply wrongdoing, Mr. Taub said, and impose regulation only when needed. Companies and auditors need to exercise "professional judgment" and help to stamp out transactions structured to achieve a particular accounting result, he said.

Mr. Taub also encouraged companies to increase disclosure that shows their reasoning on complex questions. He suggested companies forced to restate results disclose how they discovered the problem. That happened in only about half the restatements his staff examined. How an error is found is "something investors might be concerned about," he said.

EXITING UNDER A CLOUD, WITH $175 MILLION (LAT)

By Kathy M. Kristof, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

KB Home's CEO left amid a stock option probe. He can cash in because he wasn't fired.

DOJ_NMG_0096205

When KB Home Chief Executive Bruce Karatz retired last week amid a stock option controversy, he agreed to give up $13 million in disputed stock gains. But that doesn't mean he will leave the company empty-handed.

Karatz is walking away with as much as $175 million in severance pay, pension benefits and stock options, regulatory filings show.

The windfall is possible in part because Karatz was not fired for cause but simply retired, making him eligible for his severance pay and pension unless the company's board of directors blocks payment, compensation experts say.

"It's like he hit the jackpot," said Patrick McGurn, general counsel of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises large investors such as pension plans and mutual funds. "He might not like the hit to his reputation, but he's certainly not going to take one to his bank account."

Karatz, 61, stepped down as head of the Los Angeles home-building company Nov. 12, after an internal probe found that he had picked stock option grant dates that inflated the value of the options to himself and other executives.

Under his employment agreement, Karatz would get a severance payment equal to the sum of what he earned in salary and incentive pay over the last three years, according to KB Home's proxy statement. That adds up to nearly $80 million.

Karatz also has a special executive pension plan that guarantees him $1 million a year for up to 25 years in retirement, making it potentially worth $25 million.

And Karatz has vested stock options that aren't in dispute, which are worth about $70 million based on KB Home shares' closing price Friday of $49.07.

Add it all up, and it comes to $175 million.

"What's perverse about this is Karatz may actually do better by getting fired than he would have done if he had stayed with the company," McGurn said.

He noted that Karatz's compensation from 2002 to 2005 — on which his severance is based — was boosted by the strong housing market, because his pay was tied to KB's profit. In 2005, the company reported profit of $842 million.

Mark Fabiani, an attorney representing the KB Home board, declined to say whether directors would move to revoke Karatz's severance pay or retirement benefits.

"The employment agreement will be the subject of discussions with the board and Mr. Karatz's representatives," Fabiani said. "The board is going to enter into discussions with Mr. Karatz about that situation, and those discussions have not yet begun."

Lawyers for Karatz declined to comment.

By stepping down, Karatz joined more than 50 corporate officers who have been fired or resigned in the option backdating scandal. Nearly 200 companies have disclosed federal or internal inquiries into their option practices.

Options are the right to buy stock at a set price within a certain time period.

Government and internal investigations are focused on whether executives improperly looked back weeks or months to set grant dates to coincide with their stock's lowest recent price, which would boost the value of the options.

KB Home disclosed in August that the Securities and Exchange Commission was reviewing its option practices. Legal experts said last week that Karatz's resignation could also draw the attention of the Justice Department, which has filed criminal charges against former executives of two companies accused of backdating.

In a statement Nov. 12, KB Home's board said its internal probe concluded that Karatz and former human resources chief Gary A. Ray had set "incorrect" option grant dates, but the board did not directly accuse them of wrongdoing. The company said Karatz had retired, Ray's employment had been terminated and chief legal officer Richard B. Hirst had resigned.

Company representatives declined to elaborate on the statement, which also said that Karatz would surrender $13 million he had realized based on flawed option grant dates.

Karatz's contract guarantees him severance except under only a few circumstances, including being fired for a specific cause such as fraud or misappropriation of funds, said Paul Hodgson, a compensation expert with Corporate Library, a research firm.

"The problem is that these contracts are written so loosely that it's tough to terminate without paying," he said.

Hodgson also noted that by saying Karatz had retired, KB Home implied that the separation was voluntary, which could make it more difficult for the company to deny Karatz his severance pay or pension.

Hodgson and other experts said that lucrative severance agreements were common for top corporate executives, even those who leave under a cloud.

"No one should shed any tears for CEOs who are forced out because of their role in backdating scandals," said Amy Borrus, deputy director of the Council of Institutional Investors, which represents large shareholders.
